ELIZAB. AN' 1559.

By a ſixth, the parliament impowered the Queen to reſerve to herſelf the lands belonging to the biſhopricks, as they became void, giving in lieu thereof their full value in impropriated tythes.

By a ſeventh act, all religious houſes were annexed to the crown.

The eighth declared valid the deprivation of Popiſh biſhops in King Edward's reign.

In ſhort, in this ſeſſion, the parliament reſtored religion to the ſame ſtate as in Edward VI's reign, and having granted a ſubſidy, it was diſſolved the eighth of May.

Some oppoſition made by Popiſh biſhops and lords. Burnet.

Among the biſhops then in England, ſome had complied with all the changes in religion ſince Henry's breach with the Pope. Of this number were Heath archbiſhop of York, Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, Thirleby biſhop of Ely, and ſome others. Theſe choſe to abſent themſelves from the parliament, becauſe, as they ſaw the Queen's intention, they durſt neither openly oppoſe it, nor aſſiſt in reſtoring the reformation, after ſo public a deſertion of it in the laſt reign. Both appeared to them equally incommodious. Other biſhops ſtrongly oppoſed theſe acts, but with no ſucceſs. Some of the lay-peers alſo indeavored to ſtem the torrent, and even entered their proteſts; but their number was not conſiderable. To ſay all in a word, the ſame happened in this, as in the parliaments under Henry, Edward, and Mary, that is, the court got inacted almoſt whatever they pleaſed. This is not very ſtrange with regard to the houſe of commons, where the members may be changed every new parliament. But the readineſs wherewith the houſe of lords conſented, one while to acts favoring the reformation, another while to thoſe eſtabliſhing Popery, is abundantly more aſtoniſhing.

The high commiſſion erected. Burnet.

The ſupremacy wherewith the Queen was lately inveſted, with power to depute any perſons to exerciſe it in her name, gave riſe to a new court, termed The High Commiſſion Court. It was compoſed of a certain number of commiſſioners, who exerciſed the ſame power which had been formerly lodged, by Henry VIII, in a ſingle perſon, with the title of Vicegerent.

The Queen forbids to preach without licence. Burnet.

While the parliament was taken up with affairs of religion, ſome preachers having, in diverſe places, delivered doctrines from the pulpit tending to the reformation's ſubvertion, Queen Elizabeth, following the precedent ſet her by Edward and Mary, prohibited all preaching without a ſpecial licence under the great ſeal. This fired the lower houſe of convocation, and produced a petition to the Queen, wherein the dogmas of the Romiſh church were boldly aſſerted. This gave occaſion to a propoſition for a conference between nine doctors, on each ſide, to examine the reaſons of both. This conference was held the begining of April. But the Romaniſts, reflecting that they had undertaken more than they could anſwer, in thus bringing into queſtion the doctrines of their religion without being authoriſed by his Holineſs, refuſed to give their reaſons in writing, tho' that had been agreed. At laſt they plainly declared, it was not in their power to diſpute on points already decided (1). They had not been ſo ſcrupulous in the reign of Mary, becauſe then the ſucceſs of the conference was known previouſly. This gave the Proteſtants cauſe to triumph, and pretend that their adverſaries durſt not enter the liſts.

A conference on religion of no effect. Fox, Vol. III. p. 979. Burnet. Vol. II. p. 388. Stow.

To conclude what, at preſent, ſhall be advanced touching religion, I ſhall only add, that the reformation having been eſtabliſhed by public authority, of nine thouſand four hundred beneficed eccleſiaſtics in England, only fourteen biſhops (2), twelve archdeacons, fifteen heads of colleges, fifty canons, and about eighty parochial prieſts, choſe to quit their preferments rather than their creed. Their places being filled with Proteſtants, England became intirely reformed, very ſuddenly after having ſeen the Reformed expiring in the flames. It is now time to return to political affairs.

The number of clergymen who refuſe to comply with the reformation. Camden. Burnet. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 548, 562, 582.

While Philip had any hope of marrying Elizabeth, his plenipotentiaries, aſſembled with thoſe of England and France at Cateau in Cambreſis, inſiſted on the reſtitution of Calais to the crown of England. But when his expectations were diſappointed, by the change in England with regard to religion, he deſerted Elizabeth, and made a ſeparate peace, or at leaſt ſettled with France the principal articles. It is pretended that, in this treaty, by which France reſigned 198 places to Spain, or her allies, in exchange for three only, there was a ſecret article of a mutual promiſe between the two Kings to extirpate heretics. This done, the Spaniards from parties, as they were before, became mediators between France and England: but they acted ſo faintly, that it was plain, they had not much at heart Queen Elizabeth's concerns. Philip's defection obliged the Queen to conclude a peace on any terms, the continuation of this war being no way favorable to her affairs, or to the meaſures ſhe was now taking to introduce the reformation into England. By a treaty therefore, ſigned the ſecond of April, it was agreed, Remark on this article.

These are the expreſs words of the treaty, of which the French hiſtorians give us only the pretended meaning, by turning them after their own manner. Mezerai ſays, It was ſtipulated, that Henry ſhould either reſtore Calais and the other conqueſts, or if he liked it better, the ſum of five hundred thouſand crowns, which being refered to his option, he would, moſt undoubtedly, keep this place, which was the key of his kingdom.

Neither has father Daniel given us the very terms of the treaty, which perhaps he had never ſeen. He contents himſelf with relating the ſenſe, adding a certain explication which intirely changes the nature of the treaty. Elizabeth, ſays this hiſtorian, could not without giving offenſe to the Engliſh, make abſolute ſurrender of Calais to France. Beſide ſhe ſaw the King determined not to part with it; a middle way was therefore taken, which left this Prince in poſſeſſion of Calais for eight years, at the end of which he promiſed to reſtore it, on forfeiture of five hundred thouſand crowns to the Engliſh. That notwithſtanding this payment, which was to be made on a refuſal or delay of reſtitution, the Engliſh were allowed to uſe force for the recovery of Calais. By theſe laſt words he explains the ſenſe of thoſe in the original treaty. ——That whether the ſum was paid or not paid, the King of France and his ſucceſſors ſhould be bound to the reſtitution of Calais, as they ingaged by this treaty. This ſhews how we ought to be on our guard againſt the national partiality of hiſtorians. I ſhall add here upon this article, that Calais never was reſtored; that the five hundred thouſand crowns were never paid; and when Elizabeth demanded Calais, at the expiration of the term, the French court founded their refuſal on ſome generalities, and not on the treaty itſelf, as they might have done, ſuppoſing what theſe two hiſtorians have advanced.

Continuation of the treaty of Cateau.

Another article of the treaty was, that neither the King of France, nor the King and Queen of Scotland, nor the Queen of England, ſhould make any attempt againſt each other, directly or indirectly, in prejudice of the treaty. That if the Queen of England violated this article, the King of France, and the Queen of Scotland ſhould be freed from their ingagements, and then hoſtages and ſecurities be diſcharged. In like manner, if the violation came from the King of France, he ſhould be obliged to reſtore Calais, and the other places, as if the eight years were expired; and if he refuſed making reſtitution, the ſecurities and hoſtages ſhould ſtill remain ingaged.

That the fortifications of Aymouth, and all others made in Scotland ſince the treaty of Bologne, ſhould be demoliſhed.

That all the other pretenſions of the King of France, the King and Queen of Scotland, and the Queen of England, with all their exceptions, ſhould remain intire, in expectation that Providence would produce ſome happy occaſion of terminating them by a peace.

That none of the ſaid Princes and Princeſſes ſhould afford a retreat or protection to each other's rebels, but reciprocally ſurrender ſuch fugitives.

Treaty with Scotland. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 513.

The ſame day, was ſigned a treaty between the Queen of England and the King and Queen of Scotland, whereof theſe are the chief articles:

That neither of the parties ſhould attack any of thoſe domains now actually in the other's poſſeſſion, neither perſonally nor by others.

That they ſhould give no aid to attack each other's dominions to any one, in what degree of conſanguinity or affinity that perſon might be to them related, or whatever might be his quality.

That they ſhould not receive or entertain rebels, fugitives, malefactors, &c. Elizab. An' 1559.

That, within three months ſpace, the fortifications of Aymouth, and all others erected in Scotland ſince the treaty of 1549, ſhould be razed.

That all other mutual claims and pretenſions ſhould remain intire.

That in two months, commiſſioners ſhould be appointed on both ſides, to ſettle certain articles, concerning which the embaſſadors of France were not ſufficiently inſtructed.

Francis and Mary ratified this treaty the eighteenth of April; and the thirty-firſt of May the commiſſioners of the two kingdoms ſigned at Upſalinton, a ſecond treaty on the articles left undecided in the firſt. Ibid. p. 516, 526.

Elizabeth having concluded a peace with France and Scotland with more honor and facility than ſhe had reaſon to expect, flattered herſelf with the future injoyment of a perfect tranquility: but ſhe ſoon grew ſenſible of the ſmall cauſe ſhe had to triumph. Henry II had made peace with her, only becauſe Philip II, who had ingaged Mary his Queen in this war, was reſolved not to ſign the pacific treaty before Elizabeth's was alſo concluded. It little concerned Philip, whether ſhe found great advantages in the peace, or the King of France obſerved his ingagements with her, provided it appeared to the world that Spain had not deſerted England: this was all he deſired, and probably what facilitated the pacification. Henry II doubtleſs granted more than he ever deſigned to perform, as well to give his Catholic Majeſty this ſatisfaction, as to complete diſingaging him from the intereſt of England: nor was he long from making appear that he had no other intention.

Henry II orders the Dauphin and his Queen to aſſume the arms of England. Melvil. p. 23. Camden. Buchanan.

Embaſſadors from France being arrived at Bruſſels to ſee the peace ſworn, ſecretary Ardoy, who was there from the Dauphin King and Queen Dauphineſs, gave them the titles of "King and "Queen of Scotland, England, and Ireland." Elizabeth ſoon after underſtood that the King of France had ordered Francis and Mary to aſſume the ſame titles, and quarter the arms of England in their ſeal, plate and other moveables, that none might be ignorant of their pretenſions. * Throckmorton, the Engliſh embaſſador in France, complained of this uſurpation with great freedom, but the frivolous anſwer to his complaints plainly convinced him of the ſmall regard France had for his miſtreſs. Mezerai ſays, he was told, That this was only to follow the cuſtom of Germany, where the younger branches bore the title and arms of the chief of their family. Camden adds, that the court of France pretended, that all Princes and Princeſſes had a right to bear the arms of their houſe with a bar. But, beſide that Francis and Mary bore them without any ſuch diſtinction, they moreover aſſumed the title of King and Queen of England (1). In fine, the court of France, being preſſed upon this affair, anſwered the embaſſador, that the King and Queen of Scotland had only taken the arms of England to oblige Elizabeth to quit thoſe of France. To this Throckmorton replied, That twelve Kings of England had borne the arms and title of Kings of France, without being obliged by any treaty to quit them. But his reaſons were not heard, and notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances, Francis and Mary ſtill retained the title they had uſurped. Camden affirms, that conſtable Montmorency, by his arguments induced them to relinquiſh it; but aſſuredly he is miſtaken. Thus, tho' the Gallic court would not openly declare their ſentiments of Elizabeth, it was manifeſt ſhe was regarded as ſpurious, and the crown of England was pretended to be devolved on Mary. Accordingly Elizabeth ſuffered not herſelf to be deceived. She thenceforwards conſidered Mary as a dangerous rival, and her uncles, the Lorrain Princes, authors of this uſurpation, as her greateſt adverſaries. Henry II's death, which occurred ſoon after, inſtead of diſcouraging the deſign to ſeat Mary on the Engliſh throne, only gave it freſh vigor. The duke of Guiſe, and cardinal of Lorrain, governing all under Francis II, Henry II's ſucceſſor, never ceaſed inciting the young King to ſend forces into Scotland, to render himſelf maſter of that kingdom, and then attack Elizabeth from that quarter. But becauſe this project was founded on the preſent ſituation of the Scotiſh affairs, it is neceſſary to reſume the recital where I broke off in the year preceding.

Sequel of the Scotiſh affairs. Buchanan.

Very ſoon after the young Queen's nuptials with the Dauphin, the affairs of Scotland began to be terribly imbroiled. The Princes of Lorrain, having formed the deſign to attack England by Scotland, believed it impracticable 'till the King and Queen were rendered abſolute in their kingdom. They were ſenſible it would be difficult to perſuade the ſtates of Scotland to be the inſtruments of their ambition, in making war upon Elizabeth, in order to place England's crown on the head of their Queen. The number of Proteſtants was now ſo conſiderable in Scotland, that they were in a manner maſters in the ſtates aſſemblies; and conſequently it ſeemed utterly impoſſible to draw them into the project of dethroning a Proteſtant Queen who was eſtabliſhing their religion in England, to place on that throne a Popiſh Princeſs, who would thereby be inabled to exterminate the reformation in both kingdoms. It was therefore requiſite to deviſe ſome excuſe for ſending into Scotland a body of forces to ſtrengthen the Catholic party, who moſt apparently would be readier and more zealous to favor the enterpriſe.

Melvil, p. 23.

With this view it was that they obtained Henry II's expreſs order to the Queen-regent and D'Oyſel, commander of the French and Scotiſh forces in French pay, not to ſuffer in Scotland any other religion than the Roman Catholic (1). They eaſily foreſaw this order would there create diſturbances, and furniſh them with a pretext of ſending troops to Scotland.

Ibid.

The regent, on receipt of this order, began to execute it, by iſſuing a proclamation conformable to the will of his Gallic Majeſty, or rather of the two Princes his brothers, who, as will afterwards be ſeen, had not imparted to the King their whole project. The Proteſtants, in ſeveral deputations to the regent-Queen, repreſented to her the unſeaſonableneſs of rigor, conſidering their number: but ſhe would not give ear to any of their remonſtrances. At this time, the city of Perth, otherwiſe called St. John's Town, having openly imbraced the reformed religion, the regent ſummoned the ſtates to Sterling, and cited thither the reformed miniſters, in order to baniſh them the realm by a ſolemn decree (2). They appeared at Sterling to defend their cauſe, being attended with infinite crouds of unarmed people, who went to aſſiſt them in their defenſe, agreeably to the cuſtom of Scotland (3). The regent, aſtoniſhed at the ſight, intreated John Areſkin to prevail with the multitudes to retire, promiſing that nothing ſhould be decreed in the ſtates againſt the miniſters. Areſkin ſucceeded, and the miniſters, with all their attendants, withdrew: but they were no ſooner gone, than they were condemned for non-appearance, according to the citation. Areſkin was ſo inraged to be made the Queen's inſtrument to deceive the Proteſtants, that he reſolved to be revenged. For this purpoſe, he went to the nobility of Strathern, Angus and Mernis, who were aſſembled on hearing what paſſed at Sterling, and perſuaded them to take arms.

Buchanan. Burnet.

This news being brought to Perth, the miniſter Knox, a very famous orator, preached a ſermon to animate the people: which ended, while the chief citizens were at dinner, the rabble broke into the churches, threw down all images, and utterly deſtroyed the monaſtery of the Carthuſians. The inhabitants of Cuper inſtantly imitated the example ſet them by thoſe of Perth. The regent, inſenſed at finding her edict contemned, and willing to prevent the conſequences of this diſobedience, determined on chaſtiſing the inhabitants of Perth. To this end, ſhe aſſembled ſome forces and, attended by the earls of Argyle and Athol, marched directly thitherwards: but approaching the town, ſhe was informed, the earl of Glencarne was incamped in the neigborhood ſeven thouſand ſtrong. This intelligence prevailed on her to offer him and his partiſans certain conditions, which were accepted. Among other articles it was ſtipulated, That the Scotiſh forces on both ſides ſhould be ſent quite away, and the French removed at a certain diſtance from Perth (4): that the Queen ſhould be reſpectfully received into the city, and ſuffered to reſide therein ſome days, provided ſhe attempted not any novelties: and finally, that the differences concerning religion ſhould be refered to the ſtates deciſion. The confederates having diſmiſſed their forces, the regent repaired to Perth, and entered, with ſome Scotiſh troops in the pay of France, which was, by the confederates, conſidered as a violation of the treaty (5). But this was not all they had cauſe to complain of. The regent reſtored the maſs in Perth, and, reſolving to make it a place of arms, left there a gariſon.

Melvil. Buchanan.

Hence the earl of Argyle and James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's and King James V's natural ſon, took occaſion to declare againſt the regent, and levy forces to ſupport the Proteſtants. Theſe perſonages had ſome time before imbraced the reformation, tho' hitherto they had adhered to the regent. Soon after, the inhabitants of St. Andrew's and ſome other towns, declaring themſelves Proteſtants, commited ſeveral diſorders in the Popiſh churches. Her Majeſty hereupon aſſembled a band of troops, compoſed of two thouſand French, and a thouſand Scots, and, giving the command to the duke of Chateleraut, ſent him to chaſtiſe the inhabitants of Cuper, who next after thoſe of Perth had made a like declaration. But the duke hearing the confederates were marching with ſuperior forces to give him battle, thereof informed the regent, who was then at Falkland. She tried at firſt to amuſe them with new propoſitions, 'till ſhe could reinforce her army. But the confederates, perceiving her artifice, marched to Perth, and in a very few days poſſeſſed themſelves of that city. Afterwards, Scone, Sterling and Linlithgo, were by them ſecured, and, as their army daily increaſed, the regent and D'Oyſel were obliged to withdraw to Dunbar.

Melvil, p. 25. Thuanus.

Mean while, the regent had writ to the court of France, that James prior of St. Andrew's was the principal author of the troubles of Scotland, and that, being natural ſon of James V, he deſigned to ſeize the crown. The Lorrain Princes, brothers to the regent, laid hold on this occaſion to inſinuate to Henry II, that religion was not concerned in the troubles of Scotland, and was only made the pretenſe to wreſt that crown from the Dauphin and his royal conſort. By this inſinuation, they had inſpired his ſaid Gallic Majeſty with the reſolution of ſending a good army into Scotland, and he had already commenced his levies in Germany. But conſtable Montmorency, having diſcovered theſe Princes aim to ingage King Henry in projects the execution whereof would not be very eaſy, prevailed with him to proceed no farther, 'till he was more particularly informed of the troubles in Scotland. The buſineſs was only to find a perſon in whom the King could confide. The conſtable offered, for this purpoſe, James Melvil, a Scotiſh gentleman, his domeſtic, and gave him his inſtructions in the King's preſenſe. Theſe inſtructions were, as he ſays himſelf in his memoirs, "That "the King had, by the cardinal of Lorrain, "been informed, that James Stuart prior of St. "Andrew's pretended, under color of religion, to "uſurp the Scotiſh realm himſelf; and that his "Majeſty deſired to know certainly, if this was the "ſourſe whence the troubles of that kingdom "flowed; or whether Stuart was moved to take "arms only for conſcience ſake, in defenſe of his "religion, his perſon, his dependents and aſſo-"ciates. In the firſt caſe, the King was reſolved "to hazard his crown, and all he poſſeſſed, rather "than the Queen his daughter-in-law ſhould be "deprived of her right; and he reſolved to ſend "forces into Scotland for that effect, tho' he would "gladly ſhun that trouble, if any way poſſible. "That in the ſecond caſe, if it was only religion "which moved the Scots, the King would not "have any concern in their affairs, but commited "their ſouls to God, for he had difficulty enough "to rule the conſciences of his own ſubjects: and "it was the obedience due to their lawful Queen "which the King deſired. That finally, he could "not perſuade himſelf, that the Scots had riſen "againſt the regent without cauſe, and therefore "deſired to know if the regent had broke her "word with them; if ſo, by whom, and at whoſe "inſtance. That if D'Oyſel, who was reported "to be choleric, haſty and too paſſionate, was "not acceptable to the Scots, he would ſend in his "room ſome other, who he hoped ſhould pleaſe "them." This ſhews, that the King had been ill informed by the cardinal of Lorrain, to ingage him to ſend an army into Scotland, and of this, probably, the conſtable's meaning was to give him a demonſtration, by the report Melvil was to make him. In effect Melvil, having had a conference with the Queen-regent at Falkland, and afterwards with the prior of St. Andrew's, reported to the King, that the prior was ſo far from any thought of aſpiring to the crown, that he was ready to baniſh himſelf perpetually from Scotland, on the firſt orders from his Majeſty.

Buchanan. Melvil.

Henry II being dead before Melvil returned to Paris, (1), the confederate Scots prepoſterouſly imagined, there was no farther danger, and moſt of them returned to their homes. The regent and D'Oyſel being thereof informed, reſolved to improve this negligence, and marched with ſome troops to Edinburg, hoping to ſurpriſe thoſe who remained there: but the duke of Chateleraut and the earl of Morton, knowing the confederates were arming again with all poſſible diligence, waited on the regent, and perſuaded her to conſent to a truce, from the twenty-fourth of July to the tenth of January. This truce was equally neceſſary to both parties. The confederates wanted to put themſelves in a defenſible poſture; and the regent hoped that, in this interval, ſhe ſhould receive a powerful aid from her ſon-in-law the King of France. Accordingly, at the Lorrain Princes ſollicitation, he immediately ſent her a thouſand foot, with promiſe of a more conſiderable ſupply.

Elizab. An' 1559.

During theſe tranſactions, the earl of Arran, ſon to the duke of Chateleraut, being at the court of France, and receiving notice that he was to be arreſted on ſome pretenſe, made his eſcape, and came for Scotland. As he was, after the duke his father, next heir to the young Queen, he believed, upon ſome well or ill-grounded advices, that the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain deſigned to ſecure and perhaps murder him, for fear, if the Queen died, he ſhould aſcend the throne; for he had declared himſelf a Proteſtant. He was no ſooner in Scotland than he gained his father to ſide with the confederates, who put him at their head.

Buchanan. Thuanus.

Mean time, the regent and D'Oyſel were buſy in fortifying Leith, and ſtoring it with all ſorts of proviſions, deſigning to make it a place of arms, and there to wait for the ſupplies expected from France. The confederates pretended this to be a breach of the truce, whether they proceeded on a general maxim, or on any particular articles of the late treaty. However this be, after ſome fruitleſs complaints to the regent, they aſſembled their forces, and marched to beſiege Leith: but as they ſuffered themſelves to be amuſed for ſome time, they came too late and, finding the place in a ſtate of defenſe, deſiſted from the ſiege. Soon after the regent, having received a new ſupply of two thouſand men, commanded by La Broſſe, continued the fortifications of Leith, with greater application than ever. The confederates once more deſired her to give over the work; but in vain. As ſhe ſaw herſelf ſufficiently ſtrong, ſhe only anſwered by ſending a herald, with order to lay down their arms. Their indignation to be thus deceived by the regent induced them finally to publiſh, that they would treat as enemies all who obeyed her orders: but they were but little able to make good this bravado. The regent, knowing they were at Edinburg, in ſmall number, marched with her whole force, early in November, and by her unlooked for arrival ſo ſurpriſed them, that they deſerted Edinburg, and retired to Sterling. When there, they diſpatched away to Queen Elizabeth, William Maitland. to ſollicit her Majeſty's aſſiſtance; as being ſenſible that without it they muſt inevitably ſuccumb. In effect, the French troops continuing to purſue them, obliged them alſo to quit Sterling, and retire to the mountains, where they ſeparated into two bodies, to imbaraſs their enemies, who allowed them no reſpite. Some time after, they received letters from Maitland, giving them hopes of ſucceſs in his negociation. This was the riſe of the Scotiſh troubles, whereon I have been forced to inlarge, the better to ſhew what concerns Elizabeth was to have in them, ſince ſhe was their ſole object. As this is a material article in this Queen's hiſtory, and as, on the knowledge of the deſigns formed againſt her repoſe, ſhe regulated her conduct, I ought to ſupport this truth by the teſtimony of a French hiſtorian, who cannot be ſuſpected in this affair. Father Daniel, under the reign of Francis II, thus expreſſes himſelf.

Hiſt. de France. Vol. VIII.

"I obſerved that, before the conſpiracy of "Amboiſe broke out, La Renaudie had been ſent "by the admiral into England, to ingage Elizabeth to make a diverſion in Scotland, while the "Calviniſtical party revolted in France; and ſhe "too well knew her intereſt to neglect ſuch a "favorable opportunity of kindling or fomenting "a civil war in the two realms. Whatever care "ſhe had taken to bridle the Catholics of her kingdom, ſhe was ever apprehenſive of a party forming againſt her in favor of the Queen of France, "who deported herſelf as heireſs of the crown of "England, and had quartered its Arms with thoſe "of Scotland, when ſhe was only Queen Dauphineſs; and, if France and Scotland had remained in tranquillity, England was in danger "of being at once attacked from thoſe two different quarters, and diſturbed at home by the "ſtill-numerous followers of the ancient religion."

Hence may be ſeen, what was the Lorrain Princes drift, in ſending over to Scotland a French army. It was to preſerve the peace of that kingdom, that is, render it abſolutely ſubject to France, in order to attack England from that quarter. This is a particular which muſt be ever remembered; otherwiſe Elizabeth's hiſtory is not readily to be comprehended. Let us next touch on the affairs of France.

Affairs of France. Mezerai.

Henry II, having concluded a peace with Spain, determined on abſolutely relinquiſhing the Italian affairs, and applying himſelf ſolely to his project of uniting England, Scotland and Ireland to the Gallic monarchy. His haſte in making his ſon the Dauphin, and the Scotiſh Queen his daughter-in-law, aſſume the title of King and Queen of England, immediately on concluding the peace, is a clear evidence of his having the matter in view, tho' he was not yet perhaps reſolved on the method of its execution. Elizabeth, who was on the throne of England, was but a woman; and might be conſidered as a baſtard: ſhe had no ally: had lately made many enemies among her ſubjects, by her innovations in religion: the King of Spain no longer concerned himſelf with her affairs; and the Pope wiſhed nothing ſo ardently as to dethrone her, and place in her ſtead a Catholic Princeſs. All theſe circumſtances doubtleſs gave Henry hopes of ſucceſs in his deſign; to effect which, he was to make parade of a fervent zeal for the Catholic religion, to gain its profeſſors, Princes and ſubjects, to his intereſts. The perſecution, renewed in France immediately after the Peace of Cateau, ſlowed perhaps as much from this as any other cauſe; tho' Henry's own natural diſpoſition, the Pope's ſollicitations, the ſuggeſtions of the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain, and the ſecret treaty made with Spain, had but too large a ſhare in that tragedy.

Death of Henry II.

This Prince was ſnatched hence, on the tenth of July, in the midſt of his vaſt projects, by a death ſudden and tragical (1), leaving for ſucceſſor a young Prince, of himſelf quite unable to govern. The two Princes of Lorrain, the young Queen's uncles, were immediately charged with the whole adminiſtration under the new reign. They inſtantly removed from court conſtable Montmorency, and recalled the cardinal of Tournon, the reformation's avowed enemy. When the court affairs were ſettled, their next care was to erect certain tribunals, ſtiled Ardentes, for adjudging Proteſtants to the flames. This inevitably reduced the Reformed to a neceſſity of either ſubmiting to burn one by one, or of taking arms in their own defenſe, and ſo furniſhing their enemies with the deſired pretenſe to extirpate them all at once. On the other hand, they ſent into Scotland two thouſand men, under conduct of La Broſſe, with orders to join the Catholics of England for dethroning Elizabeth. Thus did their boundleſs ambition ingage a young Prince, not complete ſeventeen years old, to throw his own kingdom into a flame, and withal to undertake the conqueſt of England, which of all countries in the univerſe is the moſt difficult to be conquered.

At the ſame time appeared, alſo in the Netherlands, ſeeds of troubles, which were not long ripening, and which it will not be improper to mention, in order to ſhew their origin.

Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius.

Charles V always greatly affected the Netherland provinces (being born there *) and had governed them with much lenity. Indeed, after the victory of Pavia, he had projected changing their form of government, and of uniting the ſeventeen provinces into one ſtate, dependent on the Spaniſh crown. He was thereto incited by the Spaniards, who would have found their advantage in his being abſolute in theſe provinces, where his authority was much limited by their privileges. But after mature deliberation, he relinquiſhed this project, whether to avoid the violences wherewith the execution muſt infallibly have been attended, or becauſe he believed it impracticable, by reaſon of the various laws and cuſtoms of theſe provinces, each of which had long been a ſeparate ſtate.

* At Gaunt.

Philip II, his ſon and ſucceſſor, reſumed much the ſame deſign, and reſolved to rule independent of the laws and privileges inceſſantly alledged by theſe ſtates. To this he added the project of extirpating the Proteſtants, then very numerous in that country. For this purpoſe, he obtained from the Roman court the erection of diverſe new archbiſhopricks and biſhopricks, to the great prejudice of the abbots, part of whoſe revenues were to be given to theſe new ſees. But beſide the intereſt of the Proteſtants and abbots, there was another particular of general concern. Philip had put Spaniſh gariſons into the chief cities, contrary to the privileges of the provinces, and thereby evidently manifeſted his deſign of reducing them to a ſtate of bondage. Finally, on his departure for Spain, September 1559, he commited the government of the whole Netherlands to his ſiſter (2), Margaret ducheſs of Parma, to the great diſſatisfaction of William de Naſſau, Prince of Orange, and of count Egmont, both who had aſpired to that dignity. But what completed their diſguſt and truly irritated them, was his leaving with the go-

This memorable lady, on more than one account, merits a place among our annotations. Under her adminiſtration, commenced the tragedies which gave riſe to that majeſtic figure the United Netherland Provinces have, for near a century and half, made not only in Europe, but in every quarter of the univerſe. The Spaniards, and in particular the Caſtilians, ſtill commemorate her as their introductor into Italy, their nation being ſcarce known there, more eſpecially in Tuſcany, Parma and Plaſenza, 'till her Imperial ſire had matched her into the Medicis and Farneſe families. State of affairs in England. An' 1560.

To well comprehend the ſequel of this reign, it is abſolutely requiſite to have a perfect idea of the ſituation of affairs in England, as well with regard to the Queen's perſon, as to the Engliſh themſelves and other people. The wonder of this reign conſiſts not in the remarkable tranſactions occuring in England while Elizabeth was on the throne, but in the tranquillity ſhe procured her ſubjects amidſt the ſecret and open attacks of her's and their enemies, both at home and abroad. To underſtand therefore the motives of Elizabeth's conduct, and the maxims whereby ſhe eſtabliſhed her government, a reader muſt be diſtinctly acquainted with theſe enemies, their characters, their views and intereſt. Hence alſo will be ſeen and admired the addreſs wherewith ſhe extricated herſelf from all the imbaraſments and ſnares to which ſhe was continually expoſed. For this purpoſe it muſt be obſerved, that her right to the crown was ever, either openly or tacitly, conteſted; that the Papiſts in general, conſidering her only as a Queen de facto, believed they might with a ſafe conſcience aſſiſt in dethroning her, whenever any favorable occaſion ſhould offer. As the uncertainty of her right was the baſis whereon her adverſaries grounded all their proceedings, I cannot but make ſome addition to what has been already advanced on this ſubject.

The parliament of England, conſiſting of the King and both houſes, which repreſent the whole nation, there is no Engliſhman who is not ſubject to its decrees, were it only for this reaſon, that every man is preſumed to have given thereto his conſent, either in perſon, or by his repreſentative. On this foundation Mary and Elizabeth aſcended the throne; I mean, in virtue of a parliamentary ſtatute impowering their father to ſettle the ſucceſſion. But it may be doubted, whether foreign Princes, concerned in ſuch acts of parliament, are obliged to the ſame ſubmiſſion, when they believe them manifeſtly unjuſt to themſelves. I ſhall not undertake to decide this queſtion, which is more uſually determined by arms than by laws. I ſhall only remark, that formerly Edward III did not think himſelf obliged to abide by the deciſion of the French nation, which had placed Philip of Valois on the throne. However this be, Mary Queen of France and Scotland believed herſelf injured, as well by the act impowering Henry VIII to interrupt the order of ſucceſſion according to his humor, as by that Prince's will. She alledged, that neither King nor parliament had any right to place on the throne two daughters declared illegitimate by ſolemn acts, and ſtill leſs to overlook the poſterity of Henry VII's eldeſt daughter, even without aſſigning any reaſon, and place in the line of the ſucceſſion baſtards, and the younger daughter's children. To theſe two grievances anſwer was made, that the Engliſh, in acknowledging ſucceſſively Mary and Elizabeth for Queens of England, had not followed Henry VIII's caprice, but the order of nature and law of ſucceſſion; that this Prince's caprice lay not in placing his two daughters next his ſon Edward, but in his intention to exclude theſe two Princeſſes actually born in matrimony: that, in reſtoring them to their due place, Henry corrected his error, and left no room for any alteration: that the not revoking the ſentence of divorce againſt Ann Boleyn, and the ſubſequent act againſt Elizabeth, was not without good reaſons, and at moſt was merely a defect of formality, which altered not the thing itſelf. As to Mary's ſecond grievance, that Henry had not mentioned his eldeſt ſiſter's iſſue, it muſt be acknowledged, that the generality of the Engliſh were convinced of the injuſtice of ſuch procedure. But as the caſe which might breed a diſpute on this ſubject did not yet offer, this point was left undetermined, in hopes of the Queen's marriage, and her having children to ſucceed her.

Elizab. An' 1560.

Let us now proceed to another reflection, with regard to foreign Potentates. Mary, Henry VIII's eldeſt daughter, aſcended the throne without the leaſt oppoſition from any foreign Prince; whereas, on her deceaſe, the principal Sovereigns of Europe uſed indeavors to wreſt the ſcepter from Elizabeth. It is not difficult to aſſign many natural cauſes of the different conduct of the Princes with regard to theſe two Queens. The firſt is that, at Mary's acceſſion to the Engliſh crown, there was not a Prince in Europe who could with any color diſpute her right. Indeed the young Scotiſh Queen was in France, and deſtined for the Dauphin; but was not yet married. This marriage was only projected, and could not be executed ſome years, by reaſon of the parties non-age: but ſuppoſing Henry II ſhould have then aſſerted the ſaid young Queen's claim, he muſt have drawn on himſelf all the forces of the Emperor, and England. The ſecond cauſe is no leſs natural, namely, that the Roman Catholics could not by their principles, conteſt Mary's right without a renunciation of the Papal authority, ſince the diſpenſation for Henry VIII's marriage with Catherine of Aragon was granted by a Pope. But Henry II was very far from any ſuch thought; and as for the Emperor Charles V, he was particularly concerned to ſupport the title of Mary, who was his couſin-german: as for the Roman Pontif, he maintained his own rights in ſupporting Mary's. Laſtly, as Mary was zealous for her religion, the Pope, Emperor and King of France found a great advantage in this zeal. The Pope expected to ſee the Catholic religion reſtored by her means in England. The Emperor immediately projected her marriage with his ſon Philip: beſide a Catholic Queen in England removed all apprehenſions of that aid the German Proteſtants might receive from the Engliſh; in a word, his zeal for Papiſm gave him the ſatisfaction of beholding a very great likelihood of England's being ſoon forced into the pale of the Roman church. For the ſame reaſon, Henry II, who in France burned his reformed ſubjects, could not but be pleaſed to ſee them deprived of that protection they might have expected from England, had that kingdom continued Proteſtant. Thus all conſpired to render Mary's reign peaceable and ſecure. It doubtleſs was alſo this which induced that Queen to carry the perſecution againſt the Proteſtants to ſuch a height, well knowing they could have no hopes of aſſiſtance from abroad.

But when, after Mary's deceaſe, Elizabeth mounted the throne, there was a change in the intereſts of the Princes, as often happens by the death of a Sovereign. The Empire and Spain were no longer under one and the ſame Prince's domination. The Dauphin had eſpouſed the Scotiſh Queen, and by that marriage acquired a claim to England, which he had not before: beſide, the duke of

Guiſe

ELIZAB. AN' 1560.

Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain were become more powerful in the Gallic court, by the abſenſe of conſtable Montmorency, who was priſoner in the Netherlands. After Henry II's death, they became ſtill more powerful, and by their conduct evidenced, that they had nothing more at heart than raiſing the Queen their niece to the Engliſh throne. Neither could Elizabeth doubt it, ſince ſhe ſaw Francis II, and his conſort Mary, ſtill uſurp the arms of England, which they ſeemed to have taken at firſt only in obedience to Henry II's injunctions. On the other hand, Philip II, who had no longer any hope of eſpouſing Elizabeth, had intirely deſerted England's intereſts, and appeared not any way diſpoſed to ſupport that kingdom, which was become Proteſtant. Laſtly, the Roman Pontif beheld his authority baniſhed England, and no hope of gaining Elizabeth, whoſe chief concern it evidently was to maintain what ſhe had done. Thus France, Spain and the court of Rome, not only had no reaſon to incline them to ſupport Elizabeth, but it was even their intereſt to act quite the reverſe. It is very true, Philip II would not willingly have ſeen England and Ireland poſſeſſed by the King of France; but he would not have been ſorry France ſhould ingage to conquer England, ſince from that enterpriſe, which he rightly judged extremely difficult, he would have the ſatisfaction of being a ſpectator while the two powers moſt capable of incommoding him were weakening each other: beſide, conſidering the ardency of his zeal for the Catholic religion, and his projects in relation to the Netherlands, he would have greatly rejoiced to behold thoſe two kingdoms out of condition to aſſiſt the ſaid provinces, which already bore their yoke with impatience. As for the new Emperor, if Elizabeth had nothing to fear, ſhe had at leaſt nothing to hope from him. With regard to the Proteſtants of Germany, they then injoyed a tranquillity which they would not willingly have diſturbed on acconnt of aſſiſting England: they had, in Henry VIII's time, experienced that, under pretext of maintaining their religion, it was deſigned to ingage them in a war by no means agreeable to their intereſts; wherefore, content with their preſent condition, they were not willing to be oppreſſed for ſupporting the rights of Elizabeth, tho' otherwiſe they were highly pleaſed to ſee a Proteſtant Queen ſeated on the throne of England.

I have already mentioned in what ſituation were the Scotiſh affairs. Elizabeth was ſo far from expecting any aſſiſtance from Scotland, that ſhe ſaw herſelf indiſpenſibly neceſſitated to ſupport the Proteſtant party there, well knowing it to be Francis II's intention to attack her from that quarter. Beſide the two thouſand men already ſent the regent, another more conſiderable reinforcement was preparing in France, to be conducted into Scotland by marquis D'Elbeuf (1). This ſufficiently manifeſted that the Gallic court, ſenſible of the difficulty of attacking England by ſea, were reſolved to puſh the war on the northern frontiers, by a junction of their forces with thoſe of Scotland. Thus the French court's deſign to ſubdue the Scotiſh male-contents was only the firſt ſtep whereby they hoped to attain the conqueſt of England.

Camden.

On the other ſide, Ireland occaſioned Elizabeth no leſs uneaſineſs. That iſland was inhabited by natural Iriſh, and Engliſh families tranſplanted thither ſince its conqueſt by Henry II. A viceroy, or lord-lieutenant, governed there in the Queen's name; but his authority was very far from being ſo regarded as to keep the Iriſh in ſubmiſſion. They had among them many grandees, men of great power, who indeed from the teeth outwards owned the Queen's ſovereignty, but believed they had a right to do themſelves juſtice for the wrongs they pretended to have received. They commited hoſtilities on each other, little regarding either remonſtrances or orders from the lord-lieutenant, who, having but few Engliſh troops, was not in a condition to make himſelf feared. Whenever there was any preſſing occaſion to chaſtiſe a rebellion, or prevent the ſtrong from oppreſſing the weak, freſh forces were to be ſent over from England: but, as this could not be done without expenſe, very often it was not determined 'till the laſt extremity; ſo, moſt of the lieutenants finding themſelves deſtitute of means to force obedience, were glad to connive at the exceſſes and violences of the great, for fear of unſeaſonably expoſing the royal authority: they contented themſelves with filling their purſes while they held the imploy, and left their ſucceſſors the care of repreſſing the inſolence of the Iriſh. This conduct had rendered the nobles of that country ſo intractable and aſſuming, that they acknowledged the royal authority no farther than it was neceſſary to protect them againſt their enemies. Beſide that innate averſion the Iriſh bore the Engliſh, whoſe deportment towards them helped not to gain their affection, there was at this juncture another motive which contributed to increaſe this averſion, namely, the change lately made by Elizabeth in religion. The attachment thoſe iſlanders had for the Roman See was proportionable to their ignorance, which was extreme. This diſpoſed them to liſten to the ſollicitations of the Romiſh emiſſaries, who were continually inciting them againſt the government. Elizabeth was therefore obliged to keep her eye conſtantly fixed on the tranſactions of Ireland, being no ſtranger to that credit the Pope, her adverſary, had in that iſland.

It remains now to examine how the Engliſh themſelves ſtood diſpoſed towards Elizabeth. When her ſaid Majeſty was determined on re-eſtabliſhing the reformation, her firſt care was to change the magiſtrates in cities, towns and counties, and fill their places with Proteſtants; which done, ſhe called a parliament, the members whereof were, as near as poſſible, men anſwerably to her deſires. This parliament revived all Edward VI's laws relating to religion. Theſe laws, again eſtabliſhed, were by the new magiſtrates care and vigilance punctually obſerved: ſo, a few months after Mary's deceaſe, the public exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion was not leſs criminal than the exerciſe of the Proteſtant had been in the laſt reign. The clergy, who refuſed obedience to theſe new laws, were deprived of their benefices, and the vacancies ſupplied by zealous Proteſtants. To ſay all in a word, the reformation roſe under Elizabeth, juſt as Popery had done under Mary; only with this difference, that Elizabeth put not to death any perſon on account of religion. We are not however to imagine that this external change produced a real one in every heart. Very few implicitly obey their Sovereigns in point of religion. Thoſe who were, under Mary, very bigoted Papiſts, remained ſo under Elizabeth; as thoſe who ſincerely imbraced the reformation under Edward VI, continued in Mary's reign cordially reformed: the out-ſide alone underwent alteration. If it is therefore conſidered, that all the changes in religion under this and the foregoing reigns, had been made in the ſame manner, it will not be difficult to comprehend, that the Romaniſts were ſtill very numerous in the kingdom. Little more than twenty years had paſſed ſince the reformation commenced, and in this interval the public worſhip had been four times changed. Now it is improbable, that a whole nation ſhould ſo frequently change their opinions according to the caprice of the governors, tho' outwardly they ſubmit to public authority. It is certain, the number of Roman Catholics in England was very great, even after Elizabeth had eſtabliſhed the reformation, tho' the Reformed were probably ſtill more numerous. It is therefore natural to imagine, that all who perſiſted in adhering to the old creed were Elizabeth's ſecret adverſaries; that they wiſhed a re-eſtabliſhment of the ancient religion, and were diſpoſed to imbrace all opportunities to place on the throne a Romaniſt. Nor was it one of the leaſt of Elizabeth's cares to watch her own ſubjects.

Elizabeth's maxims of government.

Let us briefly recapitulate what has been advanced. Elizabeth had for enemies, France, the Scotiſh Queen, the Pope, and all the Catholic Powers. For tho' Philip II had not yet declared himſelf, ſhe knew he was not her friend, and the ſequel clearly proved it. On the other hand, ſhe had the Iriſh, and a great part of her Engliſh ſubjects to guard againſt, without having one ally to aſſiſt her. She was therefore to ſeek in herſelf, in her prudence, in her good conduct, and in her own ſubjects, the aſſiſtance ſhe would vainly have ſought elſewhere. To obtain ſpeedily and willingly the aid ſhe foreſaw would be frequently wanted, ſhe had but one way, and that was to make herſelf beloved by her people. Accordingly, this was the predominant maxim of her conduct. Happily for this Princeſs, her heart and mind were thereto ſo aptly diſpoſed, that ſhe never once deviated from a rule ſo neceſſary: wherefore it may be affirmed, that no Sovereign of England was ever more ſincerely beloved by his people than Elizabeth. But to demonſtrate this elogy not to be groundleſs, it requires our being ſomewhat more circumſtantial on this topic. Certain it is that the number of her truly Proteſtant ſubjects greatly ſurpaſſed that of the Papiſts. What therefore could ſhe do better than to favor the Proteſtant religion, eſpecially, as being herſelf of that perſuaſion, ſhe could unreluctantly act ſo conformably to her own intereſts? Another particular which powerfully contributes towards procuring a Sovereign the affection of his people, is ſo to manage the treaſury that he be not conſtrained to burden them with needleſs impoſts. No Prince had ever this quality in greater perfection than Elizabeth; nay, ſhe carried ſo far this œconomy, that ſhe ſometimes gave her own miniſters occaſion to tax her with avarice. However this be, her expenſes were ſo well regulated, that ſhe was never ſeen to ſquander away her revenues on favorites, or expend them on matters of no utility. Nevertheleſs, this frugal diſpoſition, whether owing to nature or policy, prevented not her being even profuſe of her treaſures when ſhe judged it neceſſary. France, Spain and Scotland experienced, in their turns, how well ſhe knew to be laviſh of her gold and ſilver. Her people had ſuch opinion of her good management that, thro' the whole courſe of her reign, ſhe was never once denied by parliament what ſupplies ſhe demanded, or complained of by her ſubjects for the taxes wherewith they were charged. She had alſo another quality which greatly indeared her to the Engliſh: ſhe would not by her miniſters be induced to beſtow honors or imploys on perſons undeſerving; being of nothing more apprehenſive, than to render contemptible dignities deſtined for the recompenſe of virtue and merit. By which prudent conduct ſhe avoided diſobliging men who might have aſpired to honors, had they ſeen them beſtowed on others of no greater worth than themſelves: this was a maxim whence ſhe ſcarce ever receded during the whole courſe of her reign. Finally, ſhe imployed her conſtant indeavors that juſtice ſhould be impartially adminiſtered: her chief favorites taſted the effects of her ſeverity when they abuſed her goodneſs, and deviated from their duty. Moſt undoubtedly, her great intereſt to be beloved by her people induced her to imploy all poſſible means to attain that important advantage: but it cannot be, as ſome have hence infered, that her whole conduct was mere diſſimulation, ſince it is not at all impoſſible for peoples inclinations to tally with their intereſts. Elizabeth had a true regard for the reformed religion, and her intereſt required her to ſupport it to the utmoſt extent of her power. She was naturally a very excellent œconomiſt, and ſuch was the ſituation of her affairs, that never Prince had more neceſſity to be ſo. As herſelf poſſeſſed real merit, ſhe eſteemed it in others; and therefore could never reſolve to confer dignities on men who had not merited them. In fine, had ſhe been never ſo little remiſs with reſpect to juſtice, ſhe would have been in danger of being deſpiſed on account of her ſex, and of ſeeing the grandees becoming by little and little too licentious.

Elizab. An' 1560.

Such were the chief methods uſed by Queen Elizabeth to gain the affection of her ſubjects. Their love was ſo neceſſary that ſhe had no other reſourſe. Without it, her reign would, probably, have been very unhappy, conſidering the number and quality of her enemies. The reader therefore is to conſider moſt of her actions, as flowing from the maxim ſhe had preſcribed to herſelf, to neglect nothing which might procure the affection of her people.

There was alſo another maxim which no leſs influenced her conduct than this I have mentioned. She found herſelf menaced from every quarter. The Pope, France, and afterwards Spain, never ceaſed their open or ſecret attacks. It was not without reaſon ſhe dreaded that all theſe powers would unite to her ruin. In this belief, ſhe labored ſtrenuouſly to cheriſh the troubles of the neighboring ſtates, and particularly of France, Scotland, and the Netherlands, that her adverſaries, being buſied at home, might be leſs able to invade her. I ſhall not pretend to decide, whether this way of defenſe againſt enemies ſo powerful and dangerous, was agreeable to the rules of juſtice. It cannot however be denied, that this was excellent policy, and that her own ſecurity jnſtified this method, as ſhe had no other to divert their attacks. Accordingly, ſhe made frequent uſe of this maxim, as will appear hereafter.

Different opinions concerning Elizabeth.

I thought it neceſſary to prepare my reader for the ſequel of this reign by theſe reflections, which are ſolely deſigned to ſuſpend in his mind the prejudices inſpired by the hiſtorians of all nations and religions, for and againſt this renowned Queen. It is no ſmall difficulty to fix the judgment, amidſt all the contrarieties which occur in the writers who treat of this Princeſs. Some have conſidered her as the moſt accompliſhed Queen the world ever beheld: not one blemiſh to be found in her; all her actions were the reſult of prudence, juſtice and equity, and had no other motive than God's glory, and her peoples felicity: they have pretended, that her love for her ſubjects was ſo ardent, that ſhe forgot her own intereſt, and meditated ſolely on the means of making them happy: not content to excuſe ſome of her actions which merit reprehenſion, they have even, in ſome meaſure ſanctified them, by inſinuating, that they were the effects of her zeal for the glory of God, and the Proteſtant religion. Others have aſperſed her with all the calumnies could poſſibly be deviſed. According to theſe, ſhe exceeded in cruelty and barbarity the moſt exquiſite tyrants. She was (they ſay) deceitful even in the ſuperlative degree, and her whole conduct was one continued diſſimulation, from the begining to

to the end of her reign, notwithſtanding her outwardly affecting a ſhew of virtue and piety. To theſe accuſations concerning her public adminiſtration, they have added horrid calumnies on her private life. They have repreſented her as a diſſolute woman, who conſtantly refuſed to marry, in order more freely to continue her leud practiſes. To efface both theſe impreſſions, and incline the readers, if religious prejudices will ſuffer them, to ſuſpend their judgment, I have previouſly ſhewn the motives of her conduct, and the maxims by which ſhe was, and, with reſpect to policy only, ought to have been governed. Her principal aim was to ſecure a tottering crown and, to ſucceed, ſhe followed the above-obſerved methods. Is it to be thought ſtrange that, on certain occaſions, ſhe ſomewhat over-acted her tenderneſs for her people, wherein lay her only ſupport? But it would be juſt cauſe of wonder, that by ſuch irregularity of life, and other exceſſes ſhe is taxed with ſhe would have acted ſo directly contrary to what alone could procure her ſubjects love and eſteem, whereof ſhe ſtood in ſuch need. This may, I preſume, ſuffice to diſpel ſome of thoſe clouds by which her reputation has been obfuſcated. On the other hand, as ſhe ſaw herſelf aſſaulted from all parts by potent adverſaries, who were inceſſantly indeavoring to infuſe a ſpirit of rebellion into her ſubjects, when we ſhall ſee her fomenting the troubles of Scotland, and aſſiſting the French Hugonots, and the Flemiſh male-contents, it will be eaſily known to what this conduct is owing, notwithſtanding the adulations of certain of her admirers. Let but the two maxims I have mentioned be applied to her actions, and remember the neceſſity of her always having them in view, ſcarce any part of her whole conduct will then appear whereof the true motive may not eaſily be diſcovered. After this tedious, tho' I think abſolutely neceſſary digreſſion, it is time we proceed to the events of the year 1560.

Treaty between Elizabeth and the male-contents of Scotland. Camden.

Maitland, who was ſent into England from the confederate Scots, did finally conclude the treaty, which was ſigned, at Berwick, the twenty-ſeventh of February, 1560. Elizabeth, obſerving what great preparations were making in France, and not doubting their being deſigned againſt Scotland, deemed herſelf highly concerned to provide, the very firſt thing ſhe did, for that kingdom's ſafety, and hinder the French from becoming there too powerful. She had reaſon to apprehend that, if Queen Mary had iſſue by the King her conſort, France and Scotland would be united under one head, which it was her great intereſt to prevent. She concluded therefore with Maitland a treaty, which ſufficiently manifeſts what ſhe feared from Scotland. The treaty ran:

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 569.

That ſhe took under her protection the duke of Chateleraut, and all the nobility and ſubjects of Scotland, to maintain that kingdom in its liberties and privileges, during the marriage of the Queen of Scotland with the King of France, and one year after.

That ſhe promiſed to ſend, with all ſpeed, a convenient aid of men into Scotland, and continue them there 'till the French were intirely expulſed the Kingdom.

That ſhe would come to no agreement with France, but on condition of leaving Scotland in full liberty.

That ſhe would never abandon the confederates, while they acknowledged Mary for their Sovereign, and indeavored to maintain the liberty of their country, and the eſtate of the crown of Scotland. ELIZAB. AN' 1560.

That if the Engliſh took any places in Scotland, they ſhould be either demoliſhed by the Scots, or delivered to the duke of Chateleraut, at his own option; but that the Engliſh ſhould erect no fortification in the realm, without advice of the ſaid duke, and his adherents.

That the duke and all his party ſhould join the Engliſh forces.

That they ſhould declare themſelves enemies of thoſe of their countrymen who ſhould ſerve France againſt England.

That if England was attacked in the ſouth, the confederates ſhould ſend to Queen Elizabeth's aſſiſtance two thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, at leaſt; but if in the north, they ſhould join the Engliſh army with all their forces.

That if the earl of Argyle, lord chief-juſtice of Scotland, ſhould join with the confederates, he ſhould be obliged to uſe his indeavors to reduce the north of Ireland under the dominion of Enggland, agreeably to a treaty to be made between him and the lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

That the duke of Chateleraut and his party ſhould give hoſtages to Elizabeth, to remain in England (1) during the time that the marriage between Mary Queen of Scots, and the King of France, ſhould ſubſiſt.

Laſtly, the duke of Chateleraut and his party proteſted, that their intention was to be faithful to their Queen in every thing not repugnant to the laws and liberties of Scotland, and not tending to their ſubverſion.

From this treaty it is evident that Elizabeth's ſole aim was to keep the King of France from making himſelf maſter of Scotland, knowing it was intended to invade her from that quarter.

While this treaty was negociating, the French forces which were in Scotland, continued their purſuit of the confederate Scots into the mountains, contrary to the opinion of Martigues, of the houſe of Luxemburg. This nobleman, who had conducted over the laſt ſuccors from France (2), was for immediately invading England, imagining that, on his approach, the Engliſh Catholics would all riſe and join him. But the regent, better informed of the ſtate of England, judged it not proper to enter on ſo arduous a deſign with ſuch a feeble army. Some time after, while the French were exulting at the ſight of a flying enemy, they diſcovered from a mountain a fleet at ſea, which they at firſt took to be marquis D'Elbeuf's. But perceiving afterwards that naval force to be Engliſh (3), they were of opinion that the forces ſent, by land, to the confederates were not very diſtant. This made them retire to Leith, with deſign to aſſemble there all their forces, and wait the arrival of marquis D'Elbeuf. But he was expected in vain; for a violent tempeſt diſperſed his fleet, and forced him to ſail back to France to refit. Afterwards the troubles in France calling for the aſſiſtance of thoſe troops which were preparing for Scotland, and of thoſe already there, this enterpriſe was utterly blaſted. Buchanan. Camden.

The French forces being retired to Leith, the confederates aſſembled from all places where they were diſperſed, in order to join the Engliſh army, marching to their relief under command of lord Grey (4). At length, on the firſt of April, they came to Hadington, being ſix thouſand ſtrong in infantry, and two thouſand in cavalry, and there Hollingſh. Stow. Thuanus.

expected the ſo wiſhed-for Engliſh ſuccors, which were advancing with all poſſible diligence. The Queen-regent fearing to be ſhut up in Leith, choſe rather to retire to Edinburg caſtle, which was commited by the ſtates to the care of John Areſkin, on the expreſs condition of not ſurrendering it without their order. Areſkin received the regent honorably, but ſtill held in his own hands the command of the caſtle.

March 30. The Engliſh army enters Scotland. Buchanan. Camden. Stow. Hollingſh.

Soon after lord Grey, entering Scotland with ſix or ſeven thouſand foot and twelve hundred horſe, was joined by the confederates, after which, they together marched away for Leith, whither the enemies were retired. It was no inconſiderable undertaking to inveſt a place which had within its walls a whole army; nevertheleſs it was put in execution; there being no other means to expel the French from Scotland. While they were buſied at this ſiege, all poſſible indeavors were uſed by the French King, to perſuade Elizabeth to recall her forces out of Scotland: but ſhe too well knew her intereſt to be ſo wheedled. When De Sevre, the French embaſſador, firſt mentioned it, ſhe anſwered, her troops ſhould be readily recalled, provided the French were ſo too, ſince France had no more right than England to ſend forces into Scotland. At length his ſaid excellency, after many attempts, finding he could not prevail, did, in preſenſe of the Spaniſh embaſſador, declare that, by ſending forces into Scotland, ſhe had violated the treaty of Cateau. To which her Majeſty cooly replied, that the King of France had firſt infringed that treaty, by his attempts to poſſeſs himſelf of Scotland. Some time before, ſhe had publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring her reaſons for interfering in the Scotiſh affairs. Therein ſhe flatly charged the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain with being authors of the troubles in that kingdom, in order with more eaſe to effect their deſigns againſt England. To them alſo ſhe wholly aſcribed the injury done her by their Gallic Majeſties, in aſſuming her arms and title.

Before De Sevre had made his declaration, Monluc biſhop of Valence arrived in England, to preſs the Queen to recall her forces from Scotland, and even would fain have perſuaded her, that Francis II and Mary's having aſſumed her title was purpoſely to do her honor. This excuſe was ſtill more offenſive than the injury. Monluc, ſeeing he could not divert her from the reſolution ſhe had taken to ſupport the Scots, told her, the King of France would reſtore Calais, provided ſhe would withdraw the Engliſh from Scotland. But ſhe anſwered, that ſhe ſet not on that fiſh-town ſo great a value as to purchaſe it at ſuch a price. In the interim, ſhe diſpatched Montague * to Philip II, to acquaint him with her reaſons for aſſiſting Scotland. That embaſſador was to repreſent to him, that the Guiſes had projected uniting the crowns of France and Scotland, and not to miſs, had concerted murdering the earl of Arran, who had happily eſcaped their ſnares (1); wherefore ſhe deſired he would conſider whether ſuch union would be advantageous to Spain.

During theſe negociations, the ſiege of Leith was purſued, but not with any great ſucceſs, becauſe of the numerous gariſon. The fifteenth of April, the French made a ſally, and nailed up three large cannons (2). The thirtieth, the Engliſh, giving a fierce aſſault, were briſkly repulſed. The firſt of May they ſtormed again, but with no better ſucceſs. The length and difficulties of this ſiege began now to diſcourage them, when the duke of Norfolk, warden of the northern marches of England, ſent a powerful reinforcement, and went perſonally to the Engliſh camp, to incourage carrying on the ſiege. They would nevertheleſs have ſcarcely reduced the place, had not the conſpiracy of Amboiſe (3), which was then diſcovered in France, convinced the Lorrain Princes that the ſeaſon was not proper for executing the projects they had formed againſt England: ſo, inſtead of ſending into Scotland a freſh ſupply of troops, they thought of recalling thoſe already there, judging they might be wanted in France. To this end it was that Monluc biſhop of Valence, and count de Randan were diſpatched away to Scotland, with full powers from King Francis to conclude a peace. Elizabeth, having thereof notice, ſent alſo ſecretary Cecil, and doctor Wotton, with like powers. The plenipotentiaries immediately agreed to meet at Edinburg in July, and, in the interim, concluded a truce, which was to laſt 'till the end of their conferences. During this truce, June the tenth, the Queen regent died in Edinburg caſtle.

Truce in Scotland. Stow. Buchanan. Burnet.

When the peace came to be negociated, the French plenipotentiaries abſolutely refuſed treating with the Scotiſh confederates, alledging it would be injurious to the royal authority, they being rebels. This refuſal might have put a period to the congreſs, but, as both ſides were deſirous of peace, a certain expedient was finally deviſed, viz. Francis and Mary ſhould grant the confederates ſome terms, not by way of treaty, but as of pure grace, and that nevertheleſs they ſhould promiſe to obſerve them, in their treaty with the Queen of England. This was in effect the very ſame, but the embaſſadors, probably, with a view of ſome advantage, prefered this medium. Moſt hiſtorians, in the treaty concluded ſoon after at Edinburg, confound two particulars, which ſhould however be diſtinguiſhed; namely, the conceſſions of Francis and Mary to their Scotiſh ſubjects, and the treaty between France and England. As of theſe two one was obſerved, and the other not, it is neceſſary to have thereof a diſtinct idea. The promiſes made the Scots were:

A peace negociated,

That the French forces ſhould quit Scotland in twenty four days, and return to France, in veſſels to be furniſhed by Elizabeth.

and finiſhed at Edinburg. Buchanan.

That the city of Leith ſhould be reſtored to Scotland, and the fortifications demoliſhed.

That the works made by the French at Dunbar ſhould be razed.

That the King and Queen of France and Scotland ſhould grant the confederates a general and complete amneſty for whatever had been tranſacted from the tenth of March 1559, to the firſt of Auguſt 1560, and that this act of oblivion ſhould be approved and confirmed by the ſtates of Scotland, to be aſſembled the inſuing Auguſt, with conſent of the King and Queen.

That the French ſhould have liberty to leave ſixty men in the iſle of Keith (4).

But with regard to the intereſts of Elizabeth, a real treaty was concluded, which will be hereafter frequently mentioned by name of the treaty of Edinburg, containing, diſpatched under that title, ſhould be altered, or remain of no force.

That for the future, the King and Queen of Scotland ſhould not aſſume the title of King and Queen of England and Ireland, nor bear the arms of thoſe kingdoms.

That the farther ſatisfaction required by the Queen of England, for the injury done her, ſhould be refered to a conference, between the commiſſioners of both crowns, at London.

That, in caſe the commiſſioners could not agree, the deciſion ſhould be left to the King of Spain.

That the King and Queen of France and Scotland ſhould perform the promiſes made to the Scots, at Edinburg, by the plenipotentiaries of France.

It muſt be obſerved, that Buchanan in his hiſtory has only mentioned the articles granted to the confederate Scots; and Camden, in his annals of Elizabeth, takes notice only of the treaty between the two crowns. This cauſes ſome obſcurity in their reſpective accounts of the ſubſequent events.

Treaty, as it related to Scotland, is confirmed. Buchanan. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 591. Spotſwood.

After concluſion of the treaty, the French and Engliſh quited Scotland; the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar were demoliſhed, and the act of oblivion ſent over into Scotland, was confirmed by the ſtates. Theſe ſame ſtates, aſſembled in Auguſt, made laws favorable to the reformation, and ſent them to the King and Queen for their approbation, rather to diſcover their ſentiments, than with any hopes of obtaining their deſires, and yet they cauſed theſe new laws to be punctually obſerved.

refuſed, as it related to Elizabeth. Camden.

But as to the treaty concluded between the two crowns, Francis and Mary refuſed to ratify it, for a reaſon the force whereof is not eaſily conceived. It was, they ſaid, becauſe the Scots, falſely ſtiling themſelves faithful ſubjects, had made a treaty with Elizabeth in their own private names, without any warrant from royal authority. If this refuſal had only concerned the articles granted the Scots, Elizabeth might have believed that the French court repented their conceſſions, and then the reaſon alledged might have carried with it ſome color. But whatever related to the Scots being already performed, their pretended incroachment could not render invalid a treaty relating merely to a difference between Elizabeth and Mary, and wherein the conduct of the Scots was not in the leaſt concerned. It was therefore eaſy to infer, that this weak reaſon was no other than a bare pretext uſed by Francis and Mary, to elude what they had promiſed in the treaty with reſpect to Elizabeth. Accordingly, her ſaid Majeſty was convinced, that the Princes of Lorrain ſtill perſiſted in their deſign of wreſting from her the crown; and this belief was ever rooted in her mind. Mary's ſaid uncles did not then foreſee how dear this procedure would one day coſt their niece, of whoſe agrandiſement they ſeemed ſo paſſionately deſirous.

The Queen ſought in marriage by ſeveral Princes and noblemen. Camden. Burnet.

While Elizabeth was imployed in theſe affairs, her court was attentive to obſerve her motions, her conduct and inclinations, with regard to matrimony. Tho' ſhe told her parliament, ſhe was reſolved to remain ſingle, ſuch reſolutions were known to be liable to change, and the more, as diverſe Princes, and even ſome private nobles, deſpaired not to make her alter her mind. Charles, archduke of Auſtria, the Emperor Ferdinand's ſecond ſon, the King of Sweden and the duke of Holſtein, had already made their addreſſes. The earl of Arran the duke of Chateleraut's ſon, building on Queen Mary's ſterility, and thence on his own ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland, flattered himſelf, that Elizabeth would prefer him to any other, in order to unite the two realms (1). To theſe were added others, who, being her ſubjects, and not daring to declare their minds ſo openly, were contended with leaving her to gueſs their inclinations, or with diſcloſing them by means of ſome of her ladies. One proceeded on his birth, another on his merit, a third on his graceful perſon and external accompliſhments, apt to inſpire the fair ſex with tender and amorous ſentiments. In ſhort, ſhe was indirectly aſſaulted on all ſides which are generally thought weakeſt in a woman. The earl of Arundel *, of a moſt ancient and noble deſcent, tho' ſomewhat advanced in years, imagined the Queen would marry a ſubject, rather than a Sovereign, and if ſo, that no perſon better merited ſuch honor than himſelf. Sir William Pickering (2), having received ſome particular tokens of her Majeſty's eſteem, deſpaired not that theſe introductory favors would be extended much farther. But no man believed he had better grounds to flatter his hopes than Robert Dudley, ſon of the late duke of Northumberland. The Queen viſibly prefered him to all who had the honor to approach her, and gave him ſo many proofs of the inclination ſhe had for him, that for ſome time it was believed ſhe intended to marry him. At her acceſſion to the crown, ſhe made him maſter of the horſe, and knight of the garter. From thence forwards ſhe took a pleaſure to diſtribute her favors by his channel; ſo that, by this diſtinction, ſhe diſcovered her having for him more than a bare eſteem. At court he was ſtiled only My Lord, without other addition, which demonſtrated her preference of him to all the nobility: and yet, when his pretenſions to ſuch diſtinguiſhing favors were examined, no qualities were found in him fit to make impreſſion on ſo diſcerning a Princeſs. His vices far ſurpaſſing his virtues, recourſe was had to the planets which ruled his birth, and occaſioned this ſtrange ſympathy. However this be, he was at court a very great favorite. All affairs were imparted to him: embaſſadors gave account to him of their negociations: all applied to him for their concerns at court, and woe to thoſe who addreſſed any other; that was a crime not readily pardoned.

Robert Dudley in great favor. Camden. Naunton.

The Queen had two other favorites, but of a different ſort from Dudley, as they were only for government matters. Theſe were Nicolas Bacon, and William Cecil. The firſt was made keeper of the great ſeal, with all the privileges of lord chancellor. William Cecil had been ſecretary of ſtate to Edward VI, and ſo well diſcharged the office that, had not his religion ſtood in the way, he had been continued under Mary. He was not however expoſed to perſecution, whether he ſo artfully managed as to give no advantages againſt him, or his particular merit procured him a diſtinction above all other Proteſtants. He had a very uncommon genius, a ſound judgment, a capacity for great affairs, with indefatigable application, impenetrable ſecreſy, and a conſtant tendency to his ſole view, which was his Sovereign's welfare and advantage; wherefore it is not ſtrange if he preſerved, during his life, the favor of a Queen who ſo perfectly knew her own intereſt. When able Princes are bleſſed with ſuch miniſters, they do not part with them eaſily.

Bacon and Cecil prime miniſters. Naunton. Statut. 5 Eliz. c. 18.

In the ſituation of Elizabeth's affairs, ſhe ſtood in need of the guidance of able and diſintereſted miniſters. Wherever ſhe turned her eyes out of her kingdom, ſhe ſaw not one friend really concerned for her welfare. She had at firſt relied on the King of Spain; but Montague's report of his embaſſy to that Prince diſappointed all her expectations from him. When this embaſſador, after diſcourſing with Philip about the Scotiſh affairs, demanded, agreeably to his inſtructions, a renewal of the ancient alliance between England and the houſe of Burgundy, he found him very cold. Philip replied with deploring the innovations made in England with regard to religion, and expreſſing thereat his deep concern. He complained of his not having notice of the ſending Engliſh forces into Scotland 'till it was too late; nevertheleſs he counſeled Elizabeth to have it inſerted in the future treaty between her and Mary, that if France ſent over troops to Scotland, ſhe ſhould alſo have liberty to do the like, and to ſtipulate poſitively the reſtitution of Calais. He added, he had thitherto prevented Elizabeth's excommunication, and obtained from the Pope a promiſe, that nothing ſhould be done in that affair without his knowledge. As to renewing the treaty, he coldly anſwered, it was needleſs.

Returns the garter.

Finally, he put into Montague's hands his collar, &c. of the order of the garter. All this ſufficiently convinced Elizabeth that Philip was no longer her friend, and that his advice, which came too late, was more the effect of his jealouſy at the Gallic monarchy's growing power, than of his affection for her. Some time after, ſhe gave him ſomewhat of a mortification, in denying certain Engliſh Catholics (1) leave to reſide in his Netherland dominions, and preſerve their effects in England. Among theſe was Jane Dormer, grandmother of count De Feria's lady, whom he eſpouſed in England during his embaſſy. This ſo irritated the ſaid Spaniſh count, that he imployed his whole credit with Philip to exaſperate him againſt the Queen of England. He even found means to get into the Inquiſition a certain domeſtic of Chamberlain, the Engliſh embaſſador in ordinary at the court of Spain. He alſo ſtrongly ſollicited the Pope to excommunicate her; but without ſucceſs. Pius IV was for trying other methods, by him judged properer to gain upon that Princeſs, and which were not any way obſtructive to his eccleſiaſtical cenſures, which he could thunder againſt her whenever he pleaſed.

She refuſes a requeſt from him. Camden.

The Pope indeavors to gain Elizabeth, Camden.

With this view it was, that his ſaid Beatitude diſpatched away to England Vincenzo Parpaglia, abbot of San Salvatore, with certain inſtructions, and a letter for her Majeſty, exhorting her return into the pale of holy mother church, and promiſing ſpeedily to continue the general council (2). It is pretended that this nuncio was alſo impowered to tender her the Pontif's offer to annul the ſentence of Henry's divorce from Ann Boleyn, and the ſubſequent act of parliament; confirm the Engliſh liturgy, and permit the Engliſh to communicate in both kinds. But theſe offers were not capable of moving Elizabeth; and the rather as, according to all probability, they were not ſincere, at leaſt in what regarded religion. Hence may be gathered what ſentiments the Roman court, and all Papiſts, were in concerning Elizabeth's birth, ſince it was offered as a great favor to own her for Henry VIII's legitimate daughter.

but without ſucceſs.

Camden.

Mean time, Elizabeth very cloſely applied to her own government affairs, in order to render her ſubjects as happy as poſſible, being very ſenſible her main ſupport was to flow from them in caſe of any attack, and whereof ſhe had reaſon to be apprehenſive. This year, ſhe was neceſſitated to reſtore the coin to its ancient ſtandard, which had been extremely debaſed in the reign of Henry VIII, tho' no King had ever ſo much of his ſubjects treaſure (3). If cardinal Pole may be credited, this Prince alone drew more money from the people, than all the Kings together ſince the conqueſt. The monaſtery of Weſtminſter was this year converted into a collegiate church (4). Theſe were the moſt remarkable tranſactions of England in 1560. But before we proceed to thoſe of a new year, ſome brief mention muſt be made of what paſſed in the neighboring ſtates.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. P. 590.

From the very commencement of the year, France was viſibly menaced with diſquiets. The Proteſtants ſeeing themſelves perſecuted, and unmercifully condemned to the fire, judged it high time to provide for their common defenſe. To this end, ſome of them, after a private conference, formed a conſpiracy againſt the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain, King Francis's miniſters and their declared enemies. They had no apparent chieftain; but, very ſeemingly, the Prince of Condé, jealous of theſe two foreign Princes, had among the Reformed emiſſaries, thoſe who intimated, that, when matters were ripe, they ſhould not want a ſupport. However this be, a gentleman, named La Renaudie, projected to carry off the Lorrain Princes, then with the King at Amboiſe. This attempt miſcarrying was interpreted as a conſpiracy againſt the King himſelf, and twelve hundred perſons, either guilty or only ſuſpected of being therein concerned, actually loſt their lives. The two Lorrain Princes would, under this pretext, gladly have diſpatched the Prince of Condé, but their meaſures not being yet well taken, they waited a more favorable occaſion. Some time after, the general ſtates being aſſembled at Orleans, the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé indiſcretely repaired thither, tho' they had intimation of the court's ill deſigns againſt them. The King of Navarre indeed was not put under arreſt, but was ſo carefully watched that he could not poſſibly get away. The Prince of Condé was impriſoned, and ſoon after ſentenced to loſe his head: but the death of King Francis, intervening at the very juncture, not only prevented Condé's execution, but procured his releaſe.

This ſame year, Philip II, having carried war into Africa againſt the corſair Dragut, who had made himſelf King of Tripoli (5), his arms were ſo unſucceſsful, that he was forced to recall the Spaniſh troops left in the Netherlands. With great pleaſure the people of thoſe provinces beheld the Spaniards depart; and their ſatisfaction would have been much increaſed had cardinal Granvelle been alſo recalled, for they mortally hated him, and were incouraged in their hate by the Prince of Orange, and the counts of Egmont and Horn, his avowed enemies.

Francis II's death occaſioned in the Gallic court great alterations. Charles IX, his brother and ſucceſſor, being yet a minor, his mother, Catherine di Medicis, had the addreſs and influence to prevail with the King of Navarre, firſt Prince of the blood, to yield her the regency, and content himſelf with the title of lieutenant-general. Mean while, as ſhe was not quite free from apprehenſions that he might one day think of reſuming the rank due to his birth, ſhe fomented with all her art the diſſenſions which had begun to appear in the late reign. length formed two parties in the court and kingdom, which proved her ſecurity, as ſhe was neceſſary to both. The firſt was headed by the duke of Guiſe, conſtable Montmorency, and marſhal St. André. Theſe three noble chiefs were ſtiled the Triumvirs. In their faction were all the Catholics of the realm, into whom was infuſed a belief, that thoſe chiefs had no other view than to maintain the Romiſh religion. At the head of the other party, wholly conſiſting of Hugonots (ſo were termed the French (1) Proteſtants) were the Prince of Condé, admiral Coligny or Chatillon, and his brother Andelot. The King of Navarre fluctuated between the two parties, without being able to determine; and the Queen-regent reaped great advantages from this diviſion among the grandees.

France being in this ſituation, Elizabeth ſeemed to be clear of all danger from that quarter. Francis's ſucceſſor had no pretenſe to concern himſelf with the affairs of Scotland, any farther than as a common ally, and he had not the leaſt demand upon England. On the other hand, the Queen-regent, who had no great affection for her daughter-in-law, was far from ingaging in a war for her ſake. Even could ſhe have conceived any hope of ſeating her on the throne of England, it was not her intereſt to make the houſe of Guiſe more powerful than it was already. Laſtly, the Princes of Lorrain, buſied in ſtruggling with their enemies at court, were not in condition to proſecute the rights of the Queen their niece. Wherefore, immediately after Francis II's deceaſe, Mary, by the advice of her uncles, quited the title of Queen of England, which ſhe had borne ever ſince the treaty of Cateau: but this ſufficed not to content Elizabeth. Mary being ſtill in her very prime, might marry ſome great Potentate, and to him transfer her pretenſions: therefore, to ſet Elizabeth's mind at eaſe, this youthful Queen was ſolemnly to declare, ſhe had no right to that title, otherwiſe ſhe might have reſumed it whenever ſhe pleaſed; a bare interruption being not ſufficient to invalidate her claim. By the way, Elizabeth, like her grandfather Henry VII, was, during her whole reign, ſo jealous of her crown, that ſhe underwent perpetual uneaſineſs merely on that ſcore. When ſhe heard of Francis's death, ſhe ſent over to France the earl of Bedford, with her compliments of condolance and congratulation to the new King, and ordered him to preſs Mary to ratify the treaty of Edinburg. The embaſſador diſcharged his commiſſion, and was anſwered by Mary, that this affair not concerning her as Queen of France, but as Queen of Scotland, ſhe would not confirm it without advice of the Scotiſh nobility (2). Mean time, as ſhe knew herſelf not beloved by her mother-in-law, the Queen-regent, ſhe left the court of France, and retired to Rheims, where her uncle the cardinal was archbiſhop, there to paſs part of the winter, and afterwards ſhe went to reſide at Nancy. During her abode at Rheims, ſhe received a viſit from Martigues, La Broſſe, D'Oyſel, and the biſhop of Amiens, who, being acquainted with the affairs of Scotland and knowing her intention to return thither, believed it incumbent on them to give her ſome inſtructions. She came thence ſo young, that ſhe was utterly ignorant of the kingdom ſhe was going to govern. Melvil ſays, they adviſed her to gain, by her favors, James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, her natural brother; the earl of Argyle, who had married Jane Stuart, her natural ſiſter; ſir William Maitland of Lethington, and ſir William Kirkaldy, laird of Grange; and to rely on the Proteſtants rather than the Romaniſts, as the former were in all reſpects ſuperior. Some time after, on her way to Nancy, ſhe gave audience to John Leſley, ſent to her from her Catholic ſubjects. Leſley ſays, in his hiſtory of Scotland, that he adviſed her, agreeably to his inſtructions, not to confide in the prior of St. Andrew's, and to repair to Aberdeen, where ſhe might be at the head of a good body of Catholic troops, to reſtore religion to the ſtate it was in before the late innovations: but ſhe was too prudent to follow ſuch dangerous counſel. Next day, the prior of St. Andrew's, who was alſo come to France to pay her his reſpects, met her at Joinville, and gave her counſels more ſuitable to the ſituation of her affairs. He confirmed her in the reſolution ſhe had taken of returning to Scotland, and adviſed her to reign like her predeceſſors, with the concurrence of the ſtates, aſſuring her, it was the only way to live quiet and happy (3). Mary, agreeably to this advice, ordered him to return to Scotland, and prepare all things for her reception. Moreover, ſhe put into his hands a patent, impowering the ſtates to meet and ordain whatever they ſhould judge convenient for the kingdom's benefit. Thus, Leſley's pains to prejudice her againſt Stuart, was for once ineffectual. This Leſley, afterwards biſhop of Roſs, greatly contributed, by his intrigues and violent counſels, to the misfortunes which at laſt fell on the head of the Queen his miſtreſs. Stuart arriving in Scotland, notwithſtanding Leſley's indeavors to have him arreſted in France, delivered to the ſtates the patent ſent them by Mary. As almoſt all Scotland was then Proteſtant, the ſtates imployed the general power granted them by the Queen to eſtabliſh the reformation, by public authority. This was followed by orders to demoliſh all the monaſteries, which was inſtantly put in execution.

Mean time Mary, preparing to ſail for Scotland, ſent D'Oyſel to Elizabeth for a ſafe-condoct. Elizabeth anſwered, ſhe hoped Queen Mary would ratify the treaty of Edinburg, after which, ſhe ſhould not only have a ſafe-conduct, but alſo, without being expoſed to the dangers and fatigues of the ſea, might paſs thro' England, where ſhe ſhould be received with all the marks of affection ſhe could expect from a good ſiſter (4). Mary complained of this anſwer to Throckmorton, the Engliſh embaſſador, in ſuch terms as evidenced her being thereat extremely offended. She told him, "As ſhe came "into France in ſpite of Edward, ſhe could return "to Scotland notwithſtanding Elizabeth's oppoſi-"tion: ſhe was heartily vexed for aſking a favor "ſhe could ſo well be without: that this refuſal, "and the aſſiſtance given by Elizabeth to the Sco-"tiſh rebels, clearly evidenced how little ſhe de-

She "added, ſhe was a Queen as well as Elizabeth, "and not deſtitute of friends when they ſhould be "wanted: that the treaty of Edinburg was made "in the life-time of her huſband, and if he delayed "to ſign it, he alone ought to bear the blame: "that ſince ſhe was a widow, neither the council "of France, nor her uncles had concerned them-"ſelves with the affairs of Scotland: that the Scots "about her were private perſons, whom ſhe nei-"ther could nor ought to conſult in a matter of "ſuch importance; but ſo ſoon as ſhe had adviſed "with the ſtates of Scotland, ſhe would return a "ſuitable anſwer: that therefore ſhe was haſtening "her return into Scotland; but Elizabeth intended "to ſtop her journey, and ſo alone was the cauſe "of the delay ſhe complained of. She concluded "with ſaying, ſhe had never offended Elizabeth, "and deſired the embaſſador to tell her the reaſon "of her anger."

Throckmorton replied, his order was only to receive her anſwer concerning the treaty of Edinburg: but ſince ſhe deſired it, he would for a moment lay aſide the embaſſador, and give her his ſentiments as a private man. Then he told her, the Queen his miſtreſs was very much offended at her aſſuming the title and arms of England, which ſhe had not done in Queen Mary's reign, and left her to judge, whether a greater indignity could be offered to a crowned head. Mary anſwered, ſhe did it by the expreſs command of Henry II, her father-in-law, and of Francis her huſband, whom ſhe was obliged to obey; but upon the death of her huſband, ſhe had, when miſtreſs of herſelf, quited both arms and title: that however, ſhe being a Queen, and grand-daughter of Henry VII's eldeſt ſiſter, did not believe it injurious to any perſon to bear the arms of England, which had been done by others more remotely allied, without any noiſe. Camden, from whom this is taken, recites not Throckmorton's reply: it would however be ſtrange that he ſhould be ſatisfied with reaſons ſo void of ſolidity. Elizabeth did not only demand, that Mary ſhould quit the title and arms of England, but alſo ſhould declare, in the moſt expreſs manner, that ſhe never had any right to aſſume them: nay ſhe expected a ſolemn reparation for this incroachment, as appears by the treaty of Edinburg. Now Mary's quiting the title and arms of England, without owning ſhe had no right to aſſume them, was very far from contenting Elizabeth, who would not have had any perſon whoſoever even pretend to the title of Queen of England, herſelf alone excepted. Mary's alledging that others had borne the ſame arms without any offenſe, pointed to the marquis of Exeter, and ducheſs of Suffolk: but between them and Mary were three very notable differences. The firſt was, they bore theſe arms by the King's ſpecial grant. The ſecond, that theirs was diſtinguiſhed by a limb or border. The third, that they never aſſumed the title of King and Queen of England.

Elizabeth ſuſpicious of Mary. Camden.

All this gave Elizabeth a ſtrong ſuſpicion that the Scotiſh Queen was forming ſome dangerous deſign, and in relinquiſhing the title and arms of England, intended only to amuſe her, ſince ſhe refuſed to own the injuſtice of aſſuming them. In ſhort, Mary, being determined on returning into Scotland without Elizabeth's ſafe-conduct, ſent for Throckmorton to Abbeville, and demanded of him, what was to be done to content Queen Elizabeth. Throckmorton replied, ſhe had only to ratify the Edinburg treaty, as he had ſo frequently intimated. Her anſwer to this was, that ſhe could not conceive, why ſhe was thus urged to ratify a treaty already executed: that the articles concerning the Scots had been truly performed: that, as ſhe had quited the title and arms of England, ſhe could not be accuſed of ſeeking evaſions not to ratify the the treaty, ſince a treaty already executed required not a ratification: that the Scots could not complain of being treated too rigorouſly, but that ſhe perceived the perſon who would prevent her return into Scotland, would prevent their injoying the effects of her clemency. She added, ſhe would write to the Queen of England with her own hand, and deſired the embaſſador rather to compoſe than aggravate matters. But the letter ſhe wrote on this occaſion gave not the ſatisfaction Elizabeth believed ſhe had reaſon to expect. As Mary's uſurping the arms and title of England, and her refuſing to ratify the Edinburg treaty, were the baſis and foundation of the differences between theſe two Queens, and had a conſtant influence upon this reign, it will not be unneceſſary to add ſome obſervations to what has been ſaid, in order to ſet in a clearer light the reaſons and intereſts of both.

Elizab. An' 1560.

The intereſts and political views of the two Queens with regard to the treaty of Edinburg.

Elizabeth was counted ſpurious, both in France and all other Catholic countries. On this ground it was that Henry II obliged the Dauphin his ſon, and the Scotiſh Queen, his ſaid ſon's conſort, to aſſume the title of King and Queen of England, and that, even after his deceaſe, they continued bearing them. Elizabeth was far from being ſo ſhort-ſighted as not to perceive that this pretext would be more than ſufficient to deprive her of the crown, ſhould it ever come to be ſupported by force. On the other hand, ſhe could not doubt that ſuch a deſign was formed by Mary and her friends: her having aſſumed the title of Queen of England was thereof a manifeſt indication. It was therefore requiſite to provide for her ſafety. The civil war in Scotland naturally preſenting itſelf, ſhe aſſiſted the male-contents; and, whereas France was reſolved to invade her from that quarter, gave Francis and Mary cauſe to apprehend ſhe would deprive them of Scotland. This produced the treaty of Edinburg, which was never ratified by Francis, and after his deceaſe, Mary perſiſted in her refuſal, contenting herſelf with only quiting the title of Queen of England: but this was not a ſufficient ſecurity for Elizabeth. As Mary had relinquiſhed the title without giving any reaſon, ſhe could reſume it the firſt opportunity; and this was what Elizabeth ſought to prevent, and the more, as Mary's obſtinate refuſal gave her cauſe to believe it was really intended.

An' 1561.

Mary on her ſide had ſtrong reaſons to elude this ratification. She was perſuaded of Elizabeth's not being King Henry VIII's legitimate daughter, and that neither his will nor any act of parliament could give her a right which nature denied. On this ſuppoſition, Mary believed the crown of England was devolved on her, as next heir to the deceaſed Queen, and tho' Elizabeth had poſſeſſion, ſhe deſpaired not of wreſting it from her, with the aſſiſtance of France, Spain, the Pope, and the Engliſh Papiſts. But if, by ratifying the treaty of Edinburg, ſhe owned herſelf in the wrong to aſſume the title of Queen of England, and promiſed under oath never to bear it more, ſhe had cauſe to fear her friends would greatly abate their zeal. To what purpoſe then did Francis order his plenipotentiaries to ſign a treaty, which he intended not to ratify? This queſtion may very eaſily be anſwered. He could not otherwiſe withdraw his forces from Scotland, where they were beſieged, nor nor oblige Elizabeth to recall the Engliſh. As to his breach of his word, that was not what gave the French court any great concern. Now as Mary was at that time in ſubjection to a huſband, ſhe threw upon him whatever was amiſs in this procedure.

The ſecond reaſon Mary had to refuſe this ratification was ſtill of more weight. The French plenipotentiaries, in ſigning the treaty, made a wrong ſtep, for want of being ſufficiently acquainted with the poſture of affairs in England. They ſuffered to be inſerted in the treaty, without any reſtriction, this general clauſe, "That, for the future, Francis "and Mary ſhould not aſſume the title of King "and Queen of England." Now Mary had reaſon to apprehend theſe words, "for the future," might be a ſnare to make her renounce for ever the crown of England, on account of her religion. She deemed this apprehenſion the better grounded, as the Engliſh had plainly manifeſted their intention to regulate the ſucceſſion by Henry VIII's will, wherein the poſterity of Margaret Queen of Scotland were excluded, and the ducheſs of Suffolk ranged next after Elizabeth. It ſeemed therefore to her, that a ratification of the Edinburg treaty would give occaſion to ſay, ſhe complied with the will of Henry VIII, which could not but redound to her extreme prejudice. Elizabeth's being in a like ſentiment is ſcarce to be doubted, ſince afterwards, when Mary, preſſed by the ill ſituation of her affairs, offered to ratify the treaty, with this alteration of the clauſe in diſpute, "That during the "life of Elizabeth ſhe would not take the title of "Queen of England," Elizabeth was not ſatisfied. This is very evident, that her intention was to make uſe of the ratification to deprive Mary of her birthright, or at leaſt, to hold her in ſubjection, by keeping her in a perpetual uneaſineſs concerning her ſucceſſion. Mary, in evading the ratification of the treaty, on pretenſe of the prejudice it might do her, did in effect refuſe acknowledging ſhe had done amiſs in aſſuming the title of Queen of England, during Elizabeth's life, and thereby preſerved all her claim to be inſerted on occaſion; for it was not 'till ſome years after that ſhe offered the above-hinted modification. On the other hand, Elizabeth, under color of requiring Mary only to renounce a right ſhe had aſſumed to her prejudice, would have ingaged her to ſign a moſt equivocal clauſe, which might have deprived her of all her rights. Theſe remarks will hereafter appear to be not quite uſeleſs.

Mary arrives in Scotland. Auguſt 21. Leſley. Buchanan. Blackwood.

Mary, tho' ſhe had no ſafe-conduct from Elizabeth, put to ſea, and happily arrived in Scotland. Some affirm that, only by means of a fog, ſhe eſcaped the Engliſh fleet, which waited to intercept her (1): but this is barely conjecture, without any proof (2). It is however probable, that, as affairs ſtood between her and Elizabeth, had ſhe been taken, ſhe would ſcarce have been permited to leave England very ſuddenly, at leaſt 'till ſhe had ratified the Edinburg treaty. She was received in her kingdoms with great demonſtrations of joy, both by nobility and commonalty: but ſhe had the mortification to find the reformation eſtabliſhed by laws ſo ſevere, that only herſelf was allowed the liberty of having the maſs in her own chapel, and that without any oſtentatious pomp or pageantry. Nevertheleſs, diverſe of the nobility ſtill adhering to the ancient belief, and hoping to reſtore it by her authority, made their court to her with the utmoſt aſſiduity. Of this number were George Gordon earl of Huntley, the earls of Athol, Crawford, Sutherland, with ſome biſhops. As for the duke of Chateleraut, it was no eaſy matter to divine what religion he was of, ſo ambiguous had his conduct been hitherto. The other nobles I have named, were very conſiderable by their birth, wealth, vaſſals, and dependants: and yet they would never, perhaps, have thought of reſtoring Papiſm, had they not depended on the favor of her Majeſty, who alone could balance the Proteſtants power. Their firſt project was to attempt alienating her from ſuch of the Proteſtants as had with her, and in the kingdom, moſt credit. James Stuart, he natural brother, was the main object of her hatred, on account of his adherence to the reformation: beſide, the Queen having, at her arrival, commited to him the adminiſtration of affairs, it would be very difficult for them to undertake any thing without oppoſition from him, while he continued in that ſtation; for which reaſon, they neglected not whatever might contribute towards ruining him with his royal ſiſter. But it is needleſs to be more circumſtantial in theſe intrigues; it ſuffices this is abſolutely neceſſary for the ſequel.

The Papiſts project reſtoring their religion in Scotland. Buchanan.

Attempts to ſupplant James Stuart.

The haughtineſs wherewith Mary talked to the Engliſh embaſſador, before ſhe left France, was not only unſuitable to her preſent circumſtances, but even contrary to her meaſures, and the projects ſhe had formed with her uncles. While Francis II lived, theſe Princes believed the forces of France would be ſufficient to reduce Scotland, under color of extirpating hereſy: and afterwards, in conjunction with the Scotiſh troops, it would be eaſy to enter England, and, with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh Catholics, dethrone Elizabeth: but the war they had excited in Scotland taking a very different turn from what they expected, and Francis's death immediately following it, they perceived other meaſures were to be taken, and the execution of their project for ſome time poſtponed. They therefore counſeled the Queen their niece, voluntarily to quit the title of Queen of England; to return into Scotland; to contract a ſtrict friendſhip with Elizabeth, if poſſible to be effected; to indeavor being declared her preſumptive heir, and, under color of that correſpondence, to labor at forming a party in England, where was no want of malecontents, to be ſerviceable on occaſion. The whole courſe of this hiſtory evidences this to have been Mary's real ſcheme, and I ſhall give thereof moſt convincing proofs in the ſequel. Nothing therefore was more contrary to theſe meaſures than her quarrel with Elizabeth, whoſe friendſhip ſhe ought to have courted, in order to obtain the declaration ſhe deſired, by means whereof ſhe was to ſtrengthen her party in England. On her arrival in Scotland, ſhe indeavored to correct this error, by ſending Maitland to Elizabeth, to notify her being got ſafe to Edinburg, and to ſollicit her Majeſty's amity. The embaſſador likewiſe carried a letter from the prime Scotiſh nobility to Elizabeth, which, after abundance of ceremonious compliments, ſignified to her, that the beſt method to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two crowns, was for her to declare their Queen her preſumptive heir. Elizabeth was ſo on her guard againſt whatever came from Mary, that it was not eaſy to ſurpriſe her. She told the embaſſador, that the Queen of Scotland, while in France, promiſed to give her ſatisfaction concerning the treaty of Edinburg, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould arrive in her kingdom; it could not therefore but ſurpriſe her to find no notice taken of that article. The embaſſador excuſed the Queen his miſtreſs, that the ſhort time ſince her arrival had not allowed her to think of any important affair. Elizabeth ſeemed ſatisfied with this excuſe, but to the Scotiſh lords letter flatly replied, that ſhe would not run the hazard of being a ſpectator of her ſubjects adoration to the riſing ſun: and, raiſing her voice, added, "She would not ſuffer the Queen of "Scotland to rob her of the crown during her life; "neither did ſhe intend to do any thing might "prejudice that Queen after her death, tho' ſhe "had uſurped the arms of England, for which ſhe "ought in juſtice to make reparation." This was the ſubſtance of what paſſed in relation to this embaſſy, whence Mary drew the advantage ſhe deſired, as it gave her opportunity to renew a correſpondence with Elizabeth. I am perſuaded Melvil miſtakes when, in his Memoirs, he ſays, that after Mary's return into Scotland, there was ſo cloſe a friendſhip between the two Queens, that they wrote to each other every week, and teſtified a longing deſire to deliver by word of mouth what they commited to writing. Nothing 'till then had paſſed between them could ſerve to form or cement this pretended reciprocal amity: on the contrary, many particulars contributed to a mutual alienation. But if Melvil, who was then in Germany, was rightly informed, one cannot help thinking they were both conſummate diſſemblers. About the cloſe of this year, Mary gave the prior of St. Andrew's the title of earl of Murray, and created John Areſkin earl of Marr.

She ſends to deſire ſhe may be declared Elizabeth's heir. Buchanan. Melvil. Camden. Thuanus.

(1) That Queen Elizabeth intended to intercept the Queen of Scots, is not poſitively aſſerted by the Scotiſh hiſtorians. Buchanan ſays, that Elizabeth had prepared a great fleet, on pretenſe to ſcour the ſea of pirates; but ſome thought it was to intercept the Queen of Scots, if ſhe adventured to paſs againſt her will; ſo that it was only a ſuſpicion, l. 17. Thuanus affirms, that James, prior of St. Andrews, in his return from France thro' England, adviſed Elizabeth to detain the Queen of Scots; thinking ſhe would come thro' England. l. 29.

The Pope deſirous to ſend a nuncio to Elizabeth, is refuſed. Camden. Collier.

Tho' the anſwer given laſt year to the abbot of Parpaglia was no way proper to inſpire his Beatitude with any great hope of reſtoring the Romiſh creed in England, he this year ſent Elizabeth a nuncio, to notify, that the Trentine council, which had been interrupted, would be continued in the ſame place, and to require her ſending thither ſome Engliſh prelates. Abbot Martinengo, who was charged with this commiſſion, arriving in Flanders, and ſending for leave to purſue his journey into England, could never obtain it. Whereupon, the nuncio at Paris deſired Throckmorton to write to her Majeſty about it. He did ſo; and ſhe coldly replied: "That ſhe heartily wiſhed a "council truly œcumenical; but a Popiſh one ſhe "would never honor with any ambaſſy from her: "that ſhe had no buſineſs with the biſhop of Rome, "who had no more power than other biſhops."

Philip's coldneſs towards Elizabeth increaſes. Camden.

After ſuch a reply, Elizabeth might depend on continual diſturbance from the Roman court; and the more, as the King of Spain was intirely eſtranged from her ſince the deceaſe of Francis II, becauſe he no longer dreaded the union of Great-Britain, with the Gallic monarchy. That dread was the only tie which had thitherto attached him to England.

Elizabeth prepares for her defenſe. Hollingſh. p. 1192. Camden. Stow.

Mean while Elizabeth, finding herſelf deſtitute of any ally, and menaced from every quarter, took timely care for her own defenſe. She imployed this whole year in preparations, which convinced her enemies ſhe would not be eaſily ſurpriſed. Her main precaution was to have conſtantly in readineſs a ſtout and well-conditioned naval force, conſcious that her fleet was England's beſt bulwark. At the ſame time, ſhe ordered all the forts and caſtles of the northern borders to be well fortified, and particularly Berwick, as the place whence ſhe might moſt eaſily be attacked. As the Engliſh had 'till this time been obliged to have all their gun-powder from abroad, ſhe was apprehenſive of wanting it, and, to prevent that inconvenience, ordered it to be made in her own kingdom (1). Moreover, ſhe raiſed the ſoldiers pay, to incourage them to ſerve her faithfully, and be ready on occaſion. This ſame year, was happily diſcovered, in Cumberland, a mine of fine copper (2), which for many ages had been neglected, and at the ſame time, was found in great abundance the ſtone named Lapis Calaminaries, ſo requiſite in all braſs-work.

She orders the monks to be paid their penſions and arrears. Camden.

Elizabeth's martial cares diverted her not from attending to juſticiary and political affairs. She had her eye every where, and labored effectually for the reformation of abuſes, and bringing things into good order. Information being made, that the officers of the Exchequer reſerved the penſions aſſigned to thoſe eccleſiaſtics who had been turned out of their abbies, ſhe ordered, that the arrears of all ſuch as were living, and unprovided with benefices, ſhould be exactly and fully diſcharged (3).

Her exemplary œconomy.

Thus every one relying on the Queen's juſtice and equity, England beheld revived a felicity that nation long wanted. Her ſubjects had the more reaſon to be pleaſed with her government, as their Sovereign, without demanding any ſubſidies, diſcharged all extraordinary expenſes out of the crown revenues (4), for ſhe did not, like her predeceſſors, ſquander her revenues on court-leaches. Her maxim was, to injure none, but to be extremely ſparing of her favors and treaſures, ever remembering in what indigence many of her progenitors had paſſed their days, tho' poſſeſſed of royal incomes, merely thro' exceſſive profuſion. This was what forced them to have recourſe to their parliaments, not to ſupply the public occaſions, but their own extravagances (5).

An' 1662. Elizabeth ſuſpects the counteſs of Lenox, and impriſons her. Camden.

It was not without reaſon that Elizabeth took ſo much pains to gain the love of her ſubjects, by the regularity ſhe introduced into her realm, ſince at the ſame time indeavors were uſed to corrupt and draw them into rebellion. The Papiſts began to aſſemble, and project reſtoring their religion by arms. Elizabeth having ſome intimation of theſe cabals, was deſirous to diſcover their ſourſe, and at laſt found it was the Scotiſh Queen who was to ſerve for pretext to the revolt, on account of her title to the Engliſh crown. The counteſs of Lenox, born from a ſecond marriage of Margaret Queen of Scotland with the earl of Angus, held with Queen Mary a ſecret correſpondence by letters. Here commenced Elizabeth's firſt diſcovery. As this counteſs had the ſame intereſt with Mary, ſince they both deſcended from Henry VII's eldeſt daughter, the Queen imagined this correſpondence was not without myſtery, and therefore ſent the earl and counteſs of Lenox to the Tower (6).

A conſpiracy againſt Queen Elizabeth takes vent. Camden.

Soon after, ſhe diſcovered that Arthur Pole, and his brother, deſcended from a Princeſs of the York family, with ſir Anthony Forteſcue, who had married their ſiſter, began to form a party in England. On this intelligence, they were ſent to priſon, and afterwards tried. They confeſſed a deſign of withdrawing into France to the duke of Guiſe, of returning thence into Wales with a French army, to proclaim the Scotiſh Queen Mary Queen of England, and Arthur Pole duke of Clarence. They however proteſted, that their meaning was not to execute their project during the life of Elizabeth who, they believed, would die before the year's end, having been ſo aſſured by ſome pretenders to aſtrology. Their own confeſſion condemned them; but the Queen, in conſideration of their illuſtrious deſcent, graciouſly pardoned their deliquencies.

The Queen's ſeverity to Catherine Grey. Camden.

Catherine Grey, daughter of the duke and ducheſs of Suffolk, and ſiſter of Jane Grey, beheaded in the laſt reign, was not treated with the ſame lenity as the above-named perſons, tho' ſhe was leſs criminal, and Elizabeth's near relative. She was called to account for a miſdemeanor, in the puniſhment whereof the Queen leſs ſhewed her zeal for juſtice, than her jealouſy and the longing deſire ſhe had to find a pretext to ſecure this kind of rival, who gave her ſome uneaſineſs. Catherine had been matched with Henry, the earl of Pembroke's eldeſt ſon (1), who had procured a divorce, becauſe he could not cohabit with her. Afterwards, the earl of Hertford privately married her, and then paſſed over to France. In his abſenſe, the Queen being informed of theſe clandeſtine nuptials, ſent Catherine to the Tower, notwithſtanding ſhe was very far advanced in her pregnancy. The earl returning and owning his marriage, was likewiſe confined in the ſame place. After this, the archbiſhop of Canterbury annulled their pretended marriage, becauſe it was not ſufficiently proved, and they both remained priſoners in the Tower. While there, the earl found means to get at her, and ſhe again became pregnant. He was hereupon charged with three capital crimes; namely, of breaking priſon; of corrupting a Princeſs of the blood-royal; and of abuſing her after having been judicially divorced from her; and for each offenſe, was fined five thouſand pounds (2). Finally, after a tedious impriſonment, and ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to have his ſentence reverſed, he was forced to renounce her by an authentic act: but Elizabeth continuing inexorable with regard to Catherine, the unhappy lady died in priſon. Before ſhe expired, ſhe deſired the lieutenant of the Tower to tell her Majeſty, that ſhe intreated her pardon for marrying without her permiſſion; thereby ſhewing that ſhe did ever conſider the earl of Hertford as her lawful huſband (3). This exceſs of rigor is no way to Elizabeth's credit; ſince it is plain, Catherine Grey's right to the crown, whether well or ill-grounded, was her chief offenſe.

Elizabeth diſtruſts the French and Spaniſh courts. Camden.

But it was not from the houſe of Suffolk that Elizabeth had moſt to fear. The Queen of Scotland was a rival abundantly more dangerous, as being powerfully ſupported. Her friends ſtill thought of ſeating her on the Engliſh throne, and only waited a favorable opportunity to put in execution their project. Elizabeth had occaſion to be convinced of this by her intelligence, that the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain, to ingage in their intereſts the King of Navarre, offered him their niece in marriage, and promiſed him poſſeſſion of the throne of England, by the aſſiſtance of his Holineſs and the Catholic King. Tho' this Prince had a wife, they little regarded the difficulty of annulling his marriage, becauſe his Queen Jane was a heretic (4). This ſatisfied Elizabeth, that the Lorrain Princes had not laid aſide their firſt deſign, and that Philip II was on the point of acceding to the confederacy. Thereupon, ſhe diſpatched ſir Henry Sidney into France, on ſome pretenſe, to inform himſelf exactly of the affairs of that kingdom, and of what was contriving againſt her, that ſhe might take her meaſures accordingly.

Affairs of France. Mezerai. Thuanus.

Catherine di Medicis ſtill continued to foment the diſſenſion between the two factions, and ſeemed inclining towards the Hugonots, who were the weakeſt. As the Guiſes had artfully perſuaded the Catholics, that their differences with the Prince of Condé concerned only religion, ſhe feared to ſee herſelf once more at their diſcretion, as ſhe had been in the laſt reign, if the Hugonots were oppreſſed. For this reaſon ſhe ſupported them, and procured them a favorable edict, ſtiled the Edict of January. The duke of Guiſe, penetrating her deſign, believed it time to break her meaſures, by ſuddenly ingaging both parties in a war. He accompliſhed his deſign by the maſſacre of Vaſſy, commited under his eyes, on a very ſlight occaſion. Then the Hugonots, unable to contain any longer, began the war by ſurpriſing Orleans, with the more reaſon, as the Queen-regent had applied to the Prince of Condé for his aſſiſtance, to free her and the King from the captivity wherein they were held by the Guiſes.

The Hugonots deſire ſuccors of Elizabeth; who concludes with them a treaty. Camden. P. Daniel.

I ſhall not deſcend to the particulars of this war, which may be ſeen in all the hiſtories of France. I ſhall only ſay, that the Hugonots, unſucceſsful in the firſt campain, ſent the Vidame of Chartres to Elizabeth, to implore ſuccors. Not long after his arrival at London, he concluded a treaty with Elizabeth, by which ſhe promiſed to furniſh the Hugonot leaders with a hundred thouſand crowns, and ſix thouſand foot, half to be imployed in the defenſe of Diepe and Roan, and the reſidue to be gariſoned at Havre de Grace. The Hugonots, on their ſide, ingaged to put the Queen in poſſeſſion of this latter place, to be kept 'till the reſtitution of Calais. The ſame day the treaty was ſigned, Elizabeth publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring the reaſons which obliged her to aſſiſt the Hugonots. She ſaid, pearance, ſhe would not have liked that a foreign Prince ſhould have uſed the other pretences, alledged in her manifeſto, to aid the Engliſh Papiſts, had they taken arms againſt her. But ſhe looked on the duke of Guiſe as her moſt mortal enemy, and the Scotiſh Queen's chief protector; for which niece of his, it manifeſtly appeared, he would have procured the crown of England. This duke was at the head of the Romiſh party, which was incomparably more powerful than that of the Hugonots. It might therefore very eaſily occur, that theſe would be extirpated, or at leaſt intirely diſabled; and the duke of Guiſe become abſolute maſter of court and kingdom, and imploy the whole force of France to execute his project in favor of his niece the Queen of Scotland. It is therefore eaſy to conceive the neceſſity Elizabeth was under to oppoſe the advancement of ſuch a formidable enemy, which was not to be done more ſucceſsfully than by aſſiſting the Hugonots. In maintaing the war in France, ſhe held the duke of Guiſe imployed, and rendered him incapable to attempt any thing againſt England. Paul de Foix, the French embaſſador, having notice of this treaty, required her, in virtue of the treaty of Cateau, to deliver to him the Vidame and all his attendants: but ſhe excuſed herſelf, and told him, ſhe would write to the King of France about it. She in effect did ſo; but not obtaining any favor for that nobleman, ſhe deemed not herſelf obliged to ſurrender him to the King.

The ſix thouſand Engliſh not imbarking 'till September, found, on their arrival, the King of Navarre before Roan. This was the reaſon of their ſeparating into two bodies only, of which one entered Diepe, and the other took poſſeſſion of Havre de Grace, according to the treaty of London. The earl of Warwick *, general of theſe forces, had been made governor of this latter place by Elizabeth. Mean time, the city of Roan was taken by aſſault, and the King of Navarre, who was wounded at the ſiege, died on his return to Paris. In the cloſe of this year, the battle of Dreux was fought between the Catholics and Hugonots, with almoſt equal loſs. The Prince of Condé and conſtable Montmorency, who commanded the two armies, were both taken priſoners, but the King's forces kept the field of battle. The Prince of Condé, not being able to head his party, admiral Chatillon took upon him the command of the army. I muſt now ſpeak of this year's tranſactions in Scotland.

James Stuart, created earl of Murray, held ſtill the firſt rank in the management of affairs; not ſo much from any affection the Queen had for him, as from her being adviſed to keep him conſtantly attached to her intereſt. It was indeed almoſt impoſſible for Mary, who had been educated in a court ſo averſe to the reformation, to have any great friendſhip for the earl her brother, whom ſhe conſidered as the head of the Reformed: nor did his auſtere temper too well agree with the luxury which the youthful Queen was introducing into her court. The preachers exclaimed from the pulpit againſt theſe worldly vanities, as very oppoſite to true religion. On the other hand, the earl of Murray, as well to ſupport his intereſt among the Reformed, as to follow his own inclination, frequently ſignified to the Queen, that this way of life would at length withdraw from her the eſteem and affection of her ſubjects. This furniſhed his adverſaries with a pretext to inſinuate to her Majeſty, that Murray's deſign was to keep her in ſervitude, and it would be impoſſible to reſtore the old religion while he had the direction of affairs: but, if Buchanan is to be credited, they were not ſatisfied with only uſing ſecret artifices to ruin him in the Queen's favor. This hiſtorian pretends that the duke of Chaterault, and the earls of Huntley and Bothwell combined to aſſaſſinate him; but that their conſpiracy was diſcovered by the earl of Arran. He adds, that the duke was puniſhed with the loſs of his government of Dunbarton; and Bothwell impriſoned in Edinburg caſtle, whence he found means to eſcape.

A deſign diſcovered againſt the earl of Murray. Buchanan.

But theſe were not Murray's moſt dangerous enemies. Buchanan ſays, the cardinal of Lorrain wrote to the Queen his niece, inciting her to diſpatch her ſaid brother, with ſome other zealous Proteſtants, on which condition ſhe might depend on a powerful aid from his Holineſs, in order to re-eſtabliſh the Catholic religion in Scotland. According to this hiſtorian, Mary determined on complying with the Pope and cardinal's deſires, and communicated her intentions to the earl of Huntley, who approved them, and promiſed his aſſiſtance. For this purpoſe it was that Queen Mary took a progreſs into the north, where lay the earl of Huntley's eſtate *, and where Papiſts were very numerous. But at the ſame time Huntley, finding the Queen, in order to execute her project, was going to a country which in a manner wholly depended on him, formed a deſign to carry her away, and force her to marry his eldeſt ſon George Gordon. Murray accompanying the Queen in her progreſs, diverſe obſtacles occured, which occaſioned the execution of the plot againſt him to be from day to day delayed. Mean while, the earl of Huntley and his ſon improved the occaſion to execute their project. One day, when the court was in a ſmall and ill-fortified town, George Gordon appeared with ſome troops in that neighborhood, in order to ſurpriſe the Queen's perſon: but, by unexpected good fortune, Murray found means to fruſtrate the intended treachery. This important ſervice effaced for ſome time the diſadvantageous impreſſions Mary had received of this earl.

The diſcovery of this plot ſufficed not to make the earl of Huntley deſiſt from his enterpriſe. He ſtill kept in arms with intent to ſurpriſe the court, where the earl of Sutherland was his ſpy, and informed him of whatever was there tranſacted. But a certain intercepted letter diſcovering all, Sutherland fled into Flanders, and the earl of Murray, at the head of ſome forces, marched againſt the earl of Huntley, who boldly ſtood his ground. In a battle fought on this occaſion, Huntly was defeated and taken priſoner, but died a few days after. His ſon George eſcaping, his father-in-law, the duke of Chateleraut, very earneſtly ſued for his pardon, and on ſome good hope given him by the Queen, put him into her hands. He was however conducted to Dunbar, tried and ſentenced to death: but the ſentence was not executed (1).

While all this paſſed in Scotland, James Melvil, author of the memoirs under his name, was imployed at Inſpruck, to ſound the inclinations of the Imperial court concerning the marriage of Queen Mary with the archduke Charles, ſecond ſon of the Emperor Ferdinand. The firſt overture of this deſign had been made by the cardinal of Lorrain, in his way thro' Inſpruck to the council of Trent, with offer of the kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, for a portion. "the Scots would be willing to aſſiſt their Queen "in obtaining the crown of England?" Hence it is plain, that the Guiſes had ſtill this deſign in view, and were inceſſantly laboring to put it in execution. We muſt not therefore wonder, that Elizabeth had her eye conſtantly fixed on the Queen of Scots, as on a moſt dangerous rival.

AN' 1563. Affairs of France. Mezerai. Thuanus. P. Daniel. Melvil.

Very early in 1563, the duke of Guiſe laid ſiege to Orleans, which was the magazine of the Hugonots, and where Andelot, admiral Coligni's brother, was ſhut up with a numerous gariſon. The place was now reduced to the laſt extremity, when Guiſe was mortally wounded with a piſtol-ſhot, by a gentleman named Poltrot. The duke, finding his end approached, teſtified exceſſive reluctance for having kindled the civil war, and ſeriouſly counſeled the Queen-regent to make peace on any terms. The admiral being charged with having been Guiſe's murderer, indeavored to clear himſelf; but the relations of the deceaſed perſiſted in their belief of his guilt. Mean while, a peace between the King and the Hugonots cloſely followed the duke of Guiſe's death, without any care taken by the Prince of Condé, to have his generous friend the Queen of England included. Nor was this all: for Charles IX, beſieging Havre de Grace, the Hugonots diſtinguiſhed themſelves in expelling the Engliſh from that place which themſelves had put into their hands. If their conduct on this occaſion evidenced them good Frenchmen, it was alſo a manifeſtation of their being very bad politicians. In effect, they could not have taken any one ſtep more detrimental to their own intereſt, or more acceptable to their enemies, than thus to break with the Engliſh. The earl of Warwick defended the place ſome time with great bravery and reſolution, but the peſtilence, which raged in the town, daily took off at leaſt fifty of his men, and reduced him to the neceſſity of a capitulation, whereby that town was reſtored to the King of France. Havre de Grace being thus reduced, a truce was concluded between the two crowns. The Engliſh forces which had ſerved in France, bringing the plague into England, it made terrible ravages, upwards of twenty thouſand dying in London only.

The death of Guiſe made ſome alteration in the affairs of the Queen of Scotland. Charles IX, declaring himſelf of age to govern, was under the influence of the Queen his mother, who not greatly loving her daughter-in-law gave her ſeveral mortifications. The payment of her dowry was diſcontinued, the Scotiſh guard diſmiſſed, and the duke of Chateleraut deprived of his revenues. The duke of Guiſe left a ſon, who was too young to have any ſhare in the government, and the cardinal of Lorrain had no longer the ſame credit as while his brother lived. Mary complaining of her ill treatment from the court of France, the cardinal her uncle, fearing ſhe might be provoked to turn towards Elizabeth, was more preſſing than ever for her marriage with the archduke, and did his utmoſt to effect it. Melvil however ſays in his memoirs, that he perceived at the Imperial court, it was not reliſhed by the Emperor's eldeſt ſon Maximilian. Howſoever this was, Mary readily received the propoſition. But as her uncle Guiſe's death had removed at a diſtance the proſpect ſhe had of aſcending the Engliſh throne, ſhe judged it requiſite to manage Elizabeth, and conſult her about the propoſed match. Elizabeth was alarmed at the deſign of allying the Scotiſh Queen with the Auſtrian family, not being ignorant with what views the cardinal of Lorrain offered his niece ſuch a marriage. She therefore, by her embaſſador Randolph, told Mary, "That, having for her the "tenderneſs of a ſiſter, and regarding her intereſts "as her own, ſhe deſired her to conſider, that "ſuch alliance would remove her for ever from "the throne of England, ſince the Engliſh would "never run the hazard of falling under Auſtrian "domination: that England was not without perſons who had their pretenſions to the crown as "well as herſelf, and might greatly imbaraſs her; "wherefore it was her intereſt to gain the affection "of the Engliſh, by a marriage which would not "give them uneaſineſs: that if any Engliſh noble "was ſo happy as to pleaſe her, ſuch a match "would doubtleſs remove the difficulties which lay "in the way of her deſire to be declared her preſumptive heir." This was the ſubſtance of what Randolph was ordered to repreſent to the Queen of Scotland, without however naming the perſon Elizabeth would counſel her to eſpouſe: but he had a ſecret commiſſion to intimate to the earl of Murray, and ſecretary Lidington, that he believed ſhe had caſt her eyes on lord Dudley.

ELIZAB. AN' 1563.

Elizabeth's anſwer threw Mary into great perplexity. She, by her birth at leaſt, believed herſelf Elizabeth's rightful heir; but Henry VIII, having not ranged her in the line of ſucceſſion, a parliamentary ſtatute was neceſſary to reſtore her to her right. Without this, ſhe was in danger that, in caſe Elizabeth died iſſueleſs, King Henry's will would be punctually obſerved. On the other hand, her uncertainty whether Elizabeth would cauſe ſuch a ſtatute to be inacted in her favor, and declare her heir to the Engliſh crown, made her unwilling to relinquiſh the hope given her by the cardinal her uncle, of acceding thereto by the aſſiſtance of the Pope, France, Spain, and the Engliſh Catholics. Thus imbaraſſed, ſhe choſe to inform the cardinal of Elizabeth's remonſtrances, and of that Queen's deſign to marry her to Dudley. The cardinal anſwered, "That Dudley was not a perſon worthy "of her, and that Elizabeth only amuſed her, in "pretending to match her with a man whom ſhe "deſigned for her own bed. That as to the hope "wherewith ſhe was flattered, of being declared "her preſumptive heir, it was not much to be re"lied on; ſince, even ſhould ſhe keep her word, "ſhe might have children, which would render the "act of no uſe, or might get it repealed on the "ſlighteſt pretext. That it was therefore more "agreeable to her intereſt, to depend on the aſ"ſiſtance of her real friends, than on ſuch uncer"tain hopes."

Mary's perplexity. Camden.

Notwithſtanding this counſel, Mary, after a mature examination of what had been offered on both ſides, failed not to reſolve on deſiſting from the deſign of eſpouſing the archduke, leſt it ſhould do her a prejudice in England. But withal, ſhe determined to evade the propoſal intended to be made her concerning Dudley, without however breaking with Elizabeth. It abſolutely concerned her to ſhew a regard for that Princeſs, in order with more facility to carry on her intrigues in England, and increaſe there the number of her friends, which was already conſiderable. Beſide that the Catholics were all for her, many Proteſtants were perſuaded, that the crown, if Elizabeth died without heirs of her body, could not be refuſed her without injuſtice, and the leaſt diſcontent was capable to create a belief in many, that Mary had even a better title than Elizabeth herſelf. This gave great uneaſineſs to Elizabeth, who feared that Mary, by marrying a Catholic Prince, would be inabled to ſupport her pretenſions; and therefore ſhe did her utmoſt to divert her from ſuch a deſign. To this end, ſhe told Melvil, in his return thro' England, how much it would offend her if Queen Mary married without her advice. She added, as it was their common intereſt to live in a good underſtanding, ſhe deſigned to make her two offers, that by imbracing either ſhe might avoid the jealouſy which her

The ducheſs of Suffolk dies. Camden.

This year died the ſo frequently mentioned Frances Brandon, ducheſs of Suffolk. She had condeſcended to take for her third huſband Adrian Stokes, a private gentleman, by whom ſhe had not any iſſue. Of three daughters by her former marriage with Grey, marquis of Dorſet, and afterwards duke of Suffolk, Jane, the eldeſt, had been proclaimed Queen on the deceaſe of King Edward VI, and loſt her head on a ſcaffold. Catherine was in the Tower, or perhaps already dead. Her third daughter, Mary, had been given in marriage to a man ſo little diſtinguiſhed, that there was no likelihood of her being put in competition with the Queen of Scotland. Thus, by the ducheſs of Suffolk's death, Queen Mary ſaw herſelf freed from one rival, who was King Henry VII's granddaughter.

AN' 1564. Peace between France and England. Camden. Stow. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 640. p 644.

The truce between France and England finally terminated in a peace, ſigned at Troye in Champagne the eleventh of April, 1564. By this treaty, the King of France and Queen of England preſerved intire all their pretenſions, without mentioning any in particular, not even the reſtitution of Calais. Only ſome ſeparate articles remained unſigned 'till next day, concerning the hoſtages delivered to Elizabeth after the treaty of Cateau, which ſhe was willing to reſtore for a very moderate ſum. Throckmorton, who had been arreſted in France on ſome pretenſe (1), was ſet at liberty. After this, Elizabeth complimented King Charles with St. George's garter by lord Hunſdon *, who was ſent into France to ſee the peace ſworn to.

Diſturbances between England and the Netherlands. Camden. Strada.

At this time, the commerce between England and the Netherlands was intirely ſpoiled by the artifices of cardinal Granvelle. As he foreſaw a war was going to be kindled in thoſe provinces, he was willing to remove the Engliſh, and for that purpoſe had prevailed with the governeſs to forbid the importation of Engliſh cloths. This prohibition obliged the Engliſh to ſet up a ſtaple for their cloths at Embden, a town of Eaſt Frieſland. But a new embaſſador ſent to England by King Philip, in the room of the biſhop of Aquila, who died there, conſidering that his maſter's ſubjects would, from this interruption of commerce, receive no leſs damage than the Engliſh, brought this affair to a negociation. As great difficulties occurred, it was mutually agreed, that the treaty of commerce, called the Great Intercourſe †, ſettled in the time of Maximilian, ſhould ſubſiſt 'till one of the parties notified the contrary to the other, with allowance of forty days to the merchants to withdraw their effects. This affair was very important to both nations. Camden ſays, that in his time the commerce between England and the Netherlands amounted annually to more than twelve millions of gold; and that the woollen trade alone included upwards of five millions.

Elizabeth viſits the univerſity of Cambridge. Hollingſh. p. 1206. Camden.

This buſineſs concluded, Queen Elizabeth viſited the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with great pomp and magnificence. She teſtified her ſatisfaction in a fine Latin oration, wherein ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection, and intention to incourage learning to the utmoſt of her ability.

Difference between the two Queens. Melvil.

The tranquillity Elizabeth then injoyed would have been compleat, had not her ſuſpicions of the Scotiſh Queen given her inceſſant diſquiet. It was on her ſhe was perpetually reflecting, as on her moſt dangerous adverſary. She conſidered that the marriage of this Queen might prove to her a ſourſe of cares and troubles, and draw on her even greater evils. So, her whole policy tended either to obſtruct all marriages offered to Mary, or at leaſt to effect her eſpouſing a perſon from whom England ſhould have nothing to apprehend. With this view ſhe wrote her a letter, wherein, after many demonſtrations of friendſhip, ſhe gave her advice concerning her marriage, telling her, the marrying without her conſent would ruin her affairs. Notwithſtanding Mary's determination to have preſerved a good intelligence with Elizabeth, ſhe was greatly picqued at her thus aſſuming to give her counſel, and even with a certain air of ſuperiority which was but too evident. Forgeting therefore what ſhe had reſolved, and thinking only of making herſelf ſatisfaction, ſhe returned ſuch a reply as highly offended Elizabeth. But ſome time after, reflecting that ſhe herſelf broke her own meaſures, in breaking with Elizabeth, ſhe diſpatched ſir James Melvil to pay her compliments, and to attempt mending what her impatience had ſpoiled. Elizabeth received her compliments with equal diſſimulation. After telling Melvil, how much cauſe ſhe had to be offended with the letter, ſhe tore it (2) in his preſenſe, teſtifying her readineſs to be reconciled, and expreſſing ſuch affection for her good ſiſter as aſſuredly ſhe had not. It was not her intereſt to quarrel, for fear of inducing Mary to marry ſome Prince who would not have patience to wait the time of injoying her ſucceſſion. She therefore imbraced this occaſion to renew her inſtances to Mary for her choice of a huſband proper to preſerve their friendſhip, and a good intelligence between the two kingdoms. All this tended only to a ſpecious exhibition of ſeveral reaſons to perſuade Mary to accept lord Dudley, tho' he was not directly named. However, it is very uncertain, whether Elizabeth ever really deſigned ſuch match, or only intended to amuſe Mary, and prevent her thinking on others: nay, it is very probable that Dudley's being propoſed was only to prolong the affair; as that lord's dependance was ſo abſolutely on the Queen of England. This ſeems to be confirmed, by the permiſſion Elizabeth afterwards granted the counteſs of Lenox's ſon, lord Darnly, to go into Scotland, tho' ſhe was not ignorant that Mary had ſome thought of marrying that nobleman, as ſhe intimated to Melvil. In effect, Mary had actually reſolved it, not in compliance with Elizabeth's counſel, to eſpouſe ſome perſon little able to give her uneaſineſs, but in hopes of receiving a conſiderable advantage from this marriage. It had been often hinted to her, that there was room to doubt, whether her title to the crown of England was ſo good as the ducheſs of Suffolk's, which was ſupported by Henry VIII's will, and that this was a point to be decided by Engliſh lawyers. This was to keep her in ſubmiſſion, and prevent her diſobliging Elizabeth. When this thorn was removed by the death of the ducheſs of Suffolk, and Catherine her daughter, the rights of the counteſs of Lenox, daughter of Margaret Queen of Scotland by her ſecond huſband Archibald earl of Angus, began to be whiſpered. Henry VIII, her uncle, had given her in marriage to Matthew Stuart earl of Lenox, who retired into England, as in that Prince's reign was obſerved. In reality, the counteſs of Lenox could not, with any ſeeming juſtice, enter into competition with Queen Mary, ſince ſhe came only of Margaret's ſecond marriage, whereas Mary proceeded from the firſt: but

To avoid therefore ſuch competition, Mary had determined on uniting the two families titles by her marriage with lord Darnly, the counteſs of Lenox's ſon, and thereby diſabling Elizabeth from creating her any diſturbance. Elizabeth had for the ſame reaſon reſolved to obſtruct this marriage, not from any fear of lord Darnly, but with intent to keep Mary always in awe and ſubmiſſion.

She draws the earl of Lenox into Scotland. Camden. Melvil, p. 42. Buchanan.

The two Queens being reconciled, as has been intimated, Mary ſeriouſly thought of executing her deſign. But as ſhe was prepoſſeſſed with a belief, that Elizabeth only ſought to amuſe her and prevent her from marrying, ſhe was under a neceſſity of imploying ſome artifice to draw the earl of Lenox and his ſon into Scotland. She began with the father, and pretended to recall him in order to reſtore him to his eſtate, forfeited during the regency of the duke of Chateleraut. Elizabeth thought it not right to oppoſe the earl of Lenox's return home on a motive ſo juſt and reaſonable. In this whole affair the two Queens behaved with equal diſſimulation. At the very time Mary was taking meaſures to marry lord Darnly, unknown to Elizabeth, ſhe pretended a readineſs to be directed by her counſels: ſhe even conſented to a congreſs of commiſſioners of both kingdoms, concerning her marriage, tho' ſhe was not ignorant of Elizabeth's intentions to propoſe to her Dudley, lately created earl of Leiceſter. On the other hand, Elizabeth, not unacquainted with Mary's deſign to marry lord Darnly, ſeemed not to perceive it, being well pleaſed to have her fix her thoughts on a ſubject whom ſhe believed to be at her diſpoſal, becauſe the earl his father had great poſſeſſions in England: ſhe hoped therefore to have it always in her power to break off or delay this marriage, as ſhe ſhould judge proper, her ſole aim being to gain time, and amuſe the Queen of Scotland.

This cauſed Mary, who had already no very good opinion of Elizabeth, to regard her as a ſecret enemy who, tho' ſhe always ſtiled, her Good Siſter, did not mean her well. Sometimes ſhe thought Elizabeth only propoſed the earl of Leiceſter to her, that ſhe herſelf might marry him with the leſs diſhonor, after his having been incouraged by a Queen; and ſometimes, that this propoſal was no other than mere artifice, to waſte time in fruitleſs negociations.

As he perfectly underſtood muſic (3), and ſung a good baſs, he got acquainted with the court-muſicians, and was introduced to the Queen, who wanting a baſs to her concert, deſired the embaſſador to leave him with her. His fine voice often procuring him the honor of both ſeeing and diſcourſing her Majeſty, he ſo artfully inſinuated himſelf into her good graces, that he daily increaſed in favor and credit. At length the ſecretary for French diſpatches being gone over to France, Rizzo was pitched on to officiate during his abſenſe. He thenceforward puſhed his fortune ſo ſucceſsfully, that he became as it were prime miniſter, nothing of moment being tranſacted at court but by his channel. Buchanan, the Queen's great enemy, frequently inſinuates, that David's influence over her was not confined to public affairs only. He ſays, ſhe admited him to her table, and very often dined at his, and by ſuch uncommon familiarities gave occaſion to ſcandalous ſuſpicions. In a word, he ſays enough to incline thoſe who pay him intire credit to believe Queen Mary's conduct, with regard to Rizzo, not to be free from crime: but as Buchanan may juſtly be ſuſpected of agravation, it is better to adhere to Melvil's account. He can be accuſed of no deſign to aſperſe the reputation of that Princeſs, ſince he rather on all occaſions expreſſes for her a ſingular zeal, without however ſcreening her faults and imprudencies. At the ſame time when Rizzo was moſt in favor with her Majeſty, ſhe had ſo intire a confidence in Melvil, as even to allow, or rather commanded him to admoniſh her of her falſe ſteps. Take what this author ſays of Rizzo in his memoirs.

He becomes the Queen's favorite.

" As he entered in great credit, ſo he had not the " prudence to manage the ſame rightly; for fre- " quently, in preſenſe of the nobility, he would be " publicly ſpeaking to the Queen, even when there " was greateſt conventions of the ſtates, which " made him to be much envied and hated, eſpe- " cially when he became ſo great, that he preſented " all ſignatuers to be ſubſcribed by her Majeſty. " So that ſome of the nobility would frown upon " him, others would ſhoulder and ſhut him by, " when they entered the Queen's chamber and " found him always ſpeaking with her. All who " had any buſineſs at court, addreſſing themſelves " to him, in ſhort time he became very rich.— " As he was a known minion, and ſuſpected to be " a penſioner of the Pope, it gave ground of " ſuſpicion, that ſome deſign would be by him " contrived againſt the reformed religion." The ſame author adds, that having himſelf repreſented to her Majeſty the injury which her favors upon this ſtranger now did, and might afterwards do her, his remonſtrance was very ill received, the Queen telling him, ſhe would not be ſo far reſtrained, but that ſhe might diſpenſe her favors to ſuch as ſhe pleaſed. He farther ſays that, having remonſtrated to Rizzo how much he offended the nobility by his affectation to appear ſo great with the Queen, he ſeemed to pay ſome regard to his advice, but within a few days, told him; he had the Queen's order to behave as he was wont, without minding any thing. the ſilence of Camden who, having undertaken, in his annals of Elizabeth, to juſtify the Queen of Scots, ſays nothing of Rizzo, evidently demonſtrates that Mary was abſolutely governed by this miniſter, favorite, or minion. So, lord Darnly being a Catholic, and Rizzo the Pope's penſioner, as Melvil affirms, it is not to be doubted that Queen Mary was determined to this marriage by her favorite's advice: it was therefore to have opportunity of drawing that young lord into Scotland, that ſhe reſtored his father to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate.

As this was to be done in the aſſembly of the ſtates, ſummoned to meet in January, Darnly demanded leave to be abſent three months, in order to be at the Scotiſh parliament, and obtained it by the interceſſion of Cecil, who never imagined he would, without Queen Elizabeth's concurrence, venture to marry the Scotiſh Queen. Very ſeemingly, he was ſuffered to go into Scotland only with intent to amuſe Queen Mary, and perhaps to give her opportunity to entertain for that moſt perſonable young nobleman a paſſion which might hinder her thinking on any other. However this be, he was well received by the Queen, who immediately gave him great marks of her eſteem; and it was ſoon known that ſhe deſigned him the honor of her bed. Rizzo contracted with him ſo cloſe a friendſhip, that they were conſtant bed-fellows.

The earl of Murray's credit declines, and his enemies brought in favor. Buchanan. Thuanus.

After Rizzo had ingroſſed the Queen's favor, the earl of Murray ſaw his own credit daily decline. This, added to the intended marriage, and the ſtrict union between Darnly and this Italian, convinced him it was time to retire, and to haſten him the Queen recalled to court all his adverſaries. The earl of Bothwell returned from France, the earl of Sutherland from Flanders, and George Gordon, who was impriſoned at Dunbar, and under ſentence of death, was releaſed, and after obtaining his pardon took the title of earl of Huntley. Murray could not, without a ſtrong revival of his reſentment, look on Bothwell, who would have been his butcher. He impeached him juridically, and prevailed to have a day aſſigned for trial. Mary, according to Buchanan, imployed her utmoſt efforts to ingage Murray to drop his proſecution, and, not ſucceeding, attempted to corrupt his judges. Notwithſtanding ſo powerful a protection, Bothwell, not thinking proper to appear, withdrew. Afterwards, the Queen obtained from Murray a ſort of reconciliation with Bothwell. The ſame hiſtorian pretends, that Queen Mary had conceived againſt Murray ſuch violent averſion that, jointly with Darnly and Rizzo ſhe formed a deſign to have him aſſaſſinated in a journey ſhe purpoſely made to Perth, but that Murray, having thereof ſome notice, retired to his mother's at Lochleven. He farther ſays that, during Mary's being at Perth, a report was induſtriouſly raiſed, that Murray intended to ſurpriſe her and lord Darnly, in their return to Edinburg. To render more credible this rumor, ſcouts were ſent out on the road, and the Queen came to Edinburg with a precipitation apt to create a belief of the greatneſs of her danger. It muſt however be owned, that Melvil ſpeaks of a conſpiracy to ſeize lord Darnly as ſomething real, tho' Buchanan will have it to be all imaginary; but Melvil does not aſcribe it to Murray alone, ſince the duke of Chateleraut, the earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Rothes were alſo concerned.

Murray averſe to the Queen's marriage with Darnly. Buchanan. Thuanus.

The earl of Murray had a double intereſt to obſtruct the projected marriage, the one particular, the other general. I have already taken notice of the firſt, which ingaged him to make many changes at court, where he could no longer ſupport himſelf. The general one flowed, firſt, from the danger into which Mary's marrying a Papiſt might throw the reformed religion; ſecondly, it was to be feared, that ſuch marriage, being made without the Queen of England's particiſpation, or any care for the preſervation and ſupport of the reformed religion, would lay a foundation for troubles in which it was almoſt impoſſible for England and France not to be concerned, to Scotland's extreme detriment. Nor was Murray the only perſon whom this match diſguſted. The duke of Chateleraut, ſworn enemy to the houſe of Lenox, the earls of Argyle, Rothes, Marr, Glencairn, and many others, ſome from private views, others from honeſter motives, believed it time to apply effectual remedies to the impending miſchiefs, by making a league to oppoſe the court's deſigns. It is not eaſy to decide, whether theſe lords took arms before or after the Queen's marriage. Buchanan intimates this was not 'till after, on the court's intending to oppreſs them. Melvil intimates a riſing of thoſe peers after having miſſed ſeizing lord Darnly, and then proceeds to the recital of Mary's nuptials. Camden poſitively aſſerts, that the Queen, to celebrate her matrimonials in greater ſurety, marched with ſome forces againſt the confederate lords, and conſtrained them to take refuge in England. If this be fact, ſhe doubtleſs ſurpriſed them before they were prepared. This is not the only paſſage wherein Camden and Buchanan diſagree.

However this be, Mary, being determined on her marriage, had already applied to his Beatitude for a diſpenſation (1). When ſhe knew it was granted, ſhe aſſembled the grandees of her court, who were all devoted to her, and aſked their advice concerning her marriage. They unanimouſly approved it; but, not to exaſperate the people, they ſaid, care was to be taken of the Proteſtant religion. The firſt part of this approbation was joyfully received; but as for the annexed reſtriction, it was no more heard of. Buchanan ſays, the earl of Murray undertook to procure Elizabeth's conſent, provided the Proteſtant religion was ſecured. But this was not the intention of thoſe at court, who perceived this ſecurity would be no other than Queen Elizabeth's guaranty, which agreed neither with Mary's own intereſts nor with thoſe of Rizzo, and the lords newly come in favor.

Mary has her marriage approved by her court grandees Camden. Spotſwood.

Mean time, thro' the confederate lords inſtigations, the people began to murmur. It was debated in private converſations, whether the Queen could marry without the ſtates concurrence. Some ſaid, ſhe could not be denied a natural right injoyed by all her ſubjects. Others maintained, that the Queen's and her ſubjects conditions were different, becauſe the Queen, by her marriage, gave her people a Sovereign, which ſhe could not do without their conſent. Theſe freedoms convinced Mary that ſhe muſt haſten her nuptials, not to be any longer expoſed to the difficulties which might be ſtarted while there was hope to obſtruct it. She however believed, ſhe could not avoid aſking, not the advice but the approbation of Elizabeth, whom, as I obſerved, it was her intereſt to manage. She therefore wrote her ſaid Majeſty a letter, communicating her deſign as a matter reſolved. Elizabeth, on ſight of this letter, aſſembled her council, who very attentively examined the affair. The reſult was, that the Scotiſh Queen's marriage with Darnly was dangerous to religion and the realm. ſtore in Scotland her own creed, which would be extremely detrimental to that of the Proteſtants. To the realm, as Mary uniting by this marriage the intereſts of the two houſes which could pretend to the Engliſh crown, ſeemed to have a deſign of forming in the kingdom a powerful faction, and preventing her cabals from being interrupted by oppoſing againſt her the houſe of Lenox. For theſe reaſons, ſome of the counſellors were for inſtantly ſending into that kingdom a body of forces to ſupport the malecontents: but Elizabeth judged it not proper to be ſo precipitate, and the more as the alledging that her marriage might be dangerous to England was but a weak pretenſe for making war upon the Queen of Scots (1). She therefore contented herſelf with ſending ſir Nicolas Throckmorton, to make her ſenſible of the hazard ſhe ran of loſing her expectation of aſcending the throne of England, by a marriage ſo diſagreeable to the Engliſh. Mary's reply was, that the affair was too far advanced to be recalled; nor had Queen Elizabeth any ground to diſapprove this match, ſince by her advice ſhe had now choſe an Engliſhman, deſcended from the royal blood of both kingdoms, and the firſt nobleman of all Britain. Throckmorton, unable to prevail with Mary, ſignified to the earl of Lenox and lord Darnly, that their licenſe being expired, if they did not return to England their eſtates would be forfeited (2). This menace was not ſufficient to command their obedience in ſuch a juncture: nevertheleſs, they both wrote to her Majeſty very ſubmiſſively, and Darnly in particular proteſted, that he only accepted the honor done him by the Queen of Scotland, with intent to preſerve a perfect harmony between the two crowns.

But this was not the only commiſſion wherewith that embaſſador was charged. He had alſo inſtructions to incourage the diſcontented nobles, and give them hopes of Queen Elizabeth's protection. Very ſeemingly, it was from this incouragement that they took arms to oppoſe the marriage. But Mary prevented them, by having it ſolemniſed the twenty-ninth of July, with all the Romiſh ceremonials, in her own chapel. Buchanan ſays, ſhe had two other reaſons to accelerate her nuptials. The firſt was, her apprehenſion of oppoſition from the cardinal of Lorrain, who wiſhed her to make a more conſiderable alliance. The other was, that Rizzo was willing to recommend himſelf to his Sanctity, by giving the Queen a Catholic huſband, without any ſecurity for the Proteſtant religion.

Mean time, the confederate lords being cited, and not appearing, Mary, whether before or after her marriage, put herſelf at the head of four thouſand men, and purſuing them from place to place, finally obliged them to retire into England. There they found a ſafe retreat (3), notwithſtanding the treaty of the year 1560, whereby the two Queens mutually promiſed to ſurrender each other's fugitive rebels: but ſuch articles are uſually very ill obſerved. Melvil relates a particular which deſerves notice. The Scotiſh fugitive lords having deputed to Elizabeth the earl of Murray, to deſire her protection, ſhe politicly induced him, in the preſenſe of the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, to acknowledge, that ſhe was not concerned in their rebellion; but the words were no ſooner out of Murray's mouth, than ſhe called them rebels and traitors, and forbid them her preſenſe. This was to clear herſelf to the embaſſadors: but it was all mere grimace, ſince ſhe ſtill granted the fugitives a ſafe retreat in her kingdom; nay, privately ſupplied them with money by the duke of Bedford (4).

Camden.

Mary's marrying a Papiſt, Rizzo's great credit, and the concern of many for the fate of the revolted peers, produced among the Scots much diſcontent, which daily increaſed by the ſecret intrigues of the relations and friends of the fugitives. The preachers ſtill greatly inflamed it, by inſinuating to their auditories, that religion was in imminent danger. All this notwithſtanding, the court, now proſperous and elate, did, contrary to the rules of policy, and at a juncture when the kingdom was diſſatisfied, reſolve to degrade, baniſh, and out-law the fugitive peers, by a formal decree. To this end, the ſtates were ſummoned to meet in February the year inſuing. Melvil ſays, in his memoirs, that having repreſented to the Queen the miſchiefs this rigor might produce, ſhe at firſt ſeemed to regard him, but perſiſted nevertheleſs in her reſolution, for two reaſons. The firſt was, the avarice of Rizzo, whoſe eye turned towards the confiſcation of thoſe exiles eſtates: the ſecond was, the powerful ſollicitation of the cardinal of Lorrain againſt them. He ſtill meditated placing the Queen his niece on the throne of England, and therefore judged, if the Scotiſh fugitives, as they were the chieftains of the Proteſtants, were once ruined, it would be eaſy to re-eſtabliſh in Scotland the Romiſh religion, and afterwards thence to invade Elizabeth. Doubtleſs, Rizzo, the Pope's creature, acted from the ſame motive, and, in all appearance, the new King was no enemy to the project. If Elizabeth is to be credited in what ſhe ſome years after wrote to her embaſſador in France, Mary and lord Darnly, from the moment of their marriage, never ceaſed intriguing againſt England. On this ſuppoſition, it will not appear ſtrange that Elizabeth fomented the troubles in Scotland, to incapacitate her enemies from invading her.

During this interim, Elizabeth ſent into Scotland Tamworth *, with a letter written with her own hand, wherein ſhe demanded of Mary, that lord Darnley, on whom ſhe vouchſafed to beſtow the title of King, ſhould be delivered up to her, according to the tenor of their treaty. Mary refuſed giving the embaſſador audience; but condeſcended to receive the letter. While ſhe was reading it in preſenſe of ſome lords, Rizzo came in, and ſnatching it out of her hands, hindered her from proceeding. He judged that Elizabeth demanded the King, only to oblige Queen Mary to pardon the exiles, to which he could not agree, being determined to ruin them, tho' the earl of Murray had ſent him a very ſubmiſſive letter, with a fine diamond incloſed. Mary anſwered Elizabeth, That ſhe would not attempt any thing againſt England ſo long as ſhe lived, "provided ſhe was declared her preſumptive heir by act of parliament." With regard to her fugitive ſubjects, ſhe deſired to be left at liberty to diſpoſe of them as ſhe pleaſed, ſince ſhe interfered not with the tranſactions of England.

ſhould know how little ſhe valued him. When they were firſt married, ſhe had cauſed the King's name to be ſet with her own in all public acts, and on the coin; but preſently after ſhe ordered her own to be placed before the King's, and even cauſed his to be omited in the money-ſtamp. Mean while, if we may believe Buchanan, ſhe continued, without any reſerve, her ſcandalous familiarities with Rizzo. Melvil ſays not ſo much on this ſubject; but, beſide his plain intimations, he manifeſtly ſuppoſes it, otherwiſe there would be no coherence in what he relates. As for Camden, who makes it his buſineſs to vindicate Mary on all occaſions, he ſcarce mentions Rizzo; and for this Queen's averſion to her huſband, he taxes the earl of Murray, then a fugitive in England, with having excited it by his letters and friends. He pretends that, from the alteration injoined by Mary with reſpect to public inſtruments and the coin, Murray took occaſion to ſow diſcord between them; ſo aſſigning for cauſe what was only the effect of the Queen's averſion.

Her behavior to Rizzo very ſcandalous. Buchanan.

Buchanan muſt be copied, to repreſent fully all the mortifications Mary made the King undergo, the affronts ſhe put upon him, and the little diſcretion ſhe obſerved in her familiarities with Rizzo (1). Perhaps this hiſtorian has greatly exagerated: however, it cannot be denied that the King was jealous. The queſtion is to know, whether the Queen gave occaſion for this jealouſy, as Buchanan pretends; or whether, as Camden affirms, the earl of Murray, tho' abſent, inſtilled it into the King, without any foundation, by letters and his friends intrigues (2). Melvil, who ought not to be looked on as a ſuſpected evidence, plainly ſuppoſes the King's jealouſy, without one word of the cauſe, and it may be almoſt affirmed, that had he thought the Queen intirely innocent, he would not have failed clearing her. He adds, that the friends of the fugitive lords improving the viſible diſunion between their Majeſties, and the King's diſpoſition with regard to Rizzo, induced him to determine on diſpatching that favorite, in order, by his death, to put a ſtop to the proſecution of the fugitives, who properly had not any other adverſary. This ſeems to confirm what Buchanan ſays, ſince Melvil ſuppoſes the King's jealouſy, and ſince the friends of thoſe exiles only made uſe of the King's diſpoſition. On the other hand, Camden ſeems to have ſaid juſtly, that the earl of Murray's friends inſpired the King with the deſign to get rid of Rizzo. But we ſhall ſoon ſee that, by the friends of the fugitive peers, Melvil did not mean the earl of Murray's particular partiſans, but rather thoſe of the other lords, who alſo had taken refuge in England.

The King having taken this reſolution, and conſulted ſome of his domeſtics how to execute it, the Queen, who thereof had notice, was ſo inraged at him, as made him ſtill more ſenſible how highly ſhe was concerned at what regarded that unworthy favorite. As the deſign was diſcovered, the King grew apprehenſive for his own life, and not knowing what courſe to take, aſked advice of his father the earl of Lenox, who was of opinion, privately to recall the fugitive lords, and by their aid ſtrengthen himſelf againſt Rizzo's attempts. Probably, it was then the King notified to thoſe exiles, that they might return to Scotland; whether he only gave them ſome general hope of a revolution to their advantage, or acquainted them with his moſt ſecret deſigns.

The members of the Scotiſh parliament daily repaired to Edinburg, in the begining of the year 1566. As they arrived, Rizzo openly ſollicited them to obtain a ſentence againſt the fugitive lords, notwithſtanding the warm inſtances of the Engliſh embaſſador, who conjured the Queen to pardon them, or at leaſt to defer judgment. Theſe inſtances were ſo far from moving her, that they rather helped to confirm her reſolution, becauſe ſhe conſidered Elizabeth as a capital enemy againſt whom ſhe was to guard. Theſe exiled peers being heads of the Proteſtants, it is probable the Queen of England demanded their pardon only to have ſo many powerful friends when they ſhould return home: but this was preciſely what the Queen and Rizzo were reſolved at any rate to prevent; as being very ſenſible how extremely difficult their projects would be to be accompliſhed when theſe lords were in Scotland, and therefore they were to be deprived of all hopes to return.

Mean while, the King conſulted with the earl of Morton, and ſome other friends, how to diſpatch Rizzo. His inſtruments were lord Ruthven, and George Douglaſs, natural ſon to the earl of Angus, Morton only adviſing the thing, without lending his aſſiſtance, and it was executed in this manner. The Queen being at table, and Rizzo in her chamber, the King went up a private ſtair-caſe, and ſtood ſome time leaning on her chair. Preſently after, lord Ruthven and George Douglaſs entered well armed, and attended with ſome of their accomplices, the reſt having poſted themſelves in diverſe parts of the palace to prevent obſtruction. By the abrupt breaking in of theſe men the table was overturned. The Queen demanding of Ruthven, what was his deſign, he vouchſafed her no anſwer; but addreſſing himſelf to Rizzo, in a magiſterial tone, commanded him to quit the room, the place he ſat in not becoming him: by this, it ſeems, Rizzo was at table with her Majeſty. Howſoever it was, Rizzo, perceiving he was the mark leveled at, caught hold, trembling, on the Queen's robe, to put himſelf, as it were, under her protection, while ſhe, on her part, did all ſhe could to interpoſe herſelf between him and the conſpirators. But the King catching her in his arms, and telling her ſhe had nothing to fear, hindered her from expoſing herſelf to the danger, and withal from ſcreening Rizzo. Melvil having diſcharged his commiſſion, the provoſt replied, he would do all he could for her Majeſty's ſervice, but that much aſſiſtance was not to be expected from the people, who were highly diſguſted with the government. However ſome appearing in arms before the palace, the King ſhewed himſelf from a window, and aſſuring them that Rizzo had been killed by his command, injoined them to withdraw, which order they inſtantly obeyed (3).

Vindication of the earl of Murray againſt Camden's accuſations. Melvil, p. 65,

Mean while the Queen, not doubting Rizzo's murder was in favor of the fugitives, and that they would ſpeedily return into Scotland, ordered Melvil, by one of her ladies, to attempt gaining the earl of Murray, and intreat him in her name not to join with her enemies, for which he might aſſure himſelf of her conſtant love, favor and acknowledgment. In effect, Murray and the other fugitive lords arrived two days after Rizzo's death, having had notice of the change which was to happen at court. Camden, from the ſudden arrival of the fugitives, draws this conjecture, that Rizzo muſt have been aſſaſſinated purely for the ſake of Murray, whom the ſtates were, two days after, to have condemned: but, on the contrary, it appears in Melvil's memoirs, that the earl of Murray's peculiar friends had no manner of concern in the fact, ſince he deemed not himſelf any way obligated to the actors. What Melvil ſays, on this occaſion, evidences that the conſequence drawn by Camden againſt the earl of Murray, from the ſudden arrival of the fugitives, is not juſt. His

Can any thing be more oppoſite to Camden's inference? This hiſtorian will have Rizzo to have been murdered merely on the earl of Murray's account, and in order to prevent his condemnation, without mentioning the other fugitive lords, as if their friends had no hand at all

And yet Melvil, who was then preſent in the court, and wrote long before him, ſays poſitively, that the friends of the other fugitive lords were the ſole authors of this murder, and that the earl of Murray's were no way ingaged. By ſuch ſtrokes as this, and by perpetual invectives againſt Murray, Camden has diſfigured the Scotiſh hiſtory of thoſe days, and withal that of England in what it has in common with this neighboring kingdom.

While the Queen was held under confinement, Scotland was in a real anarchy; however it was of no long continuance. The King ſoon began to repent his following ſuch violent counſels, and the Queen, who perceived it, managed him ſo artfully, that ſhe perſuaded him to abandon Rizzo's murderers (5). This unexpected turn amazed them, eſpecially as, very contrary to what they expected, they found that the earl of Murray would not join them. The Queen imbracing this fair opportunity, propoſed agreement, to which they readily conſented, unable as they were to ſupport themſelves: but ſhe had the addreſs to have the articles ſo worded that diverſe alterations muſt neceſſarily be made before matters could be adjuſted. This was done to gain time, and afford her Majeſty leiſure to take neceſſary meaſures to free herſelf from captivity. When the writing was ſettled to the parties ſatisfaction, ſhe repreſented to the King, that if ſhe ſigned it while a priſoner, it would be of no force, and by that means ſhe got her guard to be diſmiſſed: but inſtead of ſigning the writing, ſhe found means to eſcape and retire to Dunbar, whither ſhe alſo took with her the King (6). On her departure, ſhe ordered Melvil * to uſe his utmoſt indeavors to keep Murray in his good reſolution; and Melvil ſays, the ſaid earl and his friends aſſured him of their conſtant fidelity to her Majeſty.

She reaſſumes her authority, and pardons the fugitives.

Mary being arrived at Dunbar and reſuming her authority, granted a pardon to the earl of Murray; and afterwards the earls of Argyle, Rothes and Glencairn obtained a like amneſty. As for the duke of Chateleraut, he had withdrawn from them before they were obliged to ſeek refuge in England. Mary's rage was wholly turned againſt Rizzo's murderers: but Morton, Ruthven and Douglaſs being fled into England, ſhe could puniſh only ſome of their inſtruments, who were executed. Buchanan affirms, ſhe cauſed Rizzo's body to be removed from the obſcure place where it was buried, and laid in the ſepulcher of the Kings, cloſe by Magdalen of France, King Francis I's daughter. It may readily be judged that this act of violence commited by the King, greatly increaſed his Queen's averſion to him. She put a conſtraint on herſelf while a priſoner; but ſhe no ſooner ſaw herſelf at liberty but ſhe mortified him beyond all ſufferance. Buchanan is very circumſtantial, and what he relates is in a manner confirmed by Melvil. This latter ſays, Mary could not bear the King in her ſight; ſhe avoided his preſenſe; and he "went "up and down all alone, ſeeing few durſt bear him "company. He was miſliked by the Queen, and "by all ſuch as ſecretly favored the late baniſhed "lords: ſo that it was a great pity to ſee that good "young Prince caſt off, who failed rather for "want of good counſel and experience, than from "any bad inclinations." To be ſhort, Mary, having all along determined on lying-in at Sterling, ſeeing the King arrive there, retired without him to Edinburg caſtle, there to expect the hour of her delivery.

The earl of Bothwell in great credit. Melvil, p. 67. Thuanus. Buchanan.

Now began the earl of Bothwell to hold in the Queen's affection the place which had been poſſeſſed by Rizzo. As the new favorite found the Queen had a great regard for the earl of Murray, who had lately given her convincing proofs of his fidelity, he joined with the earl of Huntley and John Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, to deſtroy him. To this end, they intimated to her Majeſty, that he intended to get the earl of Morton, and the reſt of Rizzo's murderers re-called, in order to form a party againſt her while ſhe was in child-bed (1): but ſhe would not believe it, and Melvil intirely undeceived her. Thus Murray was inceſſantly expoſed to his enemies, to whom Mary, unhappily for herſelf, gave but too much acceſs to her perſon.

Elizabeth diſcovers Mary's deſigns by help of a ſpy. Melvil, p. 68.

Elizabeth, being fully informed of what paſſed at the court of Scotland, was not ſorry to find "her "good ſiſter" (for ſo ſhe ſtiled Queen Mary) purſuing a courſe contrary to her true intereſt, in truſting to men who could not but ruin her. She knew Mary could not relinquiſh her project of dethroning her, and that the Pope, the cardinal of Lorrain, and the courts of France and Spain were very careful to keep her in this diſpoſition: ſo, the better to diſcover her ſecrets, ſhe had ſent into Scotland one Ruxby, who feigning to eſcape from England, and to hate Elizabeth mortally, had inſinuated himſelf into Mary's favor, and by degrees, got out of her ſome important ſecrets, which he communicated to ſecretary Cecil. Theſe diſcoveries having confirmed Elizabeth's ſuſpicions, were the reaſon why, notwithſtanding her having, by proclamation, commanded all the Scotiſh fugitives to depart her dominions, ſhe gave them private aſſurances of her protection, deſigning, when occaſion offered, to make them her inſtruments to raiſe Mary diſturbances which ſhould divert her thoughts from any attempts upon England.

Her ſpy diſcovered. Melvil, p. 69.

Mean while, ſir Robert Melvil, the Scotch embaſſador in England, having found Ruxby to be Cecil's ſpy, notified it to the court of Scotland, who ordered him to be arreſted with all his papers, among which were found ſome of Cecil's letters in cypher (2). He was kept ſo carefully that none knew why he was apprehended. Soon after Elizabeth, ſending Killigrew into Scotland about ſome affairs, ordered him to demand Ruxby as her fugitive ſubject. Mary, feigning to be ignorant of Ruxby's buſineſs in Scotland, replied, ſhe was ready to deliver him to any perſon whom the Queen her ſiſter ſhould commiſſion to receive him. But Elizabeth underſtanding he had been arreſted, and ſuſpecting the cauſe, ſaid no more of the affair.

Both Queens conſider each other as enemies.

Thus theſe two Queens, amidſt their mutual demonſtrations of friendſhip, did however regard each other as real enemies, and not without reaſon. Mary was, by her emiſſaries, clandeſtinely laboring to corrupt Elizabeth's ſubjects, and inſpire them with a ſpirit of rebellion. Elizabeth, on her part, countenanced the male-contents of Scotland, with private intimations that in her they ſhould always find a powerful protection.

Birth of James, Mary's ſon. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 69, &c.

While all this paſſed, the Scotiſh Queen was delivered of a ſon, on the nineteenth of June, and immediately James Melvil was diſpatched to Elizabeth, to carry her the news, and deſire her to ſtand godmother to the new-born Prince. Melvil ſays, in his memoirs, that ſecretary Cecil having carried her Majeſty theſe tidings, ſhe being then at a ball, the dancing immediately ceaſed, and the Queen ſat down in her chair, leaning her head on her hand, without uttering a word; that one of her ladies aſking her the reaſon of her ſudden melancholy, ſhe replied, "The Queen of Scots was mother of "a ſon, while ſhe was but a barren ſtock." However, next morning, when ſhe gave audience to the envoy, ſhe appeared better dreſſed, and more jocund than ordinary, expreſſing great joy that the Queen her good ſiſter was ſafely delivered. At his audience, Melvil inſinuating to her, that in this juncture ſhe could not better ſhew her concern for what related to the Queen of Scotland, than by declaring her preſumptive heir to the crown of England; ſhe coldly anſwered, that affair was in the hands of the lawyers, and ſhe heartily wiſhed her title might be found well grounded.

Elizabeth vexed at it. Melvil, p. 70.

Mary's friends try to diſpel Elizabeth's ſuſpicions. Melvil, P. 73, 74.

While Melvil was at London, Mary's principal friends thought it abſolutely neceſſary to remove the court of England's ſuſpicions occaſioned by Ruxby's intelligence; and that, for this purpoſe, it would be proper for Queen Mary to write two letters, one to her embaſſador in ordinary, to be ſhewn to Elizabeth, another to ſecretary Cecil (3); and draughts were ſent her. Theſe letters were writ accordingly. In that to her embaſſador, Mary proteſted, ſhe expected nothing but by the favor and friendſhip of her good ſiſter. She injoined her embaſſador, not to hearken to any propoſal of the male-contents, but to threaten to diſcover their plots if they came to his knowledge. The other letter, directed to the ſecretary of ſtate, contained much the ſame proteſtations. "By theſe "letters (adds Melvil) Ruxby's intelligence was "ſuppreſſed, and my brother ſuffered to ſtay in "England, whereby the Queen's friends ſo in-"creaſed, that many whole ſhires were ready to "rebel, and their captains already named by the "election of the nobility."

Mary's deſigns. Ibid.

The two Queens lay ſnares for each other.

This confeſſion of a man who, moſt apparently, was well informed, ſince he was brother of the embaſſador in ordinary, plainly evidences what were Mary's deſigns. Can it be thought, that the embaſſador undertook to incite the nobles and counties of England to rebel, contrary to the Queen his miſtreſs's will, or without her knowledge? In Melvil's memoirs are diverſe paſſages to the like effect, which ſhew, that Mary and her friends were inceſſantly ſtriving to increaſe her adherents in England, and to hold them ſtill diſpoſed to riſe againſt Elizabeth, when a proper occaſion ſhould offer. It was therefore no wonder if Mary refuſed ratifying the Edinburg treaty. That ratification would have diſcouraged her friends in England and other countries. Elizabeth was not ignorant of Mary's drift, which was neither more nor leſs than to dethrone her, if ſhe could poſſibly find means. This was the reaſon of her preſſing her ſo earneſtly to take the falſe ſtep of ratifying the treaty of Edinburg, in order to break her meaſures. On the other hand, at the very inſtant Mary was making proteſtations of friendſhip to her good ſiſter, and intreating her to ſtand godmother to her ſon, ſhe was indeavoring to inſnare her, by perſuading her to get her declared heir to the crown. She well knew that, could ſhe once attain this advantage, her party, which was already very conſiderable in England, would become more numerous and powerful: but they were both too well acquainted with their own intereſts to fall into the ſnares they laid for each other. So, Mary never ratified the Edinburg treaty, neither did Elizabeth ever declare her next heir. Nevertheleſs it may be juſtly preſumed, that had not Mary loſt herſelf another way, as we

Mary's ill treatment of the King. Buchanan.

In the interval between Mary's delivery and the young Prince's baptism, she was observed to treat the King with such strange contempt, and to put on him such grievous affronts, that it was the talk of the whole kingdom. Buchanan is not satisfied with expatiating on this subject; but speaks moreover of the Queen's amours with Bothwell in a manner evidencing her to have lost all shame, and no longer to regard what the world said of her. It might be believed that Buchanan, who hated the Queen, has exagerated matters, did not what occurred afterwards too evidently confirm what he has advanced. Camden makes not the least mention of the Queen's freedoms with Bothwell, and touches but slightly on her aversion for the King, terming it only a difference between them, because these were topics directly contrary to his design of a complete vindication. Melvil found himself imbarassed: he durst not say all; but the sequel and connection of his memoirs necessarily requiring he should say something of the Queen's amours, he contents himself with intimating, in several places, that Bothwell was at that time absolute at court, and intirely governed her Majesty: but with regard to her aversion for the King he was not so reserved, since he scruples not making it appear to have been excessive.

The Prince's baptism. Melvil, p. 74. Buchanan. Camden.

The Prince's baptism being to be celebrated at Sterling, the embassadors of France, England, and Savoy, who were to stand godfathers, repaired thither, and the court was very numerous. It was the earl of Bedford whom Elizabeth sent to stand in her stead. The Prince was named James, and the Queen prevailed, tho' with much difficulty, that he should be baptized after the rites of the Romish church, intending to educate him in the Catholic religion. While the court was at Sterling, the King was exposed to unheard-of indignities, not daring to shew himself by reason of the extreme want he was reduced to, while Bothwell appeared with a royal magnificence, to the great scandal of all men. But without insisting on what Buchanan says, since he is not thought impartial, I shall content myself with the testimony of Melvil. The Queen, says that author, being at Sterling, seemed very melancholy, and complained to me of Rizzo's murder, as of an outrage which could not be effaced from her remembrance. "I indeavored (adds he) to comfort her, and to persuade her "to recall the banished lords, that she might in"joy a peaceable government. I had now some"what prevailed with her; but, alas, she had "bad company about her; for the earl of Both"well, who had a mark of his own that he shot "at, as soon as he understood of her wise and mer"ciful deliberations, took occasion to bring in the "earl of Morton, and his associates, thereby to "make them friends, and by them to fortify his "faction. For apparently, he had already in his "head the resolution of performing the foul mur"der of the King, which he afterwards put in ex"ecution, that he might marry the Queen." He farther adds, that the earl of Bedford, being on the point of returning to England, desired him to tell the Queen, from him, "That, for her own ho"nor, she should entertain the King as she had "done at the begining." Melvil discharged his commission, but without any effect. What Buchanan relates, is much better confirmed by these testimonies, than confuted by Camden's silence.

ELIZAB. AN' 1566.

After the baptismal solemnity, the earl of Bedford, pursuant to Elizabeth's orders, pressed the Queen of Scotland to ratify the Edinburg treaty. Hitherto she had only used pretenses and excuses to evade this demand; but now she spake more freely. She answered, there was in the treaty a certain article expressed in equivocal terms, which she could not ratify without great prejudice to herself: that however she offered to send commissioners to the borders, to agree with those of the Queen of England on a new treaty, wherein she would promise to assume neither the title nor arms of England, so long as Elizabeth and her heirs should live. Thus the difficulty was at length unraveled, and indeed Elizabeth could not with justice require more of her. Nevertheless, she took this answer for a refusal, which, in my opinion, is a clear evidence of what I have said elsewhere, that Elizabeth intended to make use of this absolute ratification, if Mary had been so unwise as to give it, against Mary herself, and thereby prove she had no title to the crown of England. It is extremely probable that most of the English Protestants, after having been so cruelly persecuted in the preceding reign, wanted only a pretext to exclude a Popish Princess from the succession.

and offers to make another less ambiguous.

Elizabeth's design.

The court of Scotland being returned to Edinburg after the Prince's baptism, the King was there treated in so injurious a manner, that he at length resolved on retiring to Glasgow to the earl his father, who had left the court not to be a witness of the base indignities offered to the King his son. Just as he was going, some of the Queen's officers took away all his plate, and gave him a set of pewter. He was scarce got a mile from Edinburg, when he was seized with a very violent indisposition, occasioned by poison given him before his departure (1). He however proceeded to Glasgow, where physical remedies, and the strength of his constitution overcame the virulence of his ailment, tho' not without great difficulty. Not to interrupt the thread of Scotish affairs, I have run over at once what of moment happened in that kingdom, in the year 1566. We must now proceed to other occurrences.

He overcomes the poison.

In the begining of this year, Charles IX. sent M. de Rambouillet into England, with two collars of the order of St. Michael, which he desired Elizabeth to confer on any such two of her noblemen as she pleased. She made choice of the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Leicester, and honored the bearer with the order of the garter (2). But we must not be deceived by these external marks of mutual esteem and friendship between the two courts; they were far from being sincere. Elizabeth had broke the Gallic court's measures by driving the French from Scotland. Moreover, she was considered as the head and protectress of the Protestants, whose destruction had been determined in the conference of Bayona: so, in all appearance, it was only to amuse her, that the court of France gave her this equivocal mark of their esteem. Elizabeth was not ignorant, that the French court, which was extremely bigoted, and where the Queen of Scotland had such powerful friends, had no affection for her: nay, supposing she had no intimation of the resolution taken at Bayona, which was however, known or guessed by the Hugonots of France, she could never repose in that court any confidence.

The earl of Arundel quits England. Camden.

This year, the earl of Arundel departed England with the Queen's permiſſion, under color of changing the air for the recovery of his health. It was thought, the real motive of his retreat was his deſpair of marrying her Majeſty, wherewith he had vainly flattered himſelf.

The Queen viſits Oxford. Camden. Stow. Hollingſh.

Soon after Elizabeth's receiving notice of the Scotiſh Queen's delivery, ſhe viſited the univerſity of Oxford, where ſhe was received in the ſame manner as at Cambridge. She alſo ſhewed here, by her courteous diſcourſe and behavior, a very ſingular regard for that univerſity. Never was Prince greater maſter than herſelf of the art of gaining the love of her ſubjects, by kind and affectionate expreſſions, which ſeemed to flow from her heart.

Combination to get the Queen of Scotland to be declared Elizabeth's heir. Camden. D'ewes.

Notwithſtanding all this, a terrible ſtorm was gathering againſt her. The Queen of Scotland having been delivered of a Prince, her friends began to ſtir, and ſcrupled not to act openly, in order to have her declared the Queen's heir. The parliament met in November with that reſolution. Thoſe who managed the affair were Mary's chief friends, and had only her in view: but the public good was generally pretended. Among the peers, ſome there were who, ſeeing Elizabeth unmarried, and the Queen of Scots inclined to a divorce, flattered themſelves with marrying one or other. To this end they kept behind the curtain, and ſet their friends to work, in order to ſtrike in the moſt critical minute. At length, the party being made, it was moved in the upper-houſe, to addreſs the Queen, and pray her to marry, or appoint a ſucceſſor. Among the reaſons alledged for this requeſt, ſome were contradictory; but all arguments were good to thoſe who had formed the project, provided they could ingage the majority on their ſide. To gain thoſe who had only the public good in view, they were told, if the Queen died iſſueleſs, the kingdom would be expoſed to great troubles, becauſe nothing yet was ſettled about the ſucceſſion. The zealous Proteſtants were made to fear, that the Queen of Scotland having a claim to the crown, there was danger of ſeeing the late reign acted over again, if the Queen did not take a huſband, and with divine bleſſing get a ſucceſſor. Many fell into the ſnare, imagining the Queen, who ſo affectionately loved her ſubjects, would comply with their deſires, and finally determine on marrying; and they hoped, by that means, to ſee the kingdom in perfect tranquillity. The Scotiſh Queen was not mentioned, and yet it was only her whom the heads of the conſpiracy had in view. They knew the Queen had reſolved never to marry: nay, it was believed, ſhe could not do it without hazarding her life, and that her phyſicians had told her the ſame. But, feigning ignorance, they reſolved ſhe ſhould be preſſed to change her condition, that they might, from her refuſal, have a handle to urge her naming a ſucceſſor. This could be only the Queen of Scotland; there being no other perſon who could diſpute her title. The ducheſs of Suffolk and her two eldeſt daughters were dead. The third was extremely deformed, and had married a man of a very obſcure condition; nay, I am not ſure ſhe was living. As for the children of Catherine Grey, the ſecond of the three ſiſters, by the earl of Hertford, Elizabeth had declared them baſtards by a juridicial ſentence; and conſequently they could not pretend to the crown. As for the counteſs of Lenox's title, Mary had taken care to unite it with her own, by her marriage with lord Darnly. It was neceſſary therefore, either to call to the ſucceſſion ſome deſcendants from the females of the York family, whereto the Queen and parliament would not have willingly agreed, or to nominate Mary Stuart to fill the throne next Queen Elizabeth. In the upper-houſe this combination was ſo ſtrong, that ſome of the peers were of opinion, it was not ſufficient barely to intreat her Majeſty, but that ſhe ſhould actually be obliged to marry, or in caſe of a refuſal, a ſucceſſor be declared by act of parliament, even againſt the Queen's will (1). Finally, it was reſolved to ſend the lord keeper Bacon, in name of the houſe, to requeſt her making choice of a conſort, and to lay before her their reaſons. In the lower-houſe matters were managed with ſtill leſs temper. It was openly maintained that, ſince the Queen would not marry, ſhe ought to be conſtrained to appoint a ſucceſſor: that, by neglecting ſo neceſſary a precaution, ſhe ſhewed that her pretended affection for her people was all diſſimulation, ſince ſhe prefered her own private intereſt to the nation's welfare: that ſhe could deny what was deſired of her only thro' fear of her ſucceſſor, which fear could be entertained by none but timorous Princes or faint-hearted women.

The Queen's perplexity. Camden. D'ewes.

Elizabeth took ſome time to return her anſwer to the lords, and either over-looked, or ſeemed to be ignorant of what paſſed in the houſe of commons. She was however extremely mortified that her enemies had ſufficient credit to turn againſt her both houſes of parliament, and to ſee thoſe whom ſhe had moſt favored prevailed on to act ſo directly contrary to her intereſt. As ſhe was conſcious that abundance of her ſubjects were not fully convinced of the juſtice of her title to the crown, ſhe evidently ſaw that nominating the Scotiſh Queen for her preſumptive heir was actually inhancing and corroborating the right of that dangerous rival. Among the Sovereign Princes, ſhe had neither ally nor real friend. On the contrary, ſhe could not doubt that the Pope, France and Spain would readily aſſiſt to deprive her of the crown. Her whole dependance was on the affection of her people, whoſe repreſentatives ſhe beheld combined, as I may ſay, againſt her, to oblige her to take a ſtep ſo oppoſite to her true intereſt. It is not eaſy to gueſs what ſhe would have reſolved had the peers perſiſted in their demand, and been ſeconded by the commons. 'Till ſhe could more clearly penetrate the intrigues which influenced the parliament, ſhe had recourſe to a certain expedient, which ſerved her preſent purpoſe, poſtponing other meaſures, 'till ſhe ſaw how her adverſaries would proceed. The expedient was, to order thirty of each houſe to come to her (2), to let them know, or rather to diſguiſe her intentions, and evade their requeſts; which ſhe did in the following diſcourſe.

But alas! they began to pierce the veſſel " before the wine was fined, and began a thing not " foreſeeing the end; now, by this means, I have " ſeen my well-wiſhers from my enemies, and can, " as me ſeemeth, very well divide the houſe into " four. Firſt the broachers and workers thereof, " who are in the greateſt faults. Secondly, the " ſpeakers, who by eloquent tales perſuaded others, " are in the next degree. Thirdly, the agreers, " who being ſo light of credit that the eloquence " of the tales ſo overcame them, that they gave " more credit thereunto than to their own wits. " And laſtly, thoſe who ſat ſtill, mute, and " meddled not therewith, but rather wondered, " diſallowing the matter; who, in my opinion, " are moſt to be excuſed. But do you think, " that either I am unmindful of your ſurety by " ſucceſſion wherein is all my care, conſidering I " know myſelf to be mortal? " And now to conclude, all this notwithſtanding " (not meaning to make a Lent of Chriſtmaſs) the " moſt part of you may aſſure themſelves, that " you depart in your Prince's grace.

It is not eaſy to comprehend what the Queen would have intimated to the parliament when ſhe ſaid, " whether I live to ſee the like aſſembly or " no:" for theſe are ambiguous words, which may be taken in various ſenſes; beſide, they are put in where they have not much connection with the preceding or following words. However this be, after this confuſed ſpeech, the parliament was immediately diſſolved. But this was only a palliative remedy, which was not capable of allaying the fermentation already raiſed among the people. If it furniſhed Elizabeth with leiſure to take other meaſures, it afforded alſo her enemies time and opportunity more commodiouſly to erect their batteries. Very probably, this affair would have been debated again in next parliament, had not in the interim Queen Mary ruined herſelf by her ill-conduct, and viſibly leſſened her party in England. This is what I ſhall preſently make evident, after cloſing the year 1566 with a ſuccinct detail of the Netherlandiſh affairs.

Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada.

After Philip II had quited thoſe provinces in 1559, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontent of both nobles and people had ſo increaſed that there was no poſſibility the affairs of that country ſhould any longer hold their then ſituation. This univerſal diſcontent ſprang from diverſe ſourſes, viz. 1. The peoples belief, that Philip had formed a deſign to aboliſh their liberties and privileges, and introduce arbitrary power. 2. The erection of the biſhopricks, which greatly leſſened the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbies, wherein many families were intereſted. 3. The Inquiſition which was intended to be ſet up in thoſe provinces, and which was little leſs deteſted by the Catholics than by the Proteſtants themſelves. 4. The prohibition to aſſemble the ſtates. 5. His ſaid Catholic Majeſty's project to extirpate the heretics, who were now very numerous in the country. 6. The intereſt of the grandees, who plainly foreſaw how fatal it would prove to them if the King's deſigns were executed. They had in vain, for ſeveral years, ſollicited their governeſs to aſſemble the ſtates, and prevent the calamities wherewith they were ſenſible their country was on the point of being ſuddenly afflicted. Their requeſt was conſtantly rejected. This rigor had at length obliged the Prince of Orange, counts Egmont and Horn, with diverſe other nobles, to withdraw from the council of ſtate, and write to the King, that cardinal Granvelle had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the worſt was to be feared if he continued longer in the Netherlands. Philip, not thinking proper to recall the cardinal directly, adviſed him however to withdraw. Immediately on Granvelle's departure, the grandees reſumed their ſtations in the council.

ELIZAB. AN' 1566.

Mean while, the Inquiſition being univerſally abhorred, the people began to ſtir, and make appear they were determined to free themſelves from that yoke. The great ones ſupported this reſolution with two motives. Firſt, becauſe they perceived the Inquiſition muſt prove deſtructive of liberty. Secondly, becauſe they were informed the King had taken terrible reſolutions againſt them, on account of what had paſſed concerning cardinal Granvelle. Hereupon they formed a confederacy againſt the Inquiſition, and Lewis count of Naſſau, the Prince of Orange's brother, with four hundred attendants, preſented a petition to the governeſs. It was on this occaſion the Reformed got the appellation of Gueux, or Beggars. The governeſs not having power to grant their requeſt, the Proteſtants, of their own accord, took the liberty to preach publicly, and the governeſs was forced to ſuffer it, and at length to allow it expreſly. Philip thenceforwards conſidered the Netherlanders as rebels, and the majority of thoſe people looked on him but as a Sovereign cruel and unjuſt, who aſpired to be abſolute maſter not only of their eſtates and perſons, but even of their ſouls. I ſhall enter no farther into theſe affairs. It ſuffices to have briefly exhibited the origin of the Netherland troubles, which I ſhall have ſometimes occaſion to treat of in the ſequel. I return to the Scotiſh affairs which more nearly relate to England.

AN' 1567. Remark on the King of Scotland's cataſtophre.

I am now entering on the detail of a certain notable event, which has been rendered obſcure, as well by religious prejudices, as for the ſake of the Prince of Scotland, whoſe birth I lately mentioned. This Prince, acceding to the crown of England on Queen Elizabeth's demiſe, thought it his duty to attempt vindicating the Queen his mother from the horrible crime whereof, while living, ſhe was accuſed; I mean of murdering her royal conſort. To all appearance, he imployed Camden's pen for that very purpoſe.

Queen Mary accuſed by ſome, and cleared by others.

It is agreed, that Henry Stuart King of Scotland, Queen Mary's conſort, was aſſaſſinated early in the year 1567. It cannot be denied, that this murder was perpetrated by the earl of Bothwell, or his order; order; that this earl was then in great credit with the Queen, and that ſhe married him a few months after the tragical death of the King her ſpouſe. This, added to her averſion for the King, forms againſt her a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion. On the other hand, almoſt all the Papiſtical writers, who mention this murder, make it their buſineſs to juſtify Queen Mary, and throw it on the earl of Murray. They ſeem to have taken this courſe with the more reaſon, as Camden, a Proteſtant author, in his annals of Queen Elizabeth, has openly undertaken Mary's defenſe, and repreſented the earl of Murray as author not only of the crime but even of whatever troubles happened in Scotland after Queen Mary's marriage with King Francis II.

ELIZAB. AN' 1567.

The neceſſity of clearing this fact.

It will poſſibly be aſked, where is the neceſſity of clearing this fact in a hiſtory of England? I reply; it is abſolutely neceſſary; becauſe otherwiſe Queen Elizabeth's conduct will be either inconceivable or miſconſtrued. Our hiſtory therefore and veracity require a diſtinct knowledge of the foundation of this Queen's politics, and the real cauſe of ſuch events as will hereafter be related. This particular fact is as it were the hinge whereon, for ſeveral ſucceſſive years, turn all the affairs of both England and Scotland. They who, under color of clearing it, have labored to darken it as far as poſſible, were very ſenſible how remote from truth was the idea they deſired to give of the affairs of this reign. So, to ſet all in a true light, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to take a quite different courſe.

Camden.

To ſucceed in my propoſition, I cannot avoid treating ſomewhat largely of the Scotiſh affairs. Some grave authors of eſtabliſhed reputation have indeavored to diſguiſe the facts by them recited, by curtailing and altering them; by ſuppreſſing material truths, and ſuppoſing what has not even the leaſt probability. To oppoſe to them a bare narrative, containing only the naked truth, would not be the method to ſatisfy a reader, who would be ſtill at a loſs to know whom he ought moſt to credit. It is therefore requiſite to prove what I advance, and in matter of facts there are no better proofs than the mutual connection of theſe ſame facts, and the teſtimonies of unſuſpected perſons: but it is in a manner impoſſible to point out the places where the truth has been altered, without ingaging in certain reaſonings which indeed do not always ſuit with hiſtory, but which ſeem to me indiſpenſible on this occaſion.

Teſtimonies of three hiſtorians.

Three hiſtorians, who may be conſidered as originals, have related what paſſed in Scotland during Queen Elizabeth's reign, namely, George Buchanan, William Camden, and James Melvil. Some remarks on theſe three authors will help to give the reader a clear idea.

Buchanan.

Buchanan, a Scot and a Proteſtant, was a man of ſingular erudition, and highly eſteemed by all the learned in Europe. Had he not been writer of the Scotiſh hiſtory, he would perhaps have been neither envied nor hated: but as, in reciting the frequent bickerings between England and Scotland, he does not always agree with the Engliſh hiſtorians, a prejudice is formed againſt him in England, as if he indeavored to falſify whatever might advantage the Engliſh. This difference would have been little regarded by other nations, if what Buchanan ſays of Queen Mary Stuart had not excited againſt him all the Romaniſts in Europe. His aim was to make appear, that Queen Mary was the ſole cauſe of the troubles of Scotland, and particularly author of the King her huſband's murder; and his hiſtory abounds with circumſtantial facts, which have a viſible connection, and tend to all the end he propoſed. He cites not teſtimonies to confirm what he ſays, becauſe he wrote at the very juncture when all was tranſacted, or ſhortly after. On the other hand, he was Murray's creature, and looked on as one of a vindictive diſpoſition. It is chiefly on theſe prejudices that his hiſtory has been diſcredited, without however any expreſs attempt to confute him in even one aſſertion of importance.

ELIZAB. AN' 1567.

Camden.

Camden, a Proteſtant Engliſh author, wrote the annals of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in the time of James I, ſon of Queen Mary. He was eminent for his knowledge in the antiquities of England, and, if I miſtake not, he was * King at Arms. The hiſtory of England is indebted to him for ſeveral good performances, which have greatly contributed towards its illuſtration. But it manifeſtly appears that, in writing the annals of Elizabeth, his only aim was to vindicate the Queen of Scots, under color that the hiſtory of Elizabeth cannot be compiled without a particular account of the affairs of Scotland. He ſpeaks extremely well of Elizabeth, when Mary is not concerned: but in the places where the two Queens muſt be neceſſarily put in oppoſition, he does it ſo artfully, that Elizabeth appears to be in the wrong. It is not the ſame, where he can praiſe or excuſe Mary, without wounding Elizabeth; for then he makes no ſcruple to repreſent the former as a pattern of virtue. He intirely paſſes over in ſilence whatever may injure her reputation, or contents himſelf with confuting what ſhe is accuſed of, by a bare and directly oppoſite narration, without alledging the leaſt proof. So, when any one peruſes the hiſtories of Camden and Buchanan, he would think theſe two writers are ſpeaking of two different Queens, who reigned at the ſame time in Scotland. Buchanan's deſign was to blacken Mary's reputation; and Camden's to vindicate or praiſe her. Wherefore, Camden, who wrote laſt, has taken care to warn his readers, that no credit is to be given to Buchanan, becauſe he was the earl of Murray's creature, a mercenary writer, and his works were condemned by the ſtates of Scotland: nay, he pretends that, before his death, he repented of his malice; but, according to cuſtom, ſupports not what he advances with any proof, neither does he take up Buchanan in any remarkable circumſtance, only, as I ſaid, by giving a contrary account. Having thus removed the Scotiſh hiſtorian's teſtimony, he adds, "For his part, he propoſes, to "the end both ſides may be heard, to relate the "affair * without any mixture of love or hate, as "far as he can come to the knowledge of it, from "writings, publiſhed at the very time, but ſoon "ſuppreſſed in favor of the earl of Murray, and in "hatred to the Queen, or from letters of embaſſa-"dors, and of other papers worthy of credit." It muſt be obſerved, that he cites in his annals no paſſage from theſe ſuppreſſed books, gives neither the titles nor authors, neither does he name the embaſſadors and perſons of credit, on whoſe teſtimony he builds his recital. He intimates only a ſingle paper, which in its place I ſhall mention, and which carries with it all poſſible marks of forgery. Thus, after a caution not to believe Buchanan, who wrote of what was tranſacted in his own time, and even in his ſight, he will have us believe him who wrote not 'till more than forty years after the event, on his bare word, and the teſtimony of perſons and books unknown (1).

After this preamble, he enters upon the matter,

(1) Many believe Camden wrote nothing in his annals of Scotland but what was dictated to him, or injoined by James I. We muſt therefore underſtand here by Camden, the real author of the annals, whoever he be. Rapin. ——— Oſborn ſays, that Camden's lines were directed by King James, and he led rather to vindicate the honor and integrity of a mother, than to do right for a miſtreſs, who had, from a ſchoolmaſter, raiſed him to be firſt King at Arms. and, in order to relate the King's death, begins with a character of the earl of Murray, and repreſents him as a man immoderately ambitious, and aſpiring to the crown. It has been ſeen, that this was the accuſation brought againſt him before Henry II, by the dowager Queen and cardinal of Lorrain, and whereof Melvil has fully cleared him. Camden adds that, with this view, Murray did his utmoſt to obſtruct Queen Mary's marriage, and, not ſucceeding, took arms againſt her, and was at length conſtrained to take ſanctuary in England: that, during his abſenſe, by his letters and friends, he ſowed diſcord between the King and Queen, and, to hinder his own condemnation, his friend, the earl of Morton, perſuaded the King to cauſe Rizzo, ſecretary for French diſpatches, to be aſſaſſinated: that the King coming to a ſenſe of the heinouſneſs of the crime, conceived ſuch averſion to Murray, that he reſolved to diſpatch him; but that Murray, having thereof notice, was immediately reconciled to Bothwell, and determined with him to kill the King, deſigning to caſt the deed on her Majeſty, ruin her in the affection of her ſubjects, and withal deſtroy the earl of Bothwell, in order to ſeize the government.

Camden's account of the King's death.

Remarks on this account.

This is the ſubſtance of the ſtory forged by Camden to juſtify Queen Mary, and load Murray with the King's murder. I call it a forged ſtory, becauſe it is, in reality, impoſſible to reconcile it with the Scotiſh hiſtory, whereof this author has been pleaſed to omit the principal circumſtances. For inſtance, he is quite mute concerning Rizzo's freedom with the Queen, and of his great credit at court, neither does he mention that Princeſs's amours with Bothwell, and yet in his very narrative theſe two facts muſt be neceſſarily ſuppoſed: for how can it be conceived that, to ſave the earl of Murray's honor and eſtates, there was a neceſſity of making away a ſecretary for French diſpatches, if this ſecretary had not over the Queen a powerful influence? Again, why muſt Murray deſtroy Bothwell in order to uſurp the government, if Bothwell had not been in poſſeſſion? It is very viſible that, otherwiſe, Camden's account has neither coherence nor foundation. In a word, this author was not ignorant, that the Scotiſh Queen had been openly charged with her royal conſort's murder; that all Scotland and England rang of it, and that it paſſed for a certain fact in both kingdoms. Can therefore facts notoriouſly public, if I may ſo ſay, be overthrown forty years after, by a bare account, without the leaſt proof of what is advanced? But to confirm what I have been ſaying with regard to Camden, I need only obſerve, that Melvil's memoirs, writ before Camden's annals, but which appeared not 'till long after, are intirely oppoſite to what that author has urged, and perfectly agree with Buchanan's hiſtory, ſome few circumſtances excepted.

Remarks on Melvil's memoirs.

Melvil is the third author to examine. He was a perſon of diſtinction, who was imployed in ſeveral embaſſies, and not a little concerned in what paſſed at the Scotiſh court: nay it appears, in his memoirs, that he was highly in Queen Mary's favor, ſince ſhe made choice of him to counſel her as to her conduct, and to cenſure her falſe ſteps and failings. A Sovereign can ſcarcely give a ſubject more ſignal tokens of eſteem. If Buchanan has not mentioned him in his hiſtory, it was probably becauſe he loved him not. Melvil, on his part, has, in his memoirs, drawn a character of Buchanan, which tho' it does juſtice to his judgment, capacity and extenſive knowledge, gives no very advantageous idea of his other internal qualities. This ſuffices to ſhew he has not copied that hiſtorian, and that they were far from correſponding. He has ſet down in writing what paſſed before his eyes, from the year 1563, when he returned to his native home, to the year 1594: conſequently he cannot be ſaid to be ill-informed. He may be ſtill leſs ſuſpected by the Queen's friends, ſince, throughout his memoirs, it is evident that he was conſtantly attached to the intereſt of that Princeſs. Accordingly he every where ſpeaks of her with great caution, contenting himſelf with briefly glancing at certain paſſages whereon Buchanan has not ſcrupled to expatiate. He has not however thought fit to ſcreen the main articles, becauſe theſe ſame facts ſerve for foundation to his memoirs, which otherwiſe would have no connection. He has not writ either to juſtify or accuſe the Queen, but purely for the inſtruction of his ſon in what paſſed in his own time. If we compare his memoirs with Buchanan's hiſtory, and Camden's annals, we ſhall be ſoon convinced, it is impoſſible to reconcile them with what Camden alledges; but that, on the contrary, they agree in the principal facts related by Buchanan: all the difference is, Melvil has cleared many particulars not well known by Buchanan; and, on the other hand, Buchanan has inlarged much more on whatever reflects on the Queen, whereas Melvil touches over ſuch paſſages very lightly; ſhewing thereby that he mentions them reluctantly, and no farther than ſerves to purſue the thread of his memoirs.

ELIZAB. AN' 1567

After theſe animadverſions on three hiſtorians, of whom two were cotemporaries, eye-witneſſes of what they relate, and agreeing in the main, without having writ by concert, and one at leaſt not to be ſuſpected of diſguiſing the truth, and of whom the third wrote forty years after, and directly oppoſes both the others, without ſupporting his ſtory with any teſtimony, or known author; after this, I ſay, ſurely I cannot be blamed if, preferably to the latter, I take for guides the two former (1).

Queen Mary has the young Prince removed to Edinburg. Buchanan.

To return. While the King was taking remedies to expel the poiſon, Mary removed the young Prince her ſon from Sterling, and ordered him to be carried to Edinburg, tho' it was the dead of winter (2). Not long after, ſhe underſtood that the King had reſolved on retiring to Spain *, and that an Engliſh ſhip lay ready to receive him, ſo ſoon as he was able to undergo the fatigue of a ſea-voyage. This precaution alarming her apprehenſions of his eſcaping, and thereby breaking all her meaſures with Bothwell, ſhe expreſſed herſelf inclinable to be reconciled. In order thereto, ſhe ſent ſeveral tender and affectionate letters to convince him of her ſincerity. Finally, ſhe made him a viſit at Glaſgow, and ſo well cajoled that eaſy Prince that ſhe prevailed on him to return to Edinburg in a litter. Melvil mentions not her Majeſty's journey to Glaſgow, but neceſſarily ſuppoſes a reconciliation, ſince he ſpeaks of the King's voluntary return to Edinburg (3). On his arrival there, he was lodged in a lonely houſe near the city wall, on pretenſe he would be incommoded by noiſe in the palace. For ſome days, Mary viſited him very frequently, nay had her own bed brought into a room under his. In a word, ſhe neglected nothing might convince him her heart was intirely free

(1) It may be ſaid of theſe hiſtorians, in regard to Mary, that Camden has ſcarce ſaid one word of truth; that Buchanan has ſaid all the truth, and more than the truth; and that Melvil has ſaid the truth, but not the whole truth.

(2) Pretending that the houſe where he was kept was inconvenient, and Sterling a cold and moiſt place, where he might get cold. Buchanan. from rancor towards him. At that time, the earl of Murray, on news that his lady lay at the laſt extremity thro' a miſcarriage, deſired leave to viſit her, and accordingly departed, notwithſtanding the Queen's inſtances to the contrary. This circumſtance makes equally for Buchanan and Camden. Buchanan thence infers, that Murray had no hand in murdering the King, who was killed the night following, ſince he was gone a day before it happened (1), Camden draws a quite contrary inference, ſaying, his going away was to avoid being ſuſpected. Buchanan and Melvil affirm, many knew there was a deſign to kill the King, but no man durſt warn him of it, becauſe he told all again to the Queen, or ſome of his ſervants, who betrayed him. However, the earl of Orkney, Murray's half-brother, gave him thereof notice, which he rehearſing to the Queen, ſhe ſent for Orkney to examine him; but in her preſenſe he denied ever to have uttered a word of ſuch tendency (2).

At length, the time appointed for perpetrating this villany being come, Mary left the King to put to bed one of her women who had been that day married. I omit numberleſs circumſtances whereby Buchanan inſinuates the Queen was deep in this tragedy. In effect, thoſe circumſtances would be ſo many proofs, where they confirmed by a perſon unſuſpected: but as Melvil does not mention them, I chuſe alſo to be ſilent. Howſoever it be, the King was ſtrangled that night, with one of his domeſtics who lay in his chamber. Soon as he was diſpatched, his body was removed into a garden belonging to a neighboring houſe, whither his ſlippers were likewiſe carried. Then fire was ſet to ſome barrels of powder placed in the room where the Queen's bed was, and the houſe was blown up. Thoſe who crouded in at the noiſe, were at firſt told, that the violence of the blaſt had thrown the King into the garden: but, as his ſlippers were found by him, his ſhirt not any where even ſinged, and certain livid marks appearing round his neck, thoſe ſpectators were not ſo credulous. The ſame night it was rumored thro' the city, that the earls of Morton and Murray were the King's aſſaſſines; and this report very ſuddenly reached even the borders of England. Camden hence infers, that the earl of Murray muſt have been concerned in the murder, ſince he was by public voice inſtantly accuſed: but this voice of the public conſiſted doubtleſs of ſuch few as were ſuborned to ſpread the report. Melvil, on the contrary, aſſerts it was whiſpered at court, that Bothwell had procured the King to be murdered, and that he was ſtrangled with a napkin. He adds, I came to the door of the Queen's chamber the next morning after the murder, and the earl of Bothwell ſaid, "That her Majeſty was ſorrowful and quiet; "which occaſioned him to come forth: he ſaid, "the ſtrangeſt accident had fallen out which ever "was heard of, for thunder had come out of the "heavens, and had burned the King's houſe, and "himſelf was found dead, lying a little diſtance from "the houſe, under a tree. He deſired me to go "up and ſee him, how that there was not a hurt "nor a mark on all his body. But when I went "up to ſee him, he had been taken into a cham-"ber, and kept by one Alexander Durham; but "I could not get a ſight of him." Buchanan adds, the Queen ordered the corpſe to be brought to her on the wrong ſide of a bench, and after viewing it ſome time, without any ſigns of joy or grief, commanded it to be interred near Rizzo, in the ſepulcher of the Kings. It is ſtrange that Camden, who attempts to ſtrip Buchanan of all credit, ſhould not undertake withal to confute any of the circumſtances related by that hiſtorian, tho' they are many in number, and very diſhonorable to the Queen.

Scandalous behavior of the Queen.

Mean while, the people murmured exceedingly that no manner of inquiry was made concerning the King's death, wherewith they openly charged the earl of Bothwell. Theſe murmurs were ſo public, that Bothwell could not but take ſome ſtep to ſhew he was willing to clear himſelf. He therefore, in company with ſome friends, repaired to the earl of Argyle, chief juſtice of the realm, and deſired him to make inquiſition concerning the murder of the King. On his requeſt, a proceeding commenced, and the depoſitions of ſeveral perſons were taken; but all was ſuddenly ſuppreſſed. The court was contented with offering a reward to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the authors of the King's death: but, tho' the Queen and Bothwell were univerſally believed guilty, none had the courage to be their accuſers, ſince offering to take ſuch a ſtep would not have been a little dangerous: nevertheleſs, people failed not to diſperſe libels and ballads, wherein Bothwell was ſtill accuſed; whereupon he cauſed to be affixed in ſeveral places, that he would fight any perſon who ſhould dare to maintain this accuſation. But at length, imagining a civil war was at hand, he offered to deliver the caſtle, provided he was ſuffered to carry the young Prince to Sterling, of which he was likewiſe governor. Bothwell acquited. Melvil, p. 78. Spotſwood. April 26, 27.

"Every body ſuſpected the earl of Bothwell, "and thoſe who durſt ſpeak freely to others, ſaid "plainly that it was he. Whereupon he drew together a number of lords of his dependers to be "an aſſize, which cleared and acquited him; ſome "for fear, ſome for favor, and the greateſt part "in expectation of advantage. This way being "aſſailed, he remained ſtill the greateſt favorite "at court."

This teſtimony of a man who cannot be ſuſpected of ſlandering her, is very ſtrong againſt the Queen. She not only could not part with a man publicly accuſed of the murder of the King her huſband, but even made him her prime miniſter and favorite. Even had ſhe believed him innocent, it was renouncing the laws of decency, which a woman rarely does except when hurried away by the violence of ſome paſſion. But theſe are trifles, in compariſon of what ſhe did afterwards.

Fruitleſs repreſentations to the Queen about her marrying Bothwell. Melvil, p. 78.

A rumor of her Majeſty's deſigning to marry the earl of Bothwell flying from court over all the kingdom, lord Herris repaired to Edinburg. He took ſo ſeaſonable a time, that he accoſted the Queen in Bothwell's abſenſe, and caſting himſelf at her feet, frankly told her, it would be her everlaſting diſhonor if ſhe ſhould even think of eſpouſing her lord's aſſaſſine. Mary, feigning a ſurpriſe, anſwered, ſhe knew not whence he had this intelligence, and very coldly added, that hitherto her heart had dictated nothing to her in favor of Bothwell. A few days after, Melvil received from England a letter, touching the ſame affair, but expreſſed in much ſtronger terms than lord Herris's remonſtrance; which letter he ſhewed to her Majeſty, who ſaid it was a device of his own. Melvil aſſured her the letter came from the perſon whoſe name was ſubſcribed, and contained nothing but what he himſelf had deſigned to repreſent to her, as he was in duty bound. Thus the Queen, in reſolving to marry Bothwell, did not ſin thro' ignorance, ſince ſhe was amply made ſenſible of the world's opinion concerning the author of the King's aſſaſſination.

In her return to Edinburg, ſhe was met by Bothwell, with a band of armed followers, who carried her away, and conducted her to Dunbar. Melvil, who was preſent, and was himſelf arreſted, ſays Bothwell only "took her Majeſty's horſe by the "bridle," and adds not a word which may inſinuate that the Queen ſeemed ſurpriſed at this violence, or that ſhe offered to make the leaſt reſiſtance (1). He, on the contrary, ſays, that captain Blachater, who ſeized him, aſſured him all was done with the Queen's own conſent.

Bothwell puts away his wife. Buchanan. Melvil. Spotſwood.

When Bothwell came to Dunbar, he procured a divorce from his wife, the earl of Huntley's daughter, whom he had married only ſix months before. This divorce was decreed by two ſentences, one in the eccleſiaſtical, and the other in the civil court, and both at the counteſs of Bothwell's own ſuit. In the firſt trial, before the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, Bothwell was accuſed of a criminal commerce with one of his wife's kinſwomen, and, on his confeſſion, the archbiſhop pronounced the ſentence of divorce (2). In the ſecond, his wife accuſed him of adultery, and as he denied not the fact, his marriage was annulled. He was forced to make uſe of theſe two means, by reaſon of the different rules the two courts obſerve, with regard to the cauſes for annulling a marriage. The proceſs was commenced and ended in leſs than ten days. To all appearance, the earl of Huntley, Bothwell's great friend, perſuaded his daughter to ſue a divorce. This is Buchanan's account; but Melvil ſays, he cannot tell how, nor by what law he parted with his wife, becauſe having been releaſed, he had left Dunbar. This at leaſt ſhews he had not read Buchanan's hiſtory when he compiled his memoirs, nor did copy that hiſtorian, tho' they agree in the principal facts.

The Queen's marriage with Bothwell. Buchanan. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. I. p. 87.

Bothwell, thus freed from his wife, carried the Queen to Edinburg, and on the morrow ſhe appeared in the courts of juſtice, and declared ſhe was intirely free. This was done to prevent the objection which might be taken from her captivity to null the marriage ſhe intended to contract with Bothwell. This alliance was, in all its circumſtances, ſo odious, that it was very difficult to find any pretext to extenuate its horror. The ſole expedient Mary and Bothwell could pitch on, was to make the court lords accomplices in their crime. To that end Bothwell, having invited them to dinner, preſented and cauſed them to ſubſcribe a paper, the purport whereof was, "That they judged it "was much the Queen's intereſt to marry Both-"well, he having many friends in Lothian and "upon the borders, which would cauſe good order "to be kept: and beſide the Queen could not but "marry him, ſeeing he had run away and lain "with her againſt her will." One of Camden's artifices, among many others, is to ſpeak of this paper, or approbation of the courtiers, in a very looſe manner, and intirely diverſify it, under color of extracting the ſubſtance. Moreover he introduces it before he relates the Queen's being carried away, that this rape might be conſidered as a conſequence of the grandees approbation, whereas it was juſt the reverſe, as may be ſeen by the very writings in Melvil (3). However the eſpouſals were ſolemniſed after the Proteſtant rites, by the biſhop of Orkney, who was very ready to officiate in ſo deteſtable a buſineſs.

The Queen and Bothwell cauſe a league to be ſigned by ſome nobles. Buchanan.

Whatever ſuſpicion the Queen had given of herſelf, by her neglect to puniſh the authors of the King's murder, ſome however ſtill doubted whether ſhe was guilty. But when ſhe was beheld publicly giving her hand to the earl of Bothwell, there was ſcarce one who durſt undertake her vindication (4). She might very eaſily perceive the change in her ſubjects hearts; ſo viſible was their diſguſt. For this reaſon, ſhe reſolved to ſtrengthen herſelf, by forming a league with ſome peers, for her own and her new conſort's defenſe. All ſuch as depended on Bothwell readily ſigned the league; but herein lay not all the difficulty: there was another very conſiderable party which was to be gained, otherwiſe the court league would be of little efficacy. To that end, the Queen and Bothwell judged it neceſſary to begin with the earl of Murray, that he might influence the others. The confederacy was therefore brought him to ſign. But he anſwered, that to oblige him to ſerve the Queen, it was needleſs to make him ſign the paper; and for the earl of Bothwell, ſince the Queen had deſired he would be reconciled to him, he ſhould punctually obſerve whatever he had promiſed. However, fearing, after this refuſal, to be expoſed to the court's reſentment, he deſired leave to withdraw to St. Andrew's; but, perceiving the Queen made ſome ſcruple, he prayed her to permit him to paſs ſome time in France; whereto ſhe readily conſented, and he ſoon after departed (1). Camden has taken care not to mention the reaſon of Murray's retiring into France: that very ill agrees with his ſcheme. For, had that earl aſſociated with Bothwell to aſſaſſinate the King, why ſhould he quit the court at a time when, inſtead of having any cauſe to fear, he might have expected all things from the great credit of his ſuppoſed friend?

He retires to France. Melvil, p. 80. Camden.

Mean while, all Scotland loudly complained that no vengeance was taken for the King's murder, and at ſeeing the Queen married to the very perſon univerſally conſidered as the aſſaſſine. The King of France even wrote to his embaſſador Du Crocq, to ſignify his aſtoniſhment thereat, and his letter was ſhewn to diverſe of the nobility. At length, the earls of Argyle, Morton, Marr, Athol, Glencarn, and lord Boyd, meeting at Sterling, ſigned a confederacy, the intent whereof was to bring to condign puniſhment the King's murderers, and to get the Queen's late marriage diſſolved. They hoped to effect this with greater facility, as they had room to believe the Queen herſelf would not be againſt ſuch a compulſion, conſidering the unworthy treatment ſhe had already met with at the hands of her new ſpouſe. Melvil ſays, he heard her one day call for a knife to ſtab herſelf, not being able to bear his brutalities.

As the confederates queſtioned not the Edinburgers countenancing their undertaking, they had projected to inveſt that city, that the Queen and Bothwell, who were there without troops, might not eſcape: but Bothwell, having notice of their deſign, retired with the Queen to Borthwick. They were purſued by the confederates; but to no purpoſe, the Queen and Bothwell being got away to Dunbar. Having miſſed their aim, the confederates marched to Edinburg, whoſe gates were opened to them, notwithſtanding the ſtrenuous oppoſition of the earl of Huntley, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, and biſhop of Roſs, who were even obliged to take ſhelter in the caſtle, whence ſir James Balfour, whom the Queen had made governor, afforded them means to eſcape. He alſo notified to the confederates, that he would not ſurrender the caſtle, but was determined on a ſtrict neutrality.

Edinburg declares for the confederates. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 81.

During this, Mary and Bothwell, with all poſſible diligence, got together ſome forces at Dunbar: but the confederates were in a ſtrange labyrinth of perplexities. They had no money: Balfour refuſed them artillery and ammunition; and, by reaſon of the ill ſucceſs of the enterprize of Borthwick, part of their troops had deſerted. So, after ſeveral conſultations, they had almoſt reſolved to drop their enterpriſe, and return to their homes. The Queen and Bothwell, having notice of their condition, inſtantly marched away for Edinburg, in hopes of ſurpriſing them before they came to any reſolution. This news being brought the confederates in the night, inſtead of retiring, they reſolved to meet the Queen, and decide the affair by a battle. Their enemies hearing this made a full ſtop; and finding matters took a quite different turn from what they expected, ſuffered them to paſs the Eſk without oppoſition, and very ſpeedily the two armies were within a ſmall diſtance of each other. Mary ſoon perceived her troops not to be cordial in her ſervice, and that but few, either officers or private men, were willing to fight in her quarrel. Such diſcovery inſpiring her with great fear, ſhe deſired to ſpeak with the laird of Grange *, one of the confederates chieftains, who commanded a ſmall body more advanced than the reſt of their army. That laird being come, flatly aſſured her, that there was no hope of accommonation, except ſhe parted from Bothwell, who was looked on as his late Majeſty's murderer, and was moreover married to another woman; but, on that condition, the confederates would honor and obey her as they ought. Mary aſking him, whether ſhe might rely on his word? he returned to the confederates, and brought a full power to treat with the Queen on thoſe and no other conditions. Hereupon Bothwell, ſeeing no remedy, choſe to retire to Dunbar, and the Queen put herſelf into the hands of Kircaldie, who conducted her to the confederate army. The chiefs gave her a more dutiful reception than ſhe expected; but it was with great difficulty the ſoldiers were reſtrained, who exclaimed at her with moſt mortifying reflections. She was conducted to Edinburg †, and lodged in the provoſt's houſe, where a guard was ſet on her, ſo that ſhe was actually a priſoner. To all appearance, the chiefs were not yet fully reſolved what they ſhould do with her; but ſhe herſelf furniſhed them with occaſion of determining. The very night ſhe came to Edinburg, ſhe bribed one of her guard, and gave him a letter for Bothwell, replete with tender and affectionate expreſſions, ſtiling him, "Her "dear Heart," and promiſing never to forſake him. This letter falling into the hands of the confederate lords, made them reſolve to be more watchful over her, and afforded a pretenſe to ſhut her up in the caſtle of Loch-levin, under cuſtody of the earl of Murray's mother.

The Queen complained bitterly of this uſage, and wrote to Kircaldie, reproaching him that what had been promiſed her was not performed. Kircaldie, alſo in writing replied, that he had already upbraided the lords for ſo doing; but they had ſhewed him a letter under her own hand, which ſtoped his mouth. He concluded with ſaying, he could do nothing for her, but adviſed her to think no more of a man who had another wife, and was charged with being her huſband's murderer. The Queen, as ſhe read the letter, ſhed a flood of tears.

But what occurred a few days after, was ſtill more to her prejudice. Bothwell, coming to Dunbar, ſent to Balfour, governor of Edinburg caſtle, a certain perſon for a depoſite wherewith he had intruſted the ſaid governor. It was a ſilver caſket, preſented to the Queen by Francis II, which ſhe had given to Bothwell. Balfour delivered it to the meſſenger; but (if we may credit Buchanan) gave notice of it to the confederate lords, who took it from the bearer. Howſoever this be, it fell into their hands. Breaking it open, they found many love-verſes and letters, and among the reſt ſome which contained the whole conſpiracy againſt the late King, and the manner it was to be executed. But this was not all, Buchanan ſays, there were alſo three contracts of marriage between the Queen and Bothwell, one of which was written in the Queen's hand before the King's death. Another was written in the earl of Huntley's hand, in the interval been the King's death and the Queen's third marriage; and the laſt was a contract in form, drawn up at the nuptials. Probably, the two firſt were only draughts, ſuppoſing Buchanan ſpeaks Queen Mary obliged to resign the crown to her son. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 85. Camden. Spotswood. Hollingsh. p. 405.

Mean while, the confederate chiefs confering together upon their affairs, considered that, if they should repossess Mary of the government, they could not rely on her promises, or be secure against her resentment. They therefore concluded, that it was absolutely necessary to deprive her of the administration, and to that end, sent the earl of Lindsay (1), to persuade her to resign the crown to the Prince her son. Camden says, that in order to extort this, she was menaced with being brought to a public trial for the murder of the King her husband, for incontinency, and for breach of promise on account of religion: and Melvil affirms, the earl of Lindsay had orders to threaten her, if he deemed it necessary. The Queen was strangely surprised at this proposition: but rightly judging, it was not in her power to deny what was demanded, and that her obstinate refusal might draw on her worse troubles, she acquiesced. She did it with more readiness, as she was privately told by some of the confederates, and Throckmorton the English embassador, that whatever she signed in prison would not be of any force, but might be revoked when she should be at liberty. The confederate lords willingly consented she herself should nominate one or more regents, to govern the kingdom during the Prince's minority. She appointed the earl of Murray, either of her own choice, or because it was hinted to her, that he was desired for regent; and, in case he refused the office, she substituted the duke of Chateleraut, the earl of Argyle, and some other peers. Then, she was made to sign all the acts necessary for her resignation of the crown; and notice being sent to the earl of Murray, who was in France, preparations were made for the inauguration of the new King, who was only a year old. Queen Mary's resignation was signed the twenty fourth of June, and the infant King was inaugurated, by the bishop of Orkney, on the twenty ninth following.

A party formed for Mary. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 85.

Not long after, several nobles, who were not of the confederacy, met at Hamilton castle, to consult what was to be done at this juncture. The confederates having thereof notice, sent James Melvil, author of the memoirs, to inquire the cause of their assembling. They replied, they could not but think it strange, that the King should be crowned, without their being invited to the solemnity, since they were no less zealous for their country's welfare than the other peers, and believed they had reason to apprehend some ill designs were forming against them, since such important resolutions had been taken without consulting them; that therefore they were met, not with intent to offend any person, but only to provide for their own safety. Melvil says, the most prudent of the confederates were for admitting these lords to their consultation, but the others resolved to exclude them; and that this advice prevailed to the kingdom's great detriment. In effect, from this small number of peers assembled at Hamilton, rose a party which finally declared for the Queen, and served long to foment terrible combustions in Scotland.

Sundry motives of the confederates.

The confederate leaders had not all the same views. Some acted only from private interest, and made use of the present juncture to ruin their enemies. Others, in signing the confederacy, intended to remove the scandal which the Queen's marriage had given, to get rid of Bothwell, to reinstate Queen Mary in the government, and perhaps to limit her authority by means of the states. These latter, understanding the earl of Murray was returning to Scotland, sent James Melvil to inform him of the situation of affairs, and to exhort him to behave with great moderation, and above all things to avoid coming intirely to a rupture with the Queen. They represented to him, that his interest required it, because he would be much more master of his own party while he left Mary some hopes, than if he reduced her affairs to such a state that her adversaries would have nothing more to fear from her. Murray perceiving that such conduct would in reality redound to his advantage, promised to follow their advice. But he was no sooner arrived, than he suffered himself to be swayed by the most violent of his party, who persuaded him to drive matters beyond a possibility of being ever restored. This is the representation Melvil gives of the earl of Murray's conduct. A few days after his arrival, he waited on the Queen, and instead of comforting her, as he had done formerly when she was under confinement at Edinburg, he loaded her with reproaches. This affected her most sensibly; for she had thitherto flattered herself that Murray would labor her restoration.

The earl of Murray arrives, and ill treats the Queen. Melvil, p. 87. Camden.

Mean while, the confederates requesting his acceptance of the regency, he seemed inclined to refuse it, and desired a few days consideration: but this was all grimace, and at length he accepted it. Before the states, which had been convened in his absense, assembled, he wrote to the Hamiltonians (for so were stiled those peers who met at Hamilton-castle) desiring them to join the other states in what should be deemed necessary for the kingdom's benefit: but they refused. For a while there was some talk of agreement, but insuperable difficulties occurred. Buchanan casts the whole blame on the Hamiltonians; and Melvil, on the violent ones of the confederates, with whom the regent sided. All can be conjectured is, that those who had procured the assembly at Hamilton, intended to serve Queen Mary, and wanted only a pretense to declare; which the earl of Murray furnished them with, and perhaps very imprudently. However it was, Murray, not thinking fit to defer the states convention, in expectation of accommodating with the Hamiltonians, which to him still seemed too remote, the regency was confirmed by a decree, subscribed by upwards of two hundred lords and gentlemen of the greatest distinction, as well Papists as Protestants.

The new regent's first care was to remove Balfour, who had rendered himself suspected, from the government of Edinburg castle, and to confer it on the laird of Grange. Mean while the Hamiltonians, headed by the earl of Argyle, loudly complained of their being neglected, and refused to acknowledge Murray for regent. It was easy to perceive, that their drift, under that pretext, was to form a party for Mary: and in effect, some time after they met at Dunbarton, and signed a league or association, the intent whereof was to release the Queen, and replace her on the throne. Twelve lords (2), of whom the earl of Argyle and bishop of St. Andrew's were the foremost, subscribed the bond of association: but Argyle deserted this party presently after, and repaired to the parliament. This earl, who frequently shifted sides, remained not long even with this party. As for the duke of Chateleraut he was then in France about his own private concerns. During the remnant of this year, the regent poſſeſſed himſelf of all the ſtrong holds in the realm, and diſtributed the offices and governments as he judged neceſſary for the preſervation of public tranquillity. He was particularly careful that juſtice ſhould be punctually and impartially adminiſtered. Melvil blames him only for one omiſſion, viz. his not being ſo diligent as he might have been in gaining the Hamiltonians: but it muſt be remembered that Melvil himſelf manifeſtly leaned to that party. The Queen loved and eſteemed him; and conſequently it was natural he ſhould wiſh her reſtoration. He evidences in his memoirs, that he heartily deſired ſhe might be replaced on the throne, which induced him to cenſure all ſuch as oppoſed it.

A clear knowledge of the Scotiſh affairs is ſo abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the motives of Queen Elizabeth's conduct and politics, that it is not to be thought ſtrange that I have been ſo particular in my account of Scotland's tranſactions: the ſequel will, I hope, juſtify this long digreſſion. I return now to the affairs of England.

Elizabeth demands Calais. April 28. Camden. Speed, p. 838, &c.

The term for reſtoring Calais being expired, Elizabeth ſent into France ſir Thomas Smith, ſecretary of ſtate, and ſir William Winter maſter of the naval-ſtores, to demand the place of King Charles, conformably to the treaty of Cateau: but nothing was more remote from his Gallic Majeſty's intentions. He appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh embaſſadors, as if it was to be conſidered again to whom that place was to belong, and as if the treaty of Cateau was not to be of any account. Michael Hoſpital chancellor, who was firſt commiſſioner, made, on this occaſion, a long harangue, whereof it will be ſufficient to give the purport, to ſhew how groundleſs were the reaſons with which he ſupported the refuſal of ſurrendering Calais. He ſaid, France refuſes it.

"By the ſame right the Engliſh demand Calais, "they may as well claim Paris; for the one, as "well as the other, was won and loſt by arms (1).

"The Engliſh plead a new title to Calais, "whereas the King of France's title is of the "ſame date with the Monarchy itſelf.

"Tho' the Engliſh had it in poſſeſſion upwards "of two hundred years, yet the right was as much "in the Kings of France, as were the dukedoms "of Guienne and Normandy, which the Engliſh "long detained forcibly: and therefore it could "not be ſaid, the French had conquered Calais, "and thoſe dukedoms, but only recovered what "to them rightfully appertained.

"Preſcription of time is of no conſideration "among Princes, but right always takes place, "and, by the law of the twelve tables, the autho-"rity remains perpetual againſt an enemy.

"Tho' the Engliſh undertook the late war for "the ſake of Calais, yet that place was not men-"tioned in the treaty of Troye, and thereby they "had not thereto any farther pretenſions.

"The clauſe inſerted in the treaty of Troye, "relating to the reſervation of rights, concerns "only ſmall and inſignificant matters, and not the "reſtitution of Calais, which is an article of the "greateſt importance.

"The pretended attempts of Francis II, in "Scotland, could by no means affect the right of "Charles IX, his ſucceſſor. Indeed the very in-"tentions of private perſons are in ſome reſpects "liable to the laws; but the caſe of Princes is "quite different.

"The late King, in aiding the Queen of Scotland, "his conſort, did no more than the Engliſh them-"ſelves had done in ſeizing Havre de Grace, "under color of keeping it for the King. More-"over, they furniſhed the Prince of Condé with "money, and therefore have forfeited their claim "to Calais.

"When it pleaſed God that the French ſhould "recover Calais, he ſet the natural bounds between "the kingdoms of France and England, according "to the Roman poet:

"Et penitus toto diviſos orbe Britannos.

"In a word, if any one had the aſſurance to "propoſe to his Majeſty the reſtitution of Calais, "he would deſerve not only death, but even a worſe "puniſhment, damnation."

ELIZAB. AN' 1567.

The Engliſh embaſſador's anſwer. Camden. Speed.

Smith replied, "He would not ſtay to ſhew the "weakneſs of the arguments alledged by the chan-"cellor, becauſe he could not believe the refuſing "to reſtore Calais would in good earneſt be found-"ed on reaſons ſo little plauſible. There was a "treaty made expreſly on this account, which the "chancellor never mentioned, as if he had forgot "that, on this treaty, ſigned, ratified and ſworn to "by the King of France, the Queen of England's "demand was grounded. Neither did he intend "to loſe time in combating maxims which, if ad-"mited, would render all treaties between Sove-"reigns of no effect; but would content himſelf "with anſwering two objections, which were the "moſt ſpecious. As for the treaty of Troye, he "appealed to ſome of the commiſſioners, who "were preſent at the concluſion of that treaty, "whether it was not agreed, that the reſtitution of "Calais ſhould be compriſed in the general reſer-"vation of rights, and that the reaſon which they "alledged to hinder the town of Calais from be-"ing reſerved by name was, becauſe the eight "years were not yet expired: as for Havre de "Grace, the Engliſh made a peaceable entry, being "invited by the inhabitants and the people of Nor-"mandy. In ſhort, as for the money lent the "Prince of Condé, the King of France himſelf "owned it was for his ſervice, ſince it was to pay "the German ſoldiers, who threatened to ravage "the kingdom." But all theſe reaſons were to no purpoſe, France being reſolved not to part with Calais. I ſhall here by the way obſerve, that the chancellor of France did not, in order to evade the reſtitution of Calais, make uſe of arguments drawn from the very treaty of Cateau, as he might have juſtly done, if that treaty were expreſſed in the terms mentioned by the French hiſtorians.

Elizabeth's reaſons to diſſemble.

It was not the chancellor's arguments which prevented Elizabeth's aſſerting her right to Calais; but the ſituation of her affairs, which permited her not to ingage in a war with France. Her intention was not to invade others, but to defend and maintain herſelf on the throne, in ſpite of her enemies efforts: this was her only care, during the whole courſe of her reign. Hence it was that ſhe ſometimes ſeemed inclinable to matrimony, tho', in all appearance, ſhe had no ſuch deſire. The firſt ſhe decoyed with this hope, was Charles, archduke of Auſtria, the ſame who was propoſed to the Scotiſh Queen by the cardinal of Lorrain. She carried her diſſimulation ſo far, as to ſend Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Suſſex, in embaſſy to the Emperor Maximilian, to ſettle the marriage-articles, the Emperor on his part having diſpatched count Stolberg to keep her in this good reſolution. The earl of Suſſex ſtayed five months at Vienna about this negociation, going thither under color of carrying his Imperial Majeſty the order of the garter: but he was accompanied by lord North, the earl of Leiceſter's creature, who was ordered by his patron to defeat the negociation as much as poſſible, by indirectly intimating to the Imperial court, that the Queen had no deſign to marry, whatever ſhe pretended. The Emperor found afterwards that North was better inſtructed than the embaſſador, who, apprehenſive of the Queen's marrying the earl of Leiceſter, did his utmoſt to adjuſt all differences and remove the objections. The main difficulty was to find expedients, on the article of religion, which ſhould ſatisfy both courts. The Emperor relaxed as much as he could, and the earl, on his part, did whatever lay in his power to remove this obſtacle. They were already agreed, that the archduke ſhould have the title of King of England, and guardianſhip of the children, in caſe the Queen died firſt. As to religion, after the Emperor had often, but in vain, demanded the privilege of a public church for the archduke, he finally conſented that he ſhould be ſatisfied with a private chapel in ſome part of the royal palace, where none of the Engliſh ſhould be admited; and if his manner of worſhip happened to give any offenſe, he ſhould forbear it for a time, and be preſent with the Queen at the church of England's ſervice. But this affair being debated in the council of England, the Queen ſent the earl of Suſſex word, that ſhe could not admit even of this. So the negociation was broke off, tho' without noiſe, with marks of eſteem and friendſhip mutually given by the Emperor and her Majeſty. By the way, this obſtacle concerning religion was the means ever uſed by Elizabeth to fruſtrate all negociations about her marriage: and therefore ſhe always treated with Catholics, becauſe ſhe was ſure of breaking off the treaty juſt when ſhe pleaſed. As for the Proteſtant Princes who offered themſelves while ſhe was of age to marry, ſhe took care to let them ſoon know they had nothing to hope. This deportment confirms the ſuſpicion which had been conſtantly entertained, that ſhe had made a ſetled reſolution never to ſubmit to the matrimonial yoke, tho' her affairs obliged her ſometimes to pretend the contrary.

It breaks off. Camden.

Remark on this affair.

Elizabeth's policy.

Embaſſy from Ruſſia Camden.

This year arrived at London embaſſadors from Ivan Baſilowitz, grand duke or Czar of Muſcovy. Their public commiſſion was, to confirm and renew the favors which the Czar their maſter had granted to the Engliſh merchants, aſſociated by the name of the Ruſſia Company. But with theſe embaſſadors returned Anthony Jenkinſon, a native of England, who had long reſided in that country, and was charged with ſome private inſtructions (1). The Czar's deſign was to make with Elizabeth a league offenſive and defenſive, with a mutual obligation to afford each other a ſafe retreat, in caſe either ſhould be expulſed their dominions. This Prince, who was a moſt notorious tyrant, was willing to provide for his ſafety, being apprehenſive his ſubjects would not always indure his oppreſſions. Elizabeth returned him a dubious anſwer, wherewith he had no reaſon to be pleaſed, and yet two years after he granted the Engliſh merchants privileges which greatly conduced to render flouriſhing their commerce in thoſe regions.

Death of the ducheſs of Norfolk. Camden.

The Netherlandiſh Affairs during this Year, underwent great changes. The grandees were divided, and ſeveral had betrayed the common cauſe. The Prince of Orange was withdrawn to his government, count Horn to his own houſe, and count Egmont continued with the governeſs, who, improving this diſſenſion, revoked whatever grants ſhe had been forced to make the Reformed. Then ſhe ſent for forces from Germany, and raiſed ſome Walloon regiments. Soon after Philip II reſolved to ſend the duke of Alva into thoſe provinces with a ſtrong power of native Spaniards, to chaſtiſe both nobles and people. Hereupon, the Prince of Orange retiring into Germany, the duke of Alva entered the country at the head of his army, without any oppoſition. On his arrival at Bruſſels, the ducheſs of Parma put the government into his hands, when the duke exerciſed inhumanities not neceſſary to be here particulariſed, they being ſo univerſally known. The counts of Egmont (2) and Horn loſt their lives by the common executioner, while Montigny underwent the like in Spain, and all the Prince of Orange's eſtates were confiſcated.

On the other hand, the court of France, under color of fearing the duke of Alva, who was to paſs near the borders, levied ſix thouſand Swiſſers, with deſign to extirpate the Hugonots, while the duke of Alva ſhould do the ſame in the Netherlands, purſuant to the agreement at Bayona. It may be readily comprehended that, in ſuch a juncture, Elizabeth could not attempt the recovery of Calais: it was ſufficient if ſhe could avert the flames which threatened England. Mean while, the Prince of Condé, having with difficulty eſcaped the court ſnares, re-aſſembled the Hugonots by the admiral's aſſiſtance, and was very near ſucceeding in his deſign of carrying off the King at Meaux. After this diſappointment, he blocaded Paris. In ſhort, on the tenth of November was fought at the gates of Paris a battle, wherein fell conſtable Montmorency. This action not being deciſive, the Prince marched to meet Caſimir, count Palatine, who was bringing him a ſuccor of three thouſand foot, and ſix thouſand five hundred horſe. In September, La Noue, one of the Hugonot chiefs, reduced Orleans. Thus were all England's neareſt neighbors, viz. the Scots, French and Netherlanders, in trouble and confuſion, while the Engliſh, thro' their Queen's prudent management, injoyed a profound tranquillity.

It was however at the expenſe of her own quiet that Elizabeth ſecured her peoples repoſe. She had cauſe of apprehenſion as well at home as from abroad, and conſequently was obliged to attend perpetually both to foreign and domeſtic affairs, in order to fruſtrate her enemies projects. The French Hugonots wretched condition gave her no ſmall uneaſineſs. Theirs and her adverſaries were the ſame; and as there was but ſmall appearance of their making head againſt the Papiſts, who were a hundred to one, and ſupported by royal authority, ſhe was apprehenſive that, after their extirpation, the ſtorm would fall upon England. It was ſcarce to be doubted that the war, which was at once carrying on againſt the Proteſtants of both France and the Netherlands, was other than a pure effect of the mutual counſels of the French and Spaniſh courts, and that exterminating the Proteſtant religion was the main object thoſe two courts had in view. Elizabeth therefore judged it abſolutely requiſite to acquaint his Gallic Majeſty, that ſhe was concerned for the preſervation of the Hugonots; whatever reaſon ſhe might have to complain of their behavior to her. To that purpoſe, ſhe ordered Norris, her embaſſador to Charles IX, to intercede earneſtly for them, and give to underſtand, that ſhe too well knew her own intereſt to ſuffer them to be intirely ruined. Theſe threats from England; the reſolution of the Hugonots, and their aſſiſtance from Germany, produced a good effect, and procured them a peace: but it was only a treacherous peace, wherein the court deſigned merely to amuſe them, and which was, on that account, afterwards named the Lame Peace. Catherine di Medicis knowing it would not be long before the war would re-kindle, reſolved to be beforehand, to prevent Elizabeth from aſſiſting the Hugonots. In order thereto, ſhe began to make the Engliſh embaſſador private intimations of a match between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, then barely ſeventeen years of age. Mention ſhall be made elſewhere of the ſequel of this project.

Quarrel between Philip and Elizabeth. Camden. * Sir John Hawkins.

At the ſame time Philip II evidenced his ſpleen againſt Elizabeth, by confining her embaſſador to a village. On the other hand, a certain Engliſh merchant, named Hawkins *, who went to the bay of Mexico with five ſhips, by virtue of the treaty between Charles V and Henry VIII, was inſulted by the Spaniſh fleet, which took and rifled three of his ſhips. Theſe outrages were highly reſented by Queen Elizabeth, eſpecially as the merchants were very clamorouſly importunate for a war with Spain: but ſhe did not think proper then to ſhew her reſentment, for fear of being ingaged farther than the ſituation of her affairs would admit. She had the more reaſon not to enter on ſuch a war, as at the ſame time the affairs of Scotland, which more nearly concerned her, took a new turn, and might be to her of the utmoſt conſequence.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 90. Camden. Spotſwood.

Queen Mary was priſoner at Loch-levin: but that did not hinder her from having ſtill a ſtrong party, conſiſting of all the Catholics, with ſuch as envied and hated the earl of Murray, many of whom had with him the greateſt credit. In reality, the majority of theſe had little kindneſs for Mary, but fancied ſhe could afford them a plauſible pretenſe to act againſt the regent; and it was this which induced them to declare for her. On the other hand, in the regent's party, which was called the King's, there were ſome who were ingaged in it purely to ruin Bothwell, whom they hated and feared. Theſe imagined, if they could get him out of the way, matters would return to their proper channel, and the Queen might eſpouſe ſome Prince who would cauſe Scotland to reflouriſh. Kilcardie, who was of this number, being informed that Bothwell was acting the pyrate near the iſles of Schetland, equiped two veſſels, and reſolved to go in queſt of him, believing all troubles would ceaſe with his death. He was ſo lucky as to meet with him: he purſued and obliged him finally to run his ſhip a-ſhore, and eſcape to land in his boat: but the ſhip was taken with his ſervants, who, it is ſaid, gave information of many particulars relating to the late King's murder, not greatly to the Queen's honor: but there is no relying on ſuch ſort of popular rumors. Bothwell having the good fortune to eſcape, but not knowing which way to turn himſelf, at length determined on retiring to Denmark, where he was ſeized and thrown into priſon. There he lived ten years in extreme miſery, which turned his brain. Camden affirms that, not long before his death, "he ſolemnly proteſted the Queen was in "no degree privy to the murder of the King her "huſband." But, as uſual, this author acquaints us not whence he had this particular (1).

Bothwell being no longer to be feared, all ſuch as thro' hatred of him had declared againſt the Queen, forſook the King's party, ſome privately, others openly. Lidington and lord Boyd were among thoſe who feigned to be ſtill attached to the regent, in order to have a fairer opportunity to do the Queen ſervice. The earl of Argyle wavered for a time, but at length quited Murray, and joined the contrary faction.

The Queen eſcapes out of priſon. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 90. Spotſwood.

A few days after, the regent, being at Glaſgow, had there notice of the Queen's having made her eſcape from Loch-levin (2), and being at Hamilton caſtle, only twelve miles from Glaſgow. This news quickly ſpreading, lord Boyd, who was of the regent's council, inſtantly forſook him and repaired to her Majeſty.

She marches againſt the regent. Melvil. p. 90, 91. Buchanan. Camden.

The regent was extremely perplexed, eſpecially as he learned at the ſame time, that the Queen's friends were from every quarter amaſſing forces which flocked to her in great multitudes. This made him ſenſible, he muſt either quit his party, or try the fortune of a battle. He choſe the latter, and aſſembling ſome troops, tho' in number very inferior to the Queen's, he departed Glaſgow at the very juncture when her Majeſty ſet out in order to attack him. Melvil ſays, the Queen's deſign at firſt was not to fight, having left Hamilton caſtle only to retire to Dunbarton, but that the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, and the other chiefs of her faction, (3) were for hazarding a battle, truſting to their numbers, and hoping, on the regent's being routed, to govern all in the Queen's name. But howſoever it was, this army, in number ſix thouſand, advancing towards Glaſgow, met the regent who was only four thouſand ſtrong, and the battle began. It is needleſs here to enter on a detail of this incounter. It ſuffices to ſay in brief, that Mary loſt the day, and, for fear of falling into her enemies hands, fled towards the borders of England. She choſe for her firſt retreat the houſe of Maxwell, baron of Herris: but, a few days after, not thinking herſelf ſafe there, or any where elſe within the realm, ſhe determined on retiring into England. On ever ſo ſlight attention to what had thitherto paſſed between Elizabeth and Mary, and to the juſt reaſons they had to diſtruſt and conſider each other as real enemies, notwithſtanding their external demonſtrations of reciprocal amity, which was all diſſimulation, it cannot be believed that Mary would have voluntarily ſought refuge in England, had it been in her choice to retire elſewhere. But there was a neceſſity either of being again in the power of her Scotiſh adverſaries, or of ſurrendering into the hands of Elizabeth her rival. Of the two dangers, one was near and infallible: the other was yet diſtant, and not ſo certain as to deſtroy all hope of ſuccor from that Queen's generoſity. However, having fixed her reſolution, ſhe diſpatched away John Beton, one of her menials, to Elizabeth, to deſire her protection and leave to retire into England. Camden ſays, ſhe ſent by the ſame meſſenger a diamond, which ſhe had received from her as a pledge of her friendſhip, and promiſe to aſſiſt her to the utmoſt of her power, when there ſhould be occaſion: and yet this ſame author has inſerted, under the year 1582 of his annals, a letter of Mary to Elizabeth, wherein it appears this diamond was ſent back before the battle of Glaſgow; beſide, tho' very poſſibly Elizabeth might have accompanied her preſent of the diamond with ſome tender and affectionate expreſſions, and alſo ſome general promiſes, it is not likely ſhe intended to oblige herſelf ſo far as Camden would inſinuate. This is what I believe for ſeveral reaſons. Firſt, it is certain Elizabeth was never ſo well-affected to Mary. Secondly, ſuch ingagement was directly contrary to her intereſt, which required not ſhe ſhould be ſo very mindful of her rival's proſperity. Laſtly, no juncture of time can be aſſigned, when Elizabeth was under any neceſſity to carry her diſſimulation to that height. Camden adds, that Elizabeth did, by the ſame Beton, certify Mary, that ſhe would give her all the proofs of friendſhip which could be expected from a ſiſter. But, as I have often hinted, it is not always ſafe to rely wholly on this author's teſtimony. However, before this anſwer arrived, Mary, fearing to be diſcovered in her retreat, took boat, and came to Wirkinton in Cumberland, attended only by lords Herris and Fleming, and a few ſervants. The ſame day ſhe wrote to Elizabeth, acquainting her with her arrival in England. In this letter ſhe likewiſe told her; that having eſcaped from priſon, and intending to go to Dunbarton, her enemies came againſt her to diſpute her paſſage (1), and defeated her army: that this misfortune obliged her to quit her kingdom, where ſhe could not be with ſafety, to come and implore her protection; withal intreating, ſhe would order her being conducted to her preſenſe: adjoining alſo in the ſame letter, "That "her enemies, after murdering her ſervant before "her face, had commited a new crime, which they "pretended to charge her with, tho' themſelves "had ploted it, as appears by a writing under their "own hands and ſeals". It is this doubtleſs which gave Camden occaſion to ſay, under the year 1567, that the earls of Murray and Morton bound themſelves by a writing to ſupport Bothwell when he ſhould have killed the King (2). If this writing, which never appeared, were really true, it would evidently follow that Mary was not ignorant of Bothwell's being author of the King her huſband's murder, ſince ſhe knew Murray and Morton had promiſed to ſcreen him: but it is not likely, ſhe would have made ſuch a confeſſion to Elizabeth. Beſide, on ſuppoſition that Mary's letter was ſuch as Camden repreſents it, ſhe names not the earl of Murray: ſhe only imputes to her enemies the crime whereof ſhe herſelf was accuſed. We ſhall ſee hereafter how ſhe maintained what ſhe had advanced, and after what manner ſhe made her defenſe.

She writes to Elizabeth. Leſley. Camden. Anderſon, Vol. IV. p. 7. 19.

Elizabeth being informed the Queen of Scots was in England, after the loſs of a battle, ſent ſir Francis Knolles to comfort her, and ordered her to be lodged at a gentleman's houſe, where ſhe was royally treated. After that, ſhe was conducted to Carliſle (3). Here, according to Camden, Mary wrote Queen Elizabeth a ſecond letter, intreating her either to admit her to her preſenſe, or give her leave to depart elſewhere. Camden ſays, "That Elizabeth was touched with compaſſion, becauſe the "Queen of Scots offered to debate her cauſe before "her, and to ingaged to prove her adverſaries guilty "of the crime they unjuſtly loaded her with". But this hiſtorian ſtretches a little too far what Mary ſaid in her letter, ſince ſhe offered not to prove her adverſaries guilty; nor indeed did ſhe ever attempt it. There is not a ſingle word in Camden's annals concerning the Queen of Scots, but what muſt be guarded againſt. We are going to ſee Elizabeth's compaſſion for this Queen. She ſent her word, that as ſhe ſtood charged, by the public's voice, with being privy to the murder of the King her husband, or at leaſt with not inquiring after the murderers, and with keeping ſtill in her ſervice, and in her very houſe, ſuch as were accuſed of being accomplices, ſhe could not ſee her 'till ſhe was cleared fully of ſuch heinous accuſations, and deſired to know in what manner ſhe intended to juſtify herſelf. Whereupon, it was agreed, that Elizabeth ſhould hear her defenſe, and protect her if innocent. It is very probable, or rather certain, that herein Elizabeth deſigned only to gain time, and have a pretenſe to detain her 'till ſhe had determined how to proceed; in which point her council were not a little perplexed.

Elizabeth refuſes to ſee Mary 'till ſhe has juſtified herſelf. Camden. Walſingham's negociations. Norris's inſtructions. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. p. 4, 7, &c.

Diverſe methods were on this occaſion to be taken, and each had its difficulties: but, as is very uſual in the councils of Princes, the ſtar whereby the miniſters and counſellors were guided was not juſtice or equi y, but the Queen's ſafety. In much the ſame caſe Henry IV detained the King of Scotland's eldeſt ſon, who was afterwards King himſelf, under color, that he had entered his dominions without leave, and that Prince was held in durance 'till the reign of Henry VI. It cannot be denied, that a Sovereign has power to ſeize a foreign Prince, who enters his territories without a ſafe-conduct. But there are caſes wherein right rigidly aſſerted becomes the greateſt injuſtice. Such was that of Henry IV with regard to the Prince of Scotland. But in Mary's caſe, the circumſtances appeared ſtill more favorable. It was a woman, expulſed by her own ſubjects, whoſe farther violence ſhe feared, and who, far from giving room for ſuſpicion of any ill deſign againſt England, was come only for refuge, and to implore the protection of a Queen her near relation, who had always affected to give her marks of friendſhip. So to conſider Mary's fault only as a ſort of violation of national law, ſhe merited not being detained in captivity: but, as I ſaid, it is not always by theſe maxims that Sovereigns are guided. The point in debate in the Engliſh council was, not to ſearch for what was moſt conſonant to juſtice or generoſity, but what was moſt advantageous (4). The various courſes therefore which might be taken with reſpect to the Queen of Scots were examined, in order to chuſe the moſt beneficial to Elizabeth. The firſt was, reſtoring her forcibly to the throne, by way of example, that ſubjects ſhall not expel their Sovereigns with impunity. Tho' this was what Elizabeth ſhould have done as a Sovereign, yet other more particular conſiderations prevented her laboring to reſtore and render more powerful a Queen whom ſhe juſtly looked on as a dangerous rival. For the ſame reaſon it was to be feared, if ſhe ſent her back to Scotland, tho' without ſuccors, her faction would revive, and one victory, which was not impoſſible, might render her abſolute; in which caſe ſhe might recall the French into Scotland, and purſue the execution of the projects formed in France, in the reign of Francis II, her firſt conſort. On the other hand, if ſhe were ſent over to France, there was no certainty that ſhe would not return to Scotland: beſide, if the King of France and Princes of Lorrain were maſters of her perſon, it was very likely they would make uſe of her name to invade England, and the Pope and King of Spain join with them. There was no way therefore but to keep her in England, either free, or in priſon: but leaving her at full liberty was runing a manifeſt hazard. Her title to the crown of England would draw to her court all the Catholics and diſaffected perſons in the kingdom, as well as the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, to aſſiſt her with their counſels. If, being abſent, ſhe had been able to form a ſtrong party in England, how much more might her preſenſe render the ſame faction more numerous and powerful. Certain it is that, notwithſtanding the Queen of England and her miniſters pretended to think it very ſtrange Mary ſhould claim the Engliſh crown, they however knew the grounds of her title, and that many people were convinced of its being even more legitimate than Elizabeth's. Finally, in detaining her in priſon, there was no queſtion Elizabeth would incur the indignation of all Europe by this exceſs of ſeverity, the motives whereof all people would not comprehend. This was however the courſe which Elizabeth took, by the advice of her council, and undoubtedly alſo by her own inclination. It is certain, beſide the reaſons of ſtate which induced her thereto, ſhe was likewiſe moved by a perſonal jealouſy of the Scotiſh Queen, who had much the advantage of her in beauty and youth, tho' very far inferior to her in other reſpects. However, to color in ſome meaſure the ſeverity which was to be uſed to this Queen, Elizabeth concluded to feign being deeply concerned for her misfortune, and extremely deſirous of being convinced of her innocence, that ſhe might afterwards give her a powerful aſſiſtance, without fear of reproach: but withal, ſhe reſolved to delay the methods to be uſed for this purpoſe, 'till time and opportunity ſhould afford room for other meaſures. From thenceforward, ſhe conſtantly refuſed liſtening to ſuch as offered to traduce Queen Mary; but then ſhe was not ſorry that ſundry accuſations were publicly ſpread againſt her, that it might not be thought ſtrange this affair could not be ſuddenly cleared. So, Camden had reaſon to ſay, Elizabeth ſeemed touched with a ſenſe of the Queen of Scotland's misfortune, and openly deteſted the behavior of the Scots: but it follows not that theſe were her real ſentiments. Her aim being only to prolong the affair, under color of laboring her priſoner's juſtification, it was not proper ſhe ſhould, by her diſcourſes, declare herſelf a party againſt her: ſhe ought rather to ſhew ſhe inclined to her ſide. Mary herſelf was long deceived by this policy. She imagined Elizabeth really intended to ſerve her: but finally diſcovering the artifice, ſhe reſolved to take ſuch meaſures as furniſhed her enemy with a plauſible pretenſe to detain her in priſon. I will venture to affirm this to be the true key of the affair, which will never be rightly comprehended if we build on what has been advanced by the hiſtorians of either faction.

Elizabeth reſolves to detain her. Camden.

Elizabeth's policy.

While all this paſſed in England, the earl of Murray called a parliament at Edinburg, to get thoſe condemned who had, in Mary's behalf, taken arms againſt the King's Majeſty. The oppoſite faction ſeeing they were like to be oppreſſed by the decree of the ſtates, exerted their utmoſt to prevent their aſſembling. They even demanded aid of the French, who concluded on tranſporting into Scotland a body of forces, under conduct of Martigues. In the interim, Mary's partiſans met at Glaſgow, to conſult how to prevent the parliament's meeting; but, as they could not agree, the earl of Argyle returned home. The earl of Huntley, more fiery than the reſt, aſſembled ſome troops, and poſted himſelf at Perth, to alarm the regent, 'till the arrival of the French ſuccors: but the civil war, which re-kindled in France, obliging King Charles to retain the army deſigned for Scotland, Huntley was obliged to retire. This reſourſe failing, the Queen's friends applied to Elizabeth, repreſenting to her, that the regent, by moſt unſeaſonably convening a parliament, was going to drive the principal lords of Scotland to deſpair, and offered to take her for umpire of their differences with the regent. This offer was very grateful to Elizabeth, becauſe ſhe could thereby render herſelf miſtreſs of the affair, and prolong it as ſhe pleaſed. She therefore gave Murray to underſtand, that he would oblige her in defering the parliament 'till ſhe was better informed of the reaſons which had induced the Scots to deprive their Queen of the adminiſtration. But he deſired to be excuſed, and held the parliament on the day appointed. Buchanan pretends that Lidington, who feigned to be attached to the regent, managed it ſo by his intrigues, that the ſtates reſolved to puniſh only ſome of the moſt guilty, and that this indulgence was a great means to ſtrengthen the Queen's party. The parliament breaking up, the regent raiſed a force to purſue thoſe who were condemned. He reduced to the King's obedience diverſe places, and would very probably have over-run the whole kingdom, had not the court of England interrupted the execution of his deſigns.

Buchanan.

Elizabeth takes great advantage of the troubles in Scotland. Camden. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

Elizabeth foreſaw ſuch conſiderable advantage in arbitrating the Scotiſh affairs, that ſhe took care not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity, without improving it. To compaſs her ends with greater facility, ſhe intimated (and that not very privately) that ſhe believed the Queen of Scots innocent; that ſhe herſelf was concerned in the quarrel, which all Sovereigns ought to eſpouſe, and that it was their intereſt to chaſtiſe rebellious ſubjects, who might give a dangerous precedent to others. In a word, ſhe ſo artfully diſguiſed her ſentiments, that Queen Mary's friends, blinded by theſe appearances, perſuaded that unhappy Princeſs to offer to appoint commiſſioners to defend her cauſe before the Queen of England, and ſo fell into the net ſpread for her by Elizabeth. She had no ſooner made this imprudent offer, but Elizabeth wrote to the earl of Murray, that the proceedings of the Scots in depoſing their Queen were ſo extraordinary, that ſhe could not approve them except they ſhewed, by very good reaſons, that they could not have acted otherwiſe: that if their Queen were innocent, ſhe deemed herſelf bound by all imaginable conſiderations to protect her, and reſtore her to the throne, but was willing, before ſhe came to any reſolution, to hear what they had to ſay in vindication of their conduct: that therefore, ſhe deſired the regent would ſend ſome well-informed perſons to York, where ſhe would order commiſſioners to hear what the Scots had to alledge againſt their Queen: that it was neceſſary he ſhould in perſon clear himſelf of the crimes he was accuſed of; and to conclude, ſhe gave him to underſtand, ſhe ſhould take his refuſal as as a moſt authentic proof of Mary's innocence. Elizabeth muſt have talked in a ſtile ſomewhat lofty to oblige the regent to take ſo extraordinary a ſtep: beſide, it was no leſs neceſſary to keep by that means the Queen of Scots in the belief that Elizabeth ſought only to bring her off honorably, for fear ſhe ſhould revoke the conſent ſhe had given. Elizabeth's real aim was to have a pretext to detain the Queen of Scots, 'till the affair ſhould be cleared, well knowing ſhe ſhould not want means to prolong it as ſhe pleaſed: beſide, how much ſoever ſhe pretended not to be fully informed, ſhe knew enough to judge that the Scots would bring good evidence againſt Queen Mary, and thereby furniſh her with a very natural excuſe to require a farther examination. All this was extremely agreeable to the ſcheme ſhe had laid, and afforded her means to ſilence the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, who preſſed her continually in behalf of the captive Queen. She told them, ſhe deſigned to aid her ſiſter Mary with her whole power, and replace her in her primitive dignity; but decency required her ſaid Majeſty ſhould firſt be, in the world's eye, cleared of the crime wherewith ſhe was charged, and that all poſſible expedition was uſing to manifeſt her innocence.

The regent determines on going. Buchanan. Melvil, p. 93. Camden.

The earl of Murray was at a ſtrange loſs what anſwer he ſhould return to Elizabeth's ſummons. It was dangerous for a regent of Scotland to put to arbitration a buſineſs already decided in parliament, and diſhonorable to anſwer before a foreign power. But, on the other hand, he could ſupport himſelf only by the aſſiſtance of England; how much leſs if Elizabeth ſhould reſolve to reſtore Mary to the throne? Beſide, he was apprehenſive his refuſal would be conſtrued as a token of his miſtruſting the juſtice of his cauſe. So, after conſulting his friends on ſo nice a point, he reſolved to go himſelf to York, with eleven deputies nominated for his aſſiſtants (1). Theſe were, James Douglas earl of Morton, Adam biſhop of Orkney, Robert commendator of Dumfermling, and Patric lord Lindſay. Mary nominated the lords Herris, Levingſton, Boyd, Gavin commendator of Kylwyning, John Gordon of Locheinvarr, James Cockburne of Skirling knight, and the biſhop of Roſs. Elizabeth commiſſioned Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff earl of Suſſex, and ſir Ralph Sadler, to hear what both parties had to alledge, pro and con. All theſe perſonages entered York on the ſame day, viz. the fourth of October.

In order fully to underſtand what paſſed at the conference of York, and at another afterwards at Hampton-Court, it will be neceſſary to know what is ſaid on this occaſion in Melvil's memoirs. Without this key, there is no comprehending any thing by Buchanan's account, and ſtill leſs by Camden's, who indeavored rather to darken, than clear the affair. What Melvil relates is a ſecret, equally unknown to Buchanan and Camden.

Account of a private affair which paſſed at the York conference. Buchanan.

Very ſeemingly, the duke of Norfolk, who had buried his ducheſs the preceding year, had already formed the project of marrying the Queen of Scots, before he repaired to York; at leaſt, it may be affirmed, this duke was the chief of all Mary's friends in England; for which reaſon, he accepted the commiſſion of preſiding at the York conference, only to hinder the ſucceſs Elizabeth expected, and to break her meaſures. However ſecret Queen Elizabeth's ſcheme was kept, the duke of Norfolk was moſt apparently well appriſed of the whole; courtiers having uſually a wonderful ſagacity to diſcover what the Prince would moſt conceal: nay, it is ſaid, he had injoined the earl of Weſtmoreland, his lieutenant in the preſidentſhip of the north, to diſpatch the earl of Murray when he came upon the borders, and ſeize all his papers, in order to deſtroy the proofs he was bringing againſt Queen Mary; but, altering his mind, had revoked the order. In the begining of the conference, he ſtarted ſeveral incidents to retard concluding the affair in debate: but at laſt, perceiving all his indeavors would avail only for a few days delay, he opened his mind to Lidington, who, tho' ſuſpected by all the King's party, had attended the regent as deputy and ſecretary of ſtate. The duke told this lord, that he could not imagine what had induced the Scots to come and accuſe their Queen before Engliſh commiſſioners; that they greatly diſhonored their nation, and would one day be reſponſible for it. Lidington replied, he was very glad to find him of this opinion; that, for his part, he had uſed his utmoſt efforts to hinder the regent from taking this ſtep; that Kircaldie had done the like, but in vain; and if he had accompanied the regent, it was only in hopes of ſucceeding better in England, and deſired him to diſcourſe the regent, and attempt diſſuading him from accuſing the Queen. The duke of Norfolk thereby knowing that Murray's procedure was not approved by his whole party, and that even remonſtrances had been made him on this occaſion, hoped in ſome meaſure to prevail by arguing with him perſonally. They met therefore privately; when the duke, repreſenting to him what he had before intimated to Lidington, added, That he was much miſtaken, if he imagined Elizabeth intended to give ſentence on the difference he and his party had with the Queen of Scots: but that her ſole aim was to make them ſubſervient to her own ends: that if he deſired to be convinced of this, he had only to require a promiſe under her own hand, to give ſentence as ſoon as the proofs ſhould be produced, and to ſupport the King of Scotland's party, in caſe the Queen his mother was found guilty: that Queen Elizabeth would never give any ſuch promiſe in writing, and thereby manifeſt that ſhe ſought only to amuſe them. In ſhort, he ſo managed the regent, that before parting they agreed that Murray ſhould, when called upon to produce his evidences, demand a previous ingagement from the Queen, ſuch as had been ſuggeſted to him by the duke of Norfolk. The regent communicated not this agreement to any except Lidington and ſir James Melvil, who liked it extremely.

At the next meeting, the regent being preſſed to give in his proofs againſt the Queen of Scots, replied as he had agreed with the duke of Norfolk, to the great ſurpriſe of all preſent, except thoſe who were in the ſecret. It was therefore reſolved to write to Queen Elizabeth, to inform her of this new and unexpected difficulty, and to know whether ſhe would give the regent of Scotland the ingagement he demanded. Her anſwer was, ſhe thought it very ſtrange her word could not be taken, but that a writing under her own hand ſhould be required, and prayed the earl of Murray to ſend two deputies to acquaint her with his reaſons. The regent choſe for this purpoſe Lidington (2), and Macgil, to the great amazement of all the other deputies, who could not conceive that he ſhould truſt with ſuch a commiſſion ſecretary Lidington, of whom the whole party were ſo diffident.

Not long after, Elizabeth requeſted the regent to come himſelf to London with the two deputies, whereto he conſented. Being arrived, ſhe appointed other commiſſioners to confer with them, namely, ſir Nicholas Bacon, Cecil, the earl of Leiceſter, the lord high-admiral, and ſir William Sadler. Seemingly, ſhe ſuſpected the duke of Norfolk of ſome prevarication; nor was her ſuſpicion groundleſs. She heartily wiſhed, on diverſe accounts, to have in her hands the proofs intended to be uſed in ſupport of the accuſation againſt the Queen of Scots. Firſt, to ſilence ſuch as murmured at her not moving towards reſtoring that Princeſs: and in effect it was evident that, if Mary were guilty of the crime laid to her charge, ſhe was unworthy her protection. Secondly, having theſe proofs in her power, ſhe would not only have the management of this affair, but might alſo cauſe all delays to be conſidered as ſo many favors to Mary, who moſt apparently would not dare any more to preſs for her deciſion. Hatred and jealouſy might poſſibly be a third reaſon; Elizabeth injoying a ſecret pleaſure at the mortifications of her rival. In the firſt conferences at Hampton-court, the Engliſh commiſſioners were very urgent with the earl of Murray, to give in his proofs againſt Mary. He anſwered, it was with extreme reluctance that he could reſolve to accuſe the Queen his ſiſter, and ſhould never proceed to this extremity, except it were for the real benefit and advantage of all Scotland: that therefore he required the Queen of England's written promiſe to protect the young King, in caſe the Queen his mother were found guilty.

The affair being in this ſituation, and the earl of Murray ſtill perſiſting in his demand, the earl of Morton chanced to get intelligence of his agreement with the duke of Norfolk, from ſome one whom Mary had truſted with the ſecret. Then it was Morton came to know the true motive of the regent's conduct, which hitherto ſeemed to him incomprehenſible, ſince he refuſed to accuſe the Queen, tho' he was come to England for that and no other purpoſe. He imparted the ſecret to ſome of his collegues, and they reſolved to acquaint therewith ſecretary Cecil. What paſſed afterwards between Cecil and Murray is not known; but it may be conjectured by what followed, that Murray ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed with to act directly contrary to his ingagement with the duke of Norfolk.

Melvil, p. 96.

At the firſt meeting after this diſcovery, the Engliſh commiſſioners demanding that the proofs againſt the Scotiſh Queen ſhould be given in, and the regent refuſing it, all the Scots, except Lidington, were for producing them. Then Wood, ſecretary to the regent, pretending a zeal for his maſter, ſaid, it was not from a ſpirit of cavil, as ſome thought, that the regent would not give in the accuſation, but becauſe the Queen of England refuſed the required promiſe: that this promiſe being given, he would immediately deliver the accuſation and proofs which he had all ready; and with that, he took the papers from his boſom, and ſhewed them to the whole aſſembly: but while he held them up, the biſhop of Orkney ſnatched them away without much difficulty, and gave them to the Engliſh commiſſioners. It is manifeſt that Murray had been gained by Elizabeth's miniſters, and took this way purely to ſave in ſome meaſure his promiſe to the duke of Norfolk. With this key it will be eaſy to underſtand what Buchanan and Camden ſay about the York conferences, which I ſhall but juſt mention, becauſe, as theſe two hiſtorians were ignorant of the duke of Norfolk's ſecret intentions, and the motives of the regent's conduct, what they have related cannot be of much ſervice towards clearing this part of the hiſtory.

ELIZAB. An° 1568.

At the York conferences, Mary's deputies were heard firſt. They proteſted, that the preſent proceedings ſhould not be prejudicial to the rights of Scotland, ſince Queen Elizabeth had no power to interfere in the affairs of that kingdom. Then they ſet forth at large the injuries received by Queen Mary from her own ſubjects, and craved Elizabeth's aſſiſtance to recover her throne. The earl of Murray anſwered, that Bothwell was author of the King's murder: that he carried away the Queen with her own conſent, and publicly married her: that afterwards, ſhe reſigned the crown to the Prince her ſon: that this reſignation was confirmed in parliament, and it was not in his power to alter what the ſtates had ratified. Mary's deputies replied, that the Queen's marriage with Bothwell was not a ſufficient reaſon to depoſe her, becauſe Bothwell was legally acquited: that it was moreover evident, that Bothwell was only a pretenſe made uſe of by the rebels to act againſt the Queen, ſince they might have taken him had they pleaſed; but they let him eſcape, becauſe the Queen herſelf was their ſole object. Then they made appear, that the reſignation of the crown was forcibly extorted, ſince it was not in the Queen's power to refuſe it.

Camden.

Both parties being heard on theſe general points, the Engliſh commiſſioners declared, they could not admit the proteſtation againſt the Queen's being a competent judge, by reaſon of her right of Sovereignty over the Scotiſh realm. As to the regent's reply, they ſaid, her Majeſty having commiſſioned them to hear what the deputies of Scotland had to alledge againſt their Queen, they could not allow the ſtates determination to be valid, becauſe the queſtion was to know, whether they had juſt grounds to determine in the manner they had done, which could not be anſwered 'till the reaſons whereon their determination was grounded were examined. Then they appointed the ſeventh of October to examine the proofs.

Buchanan.

Melvil, p. 94.

At this meeting, the duke of Norfolk, who ſought only to gain time, required, that the regent ſhould do homage to Queen Elizabeth for the kingdom of Scotland. But Lidington anſwered for him, and affirmed, the kingdom of Scotland owed no homage to England; that if the Kings of Scotland had formerly done any, it was only for the earldom of Huntington and ſome other lands, which were ſince repoſſeſſed by the Engliſh (1).

Between this and the next meeting, on the ſeventh of October, it was that the earl of Murray made the above-hinted agreement with the duke of Norfolk. Lidington opened this ſeſſion with a ſpeech directed to the regent and deputies of Scotland, telling them, "That whereas it appeared, by the "authority granted by the Queen of England to "her commiſſioners, that her whole deſign was to "ingage the Scots to throw a blemiſh on the re"putation of their King's mother, they would "therefore do well to conſider carefully before"hand, what hazard they expoſed themſelves to, "and how they would draw upon themſelves the "reſentment of the Queen, her relations, and "friends, and the indignation of all Europe, "ſhould they impeach her of a crime which muſt "ſtain her honor, and in ſo public a manner be"fore the Engliſh, the profeſſed enemies of Scot"land. What account would they be able to give "their King, when he came of age, of a charge "ſo bold and diſhonorable to himſelf, to his " mother, and to the whole nation? He therefore " for his part thought neceſſary to wave ſuch a " ſcandalous accuſation; or if they would pro- " ceed, it was at leaſt requiſite, that the Queen " of England ſhould expreſly ingage to defend " them againſt ſuch as ſhould hereafter give them " any diſturbance on this account." He concluded, with ſaying, " that he thought it his duty " to give them this advice, as he was ſecretary of " Scotland."

It eaſy to perceive, that the drift of this ſpeech was to give the regent ſome good excuſe to drop the accuſation, anſwerably to his ingagement with the duke of Norfolk. He was come from Scotland purpoſely to accuſe the Queen, being provided with all the proofs he deſigned to uſe: but had changed his mind thro' the duke of Norfolk's ſuggeſtions. It was therefore requiſite to deviſe a pretenſe for this change; and this pretenſe Lidington furniſhed, by laying before him ſuch plauſible reaſons. Camden and Buchanan were puzzled to account for the earl of Murray's ſudden change. Camden would inſinuate, that the ingagement he demanded of Elizabeth was a mere cavil to cover his miſtruſt of the juſtice of his cauſe. He ſays, the Engliſh commiſſioners earneſtly preſſed him to give proofs of the accuſation, which as yet appeared to be founded only on a few letters from the Queen, ſo much the more ſuſpicious as Lidington had privately intimated that he himſelf had often counterfeited her writing. But I believe Camden would have been at a loſs to prove, that any of the articles of this accuſation were examined at York. Buchanan, who knew as little of the ſecret as Camden, tho' he was one of the Scotiſh deputies *, pretends, that the regent, purely thro' a conſciencious ſcruple, declined accuſing his royal ſiſter in the preſenſe of foreigners.

Hampton court conference. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. Part II p. 197, &c.

The York conference breaking off, and being, as I ſaid, removed to Hampton court (1) before new commiſſioners, the regent, or Wood his ſecretary, ſuffered the accuſation and proofs to be ſnatched out of his hand: which done, a day was appointed for the Scots to inlarge on their proofs. To this the regent agreed, and demanded that Mary's deputies ſhould be preſent, that they might urge their objections, in order to a farther clearing of matters (2). But the day being come, her ſaid Majeſty's deputies produced a formal revocation of their commiſſion, and exception againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, if the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors were not joined with them. Mary demanded farther, that the earl of Murray ſhould be ſent to priſon, affirming, ſhe could convict him of being author of the King's death.

Camden.

This revocation, juſt at the critical time when the proofs againſt Mary were to be examined, gave occaſion to ſuſpect her diffidence of being able to make a pertinent anſwer. While ſhe was entertained with hope that matters would not be brought to the producing and examining proofs, ſhe had left a full power with her deputies: but immediately on her finding that Elizabeth, inſtead of ſerving her as ſhe expected, was for bringing to light what was ſufficient to blaſt her character, ſhe believed it abſolutely neceſſary to avoid ſuch examination. For this reaſon, ſhe revoked the commiſſion to her deputies, excepted againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, and required a mere impoſſibility, being well aſſured that the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors would not receive a commiſſion from the Queen of England, as alſo that Elizabeth would never admit their being concerned in the affair. Finally, ſhe mentioned not offering to prove the earl of Murray guilty of the King's murder, 'till ſhe had revoked the power of thoſe who were in her name to have accuſed him. All theſe circumſtances give occaſion to believe, ſhe dreaded the event of this examination, tho', by her letters to Elizabeth, ſhe expreſſed herſelf moſt earneſtly deſirous of having opportunity to make appear her innocence before her Maj ſty.

Elizab. An' 1568.

Elizabeth did not much trouble herſelf about theſe acts. Her deſign was not to judge the Scotiſh Queen, but to draw from her accuſation, and the proofs, a pretext to detain her 'till the affair ſhould be fully cleared, being reſolved never to allow the matter to be ſufficiently explained, either for or againſt, yet ſtill to teſtify how glad ſhe ſhould be to find her innocent. I ſay only to teſtify, for certainly ſhe was highly rejoiced at having in her hands proper proofs to ſhew on occaſion, that ſhe could not juſtify her. This part ſhe played for a conſiderable while.

Elizabeth's policy.

In fine, tho' Mary had excepted againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, they however proceeded to examine the proofs. The earl of Murray produced the confeſſions of thoſe who were executed for being concerned in the King's aſſaſſination. Then he read the ſtates decree, confirming Queen Mary's reſignation of the crown to the King her ſon. After which, he produced the fatal caſket, which Bothwell would have removed from Edinburg caſtle, and ſhewed the above-mentioned letters, verſes and contracts. This is what Buchanan, who was then preſent, atteſts (3). But Camden, without deſcending to any particulars, contents himſelf with ſaying, " The earl of Murray indeavored to " prove her guilty of her huſband's murder, by " conjectural proofs and circumſtances, by ſome " few affidavits, by certain love-letters and verſes " writ, as he affirmed, with the Queen's own " hand. But theſe letters and verſes were little " regarded, there being no name or date to them."

Examination of the proofs. Decem. 3. Buchanan. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. Part II p. 149, 169. p. 150, 174. Decem. 8.

Buchanan's hiſtory was in many hands when Camden compiled his annals. The firſt of theſe writers atteſts, that in the caſket were found letters containing the whole conſpiracy againſt the King, and the Queen's rape, beſide the contracts. Camden inſiſts on ſome letters and verſes, and even inſinuates their being forged. Had he writ firſt, he might have preſumed his aſſertions would not have been conteſted: but as he wrote forty years after Buchanan, he ought, in my opinion, either to have poſitively denied or explained the facts related by that hiſtorian; and therefore, as he does not confute them, it is plain he had nothing material to object thereto. He farther adds, Murray gave the commiſſioners a book of Buchanan's, intitled, the

(2) On November 6 the accuſation againſt Queen Mary was produced; and indeed it was very home and expreſs. " It is " certain, and we boldly and conſtantly affirm, (ſay the regent and deputies) that as James, ſome time earl of Bothwell, was the " chief executor of the horrible and unworthy murder, perpetrate in the perſon of the late King Henry of good memory, father " to our Sovereign Lord, and the Queen's lawful huſband; ſo was ſhe of the foreknowledge, counſel, device, perſuader, and " commander of the ſaid murder to be done, maintainer and fortifier of the executors thereof, by impeding and ſtoping the " inquiſition and puniſhment due for the ſame, according to the laws of the realm, and conſequently by marriage with the ſaid " James, ſometime earl of Bothwell, univerſally eſteemed chief author of the abovenamed murder." To this the Queen's commiſſioners replied; by charging that accuſation with falſhood; by aſſerting, that ſome of the accuſers were privy to, nay, the firſt inventors of the conſpiracy for the death of the late King, as was made manifeſt before ten thouſand people at the execution of the principal offenders; and laſtly, by refuſing to proceed, unleſs Queen Mary was admited to anſwer for herſelf. Ibid.

Detection, wherein was a circumſtantial narrative of the King's murder, with the vouchers; but that it found little credit with the commiſſioners, "because the author's pen was venal." As to the confeſſions of thoſe who were executed, he ſays in another place, that all, even with their lateſt breath, declared the Queen innocent. Here he owns the depoſitions of the ſame people were produced againſt her, but makes not thereto a ſyllable of reply. He however adds, that Elizabeth was very well pleaſed theſe accuſations had ſomewhat impaired the Scotiſh Queen's reputation: but if the commiſſioners gave no credit to the proofs of the accuſers, as he would inſinuate, Mary's reputation could not be impaired, but, on the contrary, ſhe would have been abſolutely juſtified.

Elizabeth will not decide the matter. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. Part II. p. 144, &c.

The examination being over, Elizabeth forbore to decide either for or againſt, as ſhe had reſolved. Mean while, as Mary's friends were indeavouring to raiſe troubles in Scotland, and the regent's preſenſe was neceſſary, Elizabeth took occaſion to put off the concluſion of the affair 'till a more proper ſeaſon. Thus ſhe gained her point, viz. a pretext to detain Mary 'till the buſineſs was capable of being more fully cleared, and at the ſame time ſhe might poſſibly procure proofs which might deter that Queen and her friends from ſolliciting a deciſion. Buchanan affirms, her having it intimated to the Scotiſh deputies, that thus far ſhe perceived not any thing blameable in the Scots conduct. Camden, on the other hand, ſays ſhe abhorred their inſolence. Melvil affirms her giving Mary to underſtand, that ſhe believed her wrongfully accuſed, and could not enough deteſt the arrogance of her accuſers; nor ſhould the accuſation be ever made public. The difference between Camden and Melvil is, that Melvil relates this only to ſhew to what height Elizabeth carried her diſſimulation; but Camden pretends thence to infer that ſhe really believed her innocent. After all, the accounts of theſe three authors may be equally true, becauſe Elizabeth's ſcheme was to leave the affair undetermined, and to put both parties in hope of her favor. Buchanan ſays, before the conference brake up, Murray offered to clear himſelf of the King's murder before Mary's deputies; but that they thought proper to drop the accuſation (1). They could ſcarcely do otherwiſe; for even could they have hoped to convict him, their commiſſion was revoked.

Tho', according to Melvil, Elizabeth ſaid ſhe would never more admit the earl of Murray into her preſenſe, ſhe had nevertheleſs with him ſeveral conferences. In theſe conferences it was, that he informed her of whatever had paſſed between him and the duke of Norfolk (2), and ſhewed her letters from Mary, which had been intercepted in Scotland, wherein ſhe complained, in very harſh terms, of the treatment ſhe received ſince her arrival in England. Moreover, ſhe hinted to her friends, that they ſhould not be diſcouraged at what had paſſed at York and Hampton-court, and that ſhe expected a powerful aid from a certain nameleſs quarter. Theſe letters, added to what was diſcovered at the ſame time, that the Pope was laboring to raiſe a rebellion in England, by means of Ridolfi, a Florentine merchant, and to Lidington's frequent conferences with the duke of Norfolk *, who was become deeply ſuſpected, obliged Elizabeth to order the Scotiſh Queen's removal to Tutbury caſtle (3).

The duke of Norfolk was ſo highly inſenſed againſt Murray, that he had reſolved to have him murdered in his return to Scotland: but Throckmorton having reconciled them, the duke deſiſted from his deſign. While all this was tranſacting in England, the French court meditated puting in execution their project of forcibly carrying off the Prince of Condé from his palace at Noyers; the peace granted the Hugonots being only to amuſe them. Happily for the Prince, he had notice of it time enough to eſcape to Rochelle. This ſcheme failing, the perſecution againſt the Hugonots was renewed with greater fury than ever. The King forbid them the exerciſe of their religion, and exiled all their preachers. Whereupon they ſollicited ſuccors from Elizabeth, who ſent them a hundred thouſand gold crowns, with a good train of artillery. She readily comprehended this to be a conſequence of the councils held at Bayona, and that if ſhe ſuffered the Hugonots to be oppreſſed, the flames would ſoon reach England. What confirmed her in this ſentiment was, that the duke of Alva took the very ſame courſe in the Netherlands, and manifeſtly evidenced that he intended utterly to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion in thoſe provinces, and render King Philip abſolute. The Prince of Orange had conducted thither from Germany a body of forces to attempt puting a ſtop to the execution of this deſign; but, for want of money to pay his troops, he was neceſſitated to retire among the Hugonots of France. This ill ſucceſs conſtraining multitudes of Flemiſh families to fly for refuge to England, the Queen permited them to ſettle in ſeveral good towns, where they greatly contributed towards advancing trade to a flouriſhing condition (5).

Theſe ſhips being attacked in their paſſage by French pyrates, did with great difficulty eſcape into Plymouth, Falmouth, and Southampton. Elizabeth, having thereof notice, injoined the magiſtrates of thoſe places to treat the Spaniards courteouſly, and aſſiſt them in caſe the pyrates made on them any attempt. So, to deprive the duke of Alva of this aſſiſtance, ſhe took the money by way of loan, and gave ſecurity for re-payment. Some time after, the duke of Alva demanding the money, Elizabeth replied, ſhe would punctually return it, as ſoon as it appeared, by good proofs, to be his Catholic Majeſty's. On this refuſal, Alva ſeized the Engliſh merchants effects, impriſoning the owners; and her Majeſty did the like by rhe Flemings. A few days after, ſhe iſſued a proclamation on this occaſion, which was in print replied to by the Spaniſh embaſſador. But this did not ſatisfy him; he diſperſed very inſolent libels, containing grating reflections on the Queen's reputation (1): for this he was put under a guard for about two days. AN' 1569. Plot againſt Cecil, and the occaſion Camden.

This miſunderſtanding between the Queen and Philip II was preſently ſucceeded by a diſturbance at court. Among all Elizabeth's miniſters and counſellors, there was not one ſo heartily attached to his Miſtreſs's intereſt as Cecil, ſecretary of ſtate. All the reſt had their private views, whereto they labored to adapt the Queen's and the nation's intereſts: but Cecil regarded only her Majeſty's, and was greatly in her favor. To him therefore ſhe chiefly imparted her moſt ſecret thoughts, with reſpect to the government of her realms. Diverſe privy counſellors were ingaged in the Scotiſh Queen's party; that is, they wiſhed the crown of England was ſecured to her, in caſe Elizabeth died iſſueleſs. They were of opinion, it was agreeable to equity, juſtice, and the national laws, and pretended it was the ſole means to prevent the troubles which might ariſe on the reigning Queen's deceaſe: but Elizabeth ſurmiſed that, while they conſidered the public advantages, they did not ſufficiently attend to her ſafety. Mary pretended not only to be Elizabeth's preſumptive heir: it was well known her pretenſions were far more extenſive, and that abundance deemed her title preferable to the Queen's. If therefore ſhe was actually nominated Elizabeth's ſucceſſor, it could be only in virtue of her birth-right, and not in conſequence of Henry VIII's will, where ſhe was not even named; whereas many believed Elizabeth derived her title ſolely from thence: ſo, in taking this courſe, the titles of both Queens would have been put in a competition greatly to Elizabeth's diſadvantage. Conſequently ſhe might juſtly fear that ſuch nomination would much augment Mary's partiſans, and in the end attempts would be made to ſet her on the throne before the limited time. All who were diſguſted with the adminiſtration thought the nation would gain by this change. The Papiſts moſt cordially wiſhed it, and even many among the Proteſtants, were indifferent which Queen was on the throne, as not being over and above ſcrupulous of conforming to whatever innovations might be made in religion, as had been the caſe more than once. It was therefore of the utmoſt importance to Elizabeth, to prevent Mary's being nominated her ſucceſſor; wherefore ſhe could not but have a ſingular regard for thoſe whom ſhe ſaw ſincerely attached to her particular intereſt. Among theſe Cecil was the chief, and it was he alſo whom Mary's friends conſidered as her moſt dangerous adverſary, and the more as he had frequently manifeſted his inclination to the houſe of Suffolk, before the ducheſs of that name died. This was the true motive of a plot laid, in the begining of 1569, to ruin that miniſter. The duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earls of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland Arundel, Pembroke, and others (2), entered into this ſort of conſpiracy. They accuſed Cecil of being the cauſe of Elizabeth's detaining the Spaniards money, and thereby of her manifeſtly hazarding a rupture with Spain, which could not but be extremely detrimental to the nation's commerce. They flattered themſelves that, on this charge, her Majeſty would cauſe the ſecretary to be apprehended, and then they made no queſtion they ſhould find ways enough to effect his ruin. But Elizabeth, being too clear-ſighted not to ſee into their aim and the motive of this combination, commanded them ſilence in a tone which at once deſtroyed all their hopes of ſucceſs, either then or for the future. We ſhall ſee preſently with what view they projected to deprive the Queen of this miniſter.

Doctor Story forcibly brought over from the Netherlands. Camden. Strype's Ann.

The ſudden quarrel between Elizabeth and his Catholic Majeſty, obliging the Engliſh merchants to ſend their effects to Hamburgh, the duke of Alva prohibited all commerce with England. Then he appointed certain ſpies in every maritime place, to give him information of all ſuch as acted contrary to the prohibition. Of this number was one Story an Engliſh Papiſt, who was wonderfully buſy in detecting the private trade ſtill carried on by ſeveral perſons with the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the prohibition: but his diligence coſt him dear (3). Some time after, being decoyed on board a ſhip which he was told had brought over Engliſh goods, and ſome heretical books, he was hurried away into England, where he languiſhed in priſon ſome years, and was finally executed.

A ſort of war between England and Spain. Camden.

The Engliſh merchants met with no better treatment in Spain than in the Netherlands. Philip ordered all their effects to be ſeized, by way of repriſals for the money ſtayed in England: nor was he therewith ſatisfied. To be more fully revenged on Elizabeth, he indeavored to gain the duke of Norfolk to ſtir up a rebellion in England, and the earl of Ormond to do the like in Ireland; but the ſaid nobles gave the Queen information of his practiſes. On the other hand, tho' there was no war proclaimed between England and Spain, the Engliſh, on pretenſe of the injury done their fellow-ſubjects, made repriſals upon all the trading veſſels they met with belonging to Spaniards. They did ſo much damage to Philip's ſubjects by theſe continual cruiſings, that Elizabeth, apprehenſive of being involved in a formal war, was obliged to reſtrain them by proclamation.

Elizabeth enters into alliance with the Czar. Camden.

The Engliſh trade thus ſuffering in Spain and the Netherlands, was like to be quite loſt in Ruſſia, thro' the avarice of certain Engliſh merchants there, who had angered the Czar: but the Queen ſpeedily ſent thither ſir Thomas Randolph, who ſo managed his Czarian Majeſty, that he obtained diverſe privileges for the Ruſſia company. Not long after, the Czar ſent Elizabeth a ſplendid embaſſy, to offer a perſonal alliance. Tho' it was no great honor to be allied with a Prince ſo notorious for his inhumanities, ſhe however thought proper for the benefit of her ſubjects, to make a treaty with him, mutually promiſing to afford each other refuge, in caſe either ſhould be dethroned.

Project of a marriage between the duke of Norfolk and Queen Mary. Camden. Lesley's Negociat. Buchanan.

While Elizabeth was treating with the Ruſſian embaſſador, conſpiracies were forming in England; and ſuch as might have proved fatal to her had they not been fruſtrated. Some of the Scotiſh Queen's principal partiſans, the ſame who would have deſtroyed Cecil, had projected matching her with the duke of Norfolk. Even the earl of Leiceſter was in the plot; but, in appearance, it was only to be let into the ſecret, and diſcover all to her Majeſty. It is ſcarcely queſtionable that thoſe who undertook this affair were ſet to work by the duke of Norfolk, tho' he let his friends proceed, without appearing in it himſelf. The occaſion or pretext of their project was this. People diſcourſed that Elizabeth having declared againſt matrimony, the Queen of Scotland might poſſibly marry a foreign Prince and a Papiſt, in which caſe the Proteſtant religion would be liable to great danger, ſince it was not impoſſible that the young King her ſon might die before her: it was therefore neceſſary to think betimes of matching Queen Mary with ſome Proteſtant, that ſhe might be reſtrained, in caſe ſhe ſhould make any attempt againſt religion, on her acceſſion to the Engliſh crown. It was farther urged, that no Engliſh peer was more deſerving of this honor than the duke of Norfolk, who had moſt ſincerely imbraced the reformation. But to curb the duke's ambition, in caſe he ſhould think of carrying it too far, it was reſolved he ſhould give his daughter in marriage to the King of Scotland, that he might be intereſted in the young Prince's preſervation. Such was the ſcheme, which ſeemed not greatly criminal, eſpecially as it was agreed it ſhould not be executed without the Queen's approbation: but, moſt apparently, the directors of this affair had farther views. In effect, if they intended only the nation's welfare and advantage, why ſhould they go about to conceal their deſigns from the Queen, 'till they had ſo well taken their meaſures that it ſhould be out of her power to prevent execution? but however, without ſtaying to examine, whether it was the earl of Murray who firſt inſpired the duke of Norfolk with thoughts of this marriage, as Camden, contrary to all appearance, has aſſerted (1), the Queen of Scots was informed of the project by the biſhop of Roſs, who was very diligent in all her concerns. At the ſame time, ſhe was promiſed being reſtored to the Scotiſh throne, and declared Elizabeth's preſumptive heir, on the inſuing conditions: viz.

P 419. Lesley's Negociat.

Terms of the marriage. Camden. P 420.

That, as to the ſucceſſion to the crown of England, ſhe ſhould attempt nothing to the prejudice of Queen Elizabeth and her iſſue.

That ſhe ſhould conſent to a league offenſive and defenſive between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.

That ſhe ſhould confirm the eſtabliſhment of the Proteſtant religion in Scotland.

That ſhe ſhould pardon ſuch of her ſubjects as had acted or appeared in arms againſt her.

That ſhe ſhould revoke the aſſignment of her right to the kingdom of England, which ſhe had made to the duke of Anjou, the King of France's brother.

That ſhe ſhould eſpouſe the duke of Norfolk.

Camden.

Mary wanted not much intreaty to make her accept the offer, with the annexed conditions. The league, indeed, ſhe ſomewhat ſcrupled, being willing, before ſhe acceded thereto, to conſult the French King. She denied having made any aſſignment to the duke of Anjou, and yet offered to procure his renunciation, if required for greater ſecurity. ELIZAB. AN' 1569.

It is eaſy to perceive the propoſers of theſe terms had been very careful to ſcreen themſelves from the law, ſince the whole ſeemed very equitable, and advantageous to both kingdoms: but they ſuppoſed Mary's reſtoration to the throne of Scotland, and her nomination to ſucceed to the crown of England. This was to be done firſt, and then the execution of what ſhe promiſed on her part was left to her honor. Herein conſiſted the artifice.

The project purſued. Camden.

Mary's conſent was no ſooner gained, than theſe projectors founded diverſe of the nobility and gentry, who, not perceiving the venom of this ſcheme, approved it, but with the proviſo, that nothing ſhould be done without the Queen's conſent. It was alſo communicated to the Kings of France and Spain, who greatly liked it, tho', moſt evidently, they would have had very little reaſon ſo to do had they believed the conditions would be punctually performed. The proceedings of thoſe who had framed ſuch a project, without conſulting the Queen, plainly manifeſt their deſign was to put the affair in ſuch a poſture that it ſhould not be in her power to obſtruct the execution when the propoſal ſhould be made her. The duke of Norfolk thought himſelf ſo ſecure of ſucceſs, that when the earl of Northumberland told him of Leonard Dacres's deſign of carrying off Queen Mary (2), he requeſted his lordſhip to prevent it, being apprehenſive ſhe would be conducted into Spain.

Elizabeth has notice of this combination. Camden.

This buſineſs paſſing thro' ſo many hands, and being ſcarcely any longer a ſecret, the duke of Norfolk juſtly feared her Majeſty would be offended at her not being appriſed of all this, and therefore, not to inſenſe her more, he deſired the earl of Leiceſter to acquaint her with the affair. Leiceſter promiſed to do it the firſt opportunity, and yet delayed it from day to day, ſo that all knew it except the Queen, who probably feigned ignorance. However, ſhe was willing to give the duke occaſion to diſcloſe his ſecret, by telling him one day, "to beware upon what pillow he laid his head;" but he pretended not to comprehend her meaning, chuſing rather that the earl of Leiceſter ſhould break the ice, as thinking him his real friend (3): but it is pretended that Leiceſter intermeddled in this buſineſs merely to ruin the ſaid duke, whom he conſidered as a dangerous rival in her Majeſty's favor. However this be, the court being at Tichfield, Leiceſter feigned himſelf greatly indiſpoſed, and the Queen going to ſee him, he expreſſed a fear and confuſion, which ſhe readily perceived and inquired the reaſon: when intreating her to pardon his having ſo long concealed a ſecret which he ought to have imparted to her, he diſcloſed every tittle of what had paſſed relating to the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the Scotiſh Queen. Elizabeth preſently after called the duke into a gallery, and, having reproached his imprudence and temerity for attempting ſuch a match, without vouchſafing to impart his deſign to her, commanded him to deſiſt from this project. The duke owned ſuch a propoſal had been made him, and he had conſented to it; but ſhewed himſelf ſo indifferent on the matter, that he told the Queen, his revenues came not far ſhort of thoſe of all Scotland, exhauſted by inteſtine broils, and that, when he was in his tennis-court at Norwich, he thought himself as good as ſome Kings. Laſtly, he promiſed her Majeſty not to think any more of the marriage. However, as he found ſhe no longer looked on him with the ſame eye as before; that the earl of Leiceſter was far from being his friend, and that the courtiers were ſhy and avoided him, he withdrew from court, without taking leave of the Queen, and went to London. The ſame day, the biſhop of Roſs (1) ſuing for the Scotiſh Queen's inlargement, Elizabeth very peeviſhly told him, "That his miſtreſs had nothing to do but to be "quiet, except ſhe had a mind to ſee ſhorter by "the head thoſe on whom ſhe moſt relied."

Camden.

This affair being become notoriouſly public, the Queen indeavored by all means to get information of ſuch particulars as might have eſcaped the earl of Leiceſter's knowledge. As ſhe knew the duke had frequent conferences with the earl of Murray, ſhe ſent ſir George Carey into Scotland, to requeſt his acquainting her with what he knew of the matter. Mean while the duke, being privately warned by a meſſage from the earl of Leiceſter that it was determined to ſend him to the Tower, retired into Norfolk: but repenting this haſty ſtep, which might render him ſuſpected, he returned to court, after writing to the Queen to beg her pardon, and to his friends, deſiring them to intercede with her Majeſty in his behalf. Some days after, the Queen received letters from Scotland (2), informing her of ſome paſſages ſhe knew not before, and which induced her to ſign a warrant for impriſoning him in the Tower. Then the biſhop of Roſs, who acted as Queen Mary's embaſſador, was examined, and Ridolfi the Florentine was commited to ſir Francis Walſingham's cuſtody. Lord Lumley was arreſted, the earl of Pembroke was confined to his own houſe, and all the reſt who were concerned in this project of the duke of Norfolk's marriage, were baniſhed the court, Leiceſter only excepted. The earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland made their ſubmiſſion to the earl of Suſſex, lord preſident of the northern marches. All theſe nobles labored to excuſe themſelves, by declaring, they had approved the project of the duke's marriage, on the expreſs condition of its not being put in execution without her Majeſty's concurrence.

Conſpiracy and rebellion in the north. Camden. Stow. Hollingſh. Strype's Ann.

Elizabeth thought not proper to publiſh all ſhe knew of this affair, wherein the prime nobility of the realm were concerned: beſide, ſhe had ſome time ſince received intelligence of a conſpiracy ready to break out, and conſequently exceſs of ſeverity, at ſuch a juncture, might be very dangerous. The earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, both very powerful in the north, had held diverſe conferences, whereof Elizabeth had notice, and which occaſioned her ſummoning them to court. They made ſome dilatory excuſes; but the Queen ſent them a more expreſs order, to put them under a neceſſity of relinquiſhing their enterpriſe, or ingaging in open rebellion, before they had taken proper meaſures. This ſecond order produced the effect ſhe expected. The two earls, conſcious of their guilt, and not daring to truſt themſelves in the Queen's hands, took arms, and aſſembled forces.

The deſign of theſe revolters was to free the Scotiſh Queen, tho' they mentioned her not in their manifeſto. They ſaid only, their intent was, "To "reſtore the religion of their forefathers; remove "evil counſellors from the Queen, and cauſe juſtice "to be done to the duke of Norfolk, and the "other lords now in priſon, or under diſgrace." At the ſame time, they wrote circular letters to the Catholics, inviting them to come in and join them. But moſt ſent the letters they received to the Queen; whether they were not diſpoſed to interrupt the public tranquillity, or were diſcouraged by the duke of Norfolk's impriſonment. Mean while the rebels, marching to Durham, did there burn all the Engliſh Bibles and Common-prayer-books, and celebrated the Romiſh maſs openly. Thence they repaired to Clifford-Moor, where they muſtered and found their army amounted to four thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe. Their main intent was to ſet at liberty the Queen of Scots, in order to place her at their head: but, on the firſt news of this inſurrection, ſhe was conveyed to Coventry (3), a ſtrong city in the very heart of England, not to be reduced without a formal ſiege, for which the rebels were not any way provided: beſide, in their march thither, they would have paſſed into a county whoſe inhabitants were not their friends.

Mean time, forces were levying for the Queen in ſeveral parts. The earl of Suſſex was now ſeven thouſand ſtrong; lord Clinton was at the head of twelve thouſand, and the earl of Cumberland, with lord Scroop, were near Carliſle with a ſtout body of troops, beſide the gariſon which they had thrown into that city. So, the rebels finding their number not increaſe, thought proper to retire to the northern borders, where they took Bernard caſtle; but, ſoon after, apprehenſive of being ſurrounded, they diſperſed. The earl of Northumberland fled into Scotland (4). The earl of Weſtmoreland eſcaped into the Netherlands, where he paſſed the reſidue of his days, ſubſiſting on a very ſmall penſion allowed him by the King of Spain. The rebels being thus diſperſed, ſome were hanged for example (5). Forty others, who had eſcaped beyond ſea, were out-lawed, and their ſentence confirmed by the inſuing parliament. Of this number were, Charles Nevil earl of Weſtmoreland, Thomas Percy earl of Northumberland, with his counteſs, and Egremond Ratcliff, brother to the earl of Suſſex (6): all the reſt, who fled not from England, her Majeſty pardoned. Some time before this rebellion, the duke of Alva ſent to the Queen Ciapine Vitelli, a famous captain, to demand the money which had been ſtayed: but his commiſſion was ſo limited, that he was forced to write to the duke of Alva for ampler powers. The real deſign of this embaſſy was to have in England a leader of experience to head the male-contents, and ſuch forces as the duke of Alva was to ſend over. La Mothe, governor of Dunkirk, diſguiſed like a common mariner, had already ſounded the ports, as he afterwards confeſſed: but Elizabeth broke all theſe meaſures, by conſtraining the two leading rebels to appear in arms ſooner than they deſigned.

whereof Leonard Dacres, a gentleman of the north (1) was chief. He had ſome buſineſs at court, which he was ſolliciting when the former inſurrection ſhewed itſelf. On the news, he went and offered his ſervice to her Majeſty, who accepted it, as being ſenſible of his great intereſt in the northern counties. Having received from the Queen a commiſſion to raiſe forces, he wrote to the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, that the troops he ſhould raiſe, by virtue of his commiſſion, ſhould be at their lordſhips diſpoſal: he even put them in hopes of foreign ſuccors, as he had been aſſured by certain embaſſadors at London. His main deſign was to carry off the Scotiſh Queen; but he was diſappointed, by her being ſent to Coventry: ſo, finding himſelf at the head of three thouſand men, after taking ſome caſtles (2), he reſolved to expect lord Hunſdon, who was marching towards him with the gariſon of Berwick (3). The duke of Norfolk remains in priſon.

It is uncertain, whether the duke of Norfolk had any hand in the late rebellion in England. Several circumſtances made againſt him. Firſt, as moſt inſurrections neceſſarily require ſome preparatives, it might be thought the rebels were geting ready, at the very time the duke of Norfolk and his friends were diſpoſing matters to obtain Elizabeth's approbation of the projected marriage. In this expectation, he had hindered Dacres from attempting to free the Queen of Scots, as he had intended. Secondly, all the rebels motions tended to Mary's releaſe, and moſt of her friends were diſcouraged when they underſtood the duke of Norfolk's being in the Tower. Laſtly, the rebels themſelves, in their manifeſto, alledged their taking arms was in order to procure his releaſe. But on the other hand, it is certain this noble peer was never called to any account, and the Queen was contented with keeping him in priſon 'till September, in the year following. Hence it may be ſeemingly infered that there was no proof againſt him: but poſſibly her Majeſty thought it not adviſeable to let the people know the prime nobility of the realm were concerned in this conſpiracy.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. Part II. p. 196. Spotſwood. Thuanus.

Towards the cloſe of laſt year, I left the earl of Murray in England, where he had played many and very oppoſite parts. On his arrival in Scotland, he aſſembled all the lords of the King's party at Sterling, to communicate what he had done in England; and his conduct was approved.

The duke of Chateleraut arrived at London from France, a little before the earl of Murray's departure. He forthwith demanded Queen Elizabeth's aid and protection to obtain the regency of Scotland, as being the young King's neareſt relative. But Queen Elizabeth was too well acquainted with her own intereſt to fall into ſuch a ſnare, and to favor a perſon whoſe conduct had ever been very ambiguous, and who, in all appearance, had not, at the Gallic court, imbibed favorable notions of the King's party. The duke, not being able to obtain what he ſollicited, ſuffered Murray to depart, and went not to Scotland 'till ſome time after him. He brought a patent from Queen Mary, wherein it appeared that, by a new and unheard-of right, ſhe had adopted him for her father, and as ſuch commited to him the regency of the kingdom. The earl of Murray, hearing the duke aſſumed the title of regent in virtue of this patent, immediately aſſembled troops to force his ſubmiſſion to the government, reſolving no other authority but the King's ſhould be acknowledged in Scotland. Since Mary's defeat and flight, her party was ſo infeebled that Chateleraut was unable to reſiſt. All his dependance was on the good ſucceſs of the project, which was then forming in favor of the duke of Norfolk, after which he queſtioned not geting advantage of the earl of Murray: but, as it was not in his power to haſten the execution of the project in England, he was forced to confine himſelf to the indeavoring to gain time, by propoſing to accommodate matters; plainly perceiving that the way of arms could not be ſucceſsful in his preſent circumſtances. He therefore ſet his friends to diſcourſe the regent; and it was agreed that he ſhould repair to Glaſgow, acknowledge the King's authority, and renounce Mary's; for which ſome advantages he had required were granted him. Notwithſtanding this agreement, he, in order to attain his ends, raiſed freſh difficulties: but the regent, not ſatisfied with his evaſions, began to march with his army to attack him. Then the duke, having no other refuge, was obliged, together with lord Herris, to wait on the regent. A few days after, the regent having aſſembled at Glaſgow the grandees of the King's party, it was reſolved that a proclamation ſhould be publiſhed, offering to all who had hitherto refuſed acknowledging his Majeſty's authority, to receive their ſubmiſſions, and reſtore them to the injoyment of their eſtates. But the earls of Argyle and Huntley would not accept thoſe conditions, being highly diſguſted at the duke of Chateleraut's puting himſelf into Murray's power. At the ſame time, Queen Mary wrote letter after letter to her friends, exhorting them to ſtand firm, and giving them hopes of a ſpeedy and happy revolution in her affairs. She was then in expectation of the ſucceſs of the projects concerning her marriage with the duke of Norfolk.

Elizab. An' 1569.

The regent's proclamation not meeting with the expected ſucceſs, and no one appearing to accept the proffered favors, he departed for Edinburg, carrying with him the duke of Chateleraut and lord Herris. He had delayed thus long to preſs them to make their ſubmiſſion to the King, becauſe he was deſirous it might be a general affair. But finding at laſt that the Queen's friends were in no haſte to make their ſubmiſſion, he reſolved to incite them by the duke of Chateleraut's example, who was chief of their party, and ſummoned him to perform the agreement made at Glaſgow. The duke, ſeeing himſelf preſſed, fought excuſes, ſaying he did not mean to treat for himſelf alone, but for the Queen's whole party, and therefore could do nothing without the concurrence of the other peers, and her Majeſty's approbation. Whereupon, the regent aſking him, what he intended to do if the Queen approved not the agreement of Glaſgow?

He replied, that he believed himſelf not bound to any thing. The circumſtances of the duke of Norfolk's plot, the ſucceſs whereof he expected every moment, made him think it not very dangerous to talk thus. However, the regent finding himſelf thus amuſed, commited both him and lord Herris priſoners to the caſtle.

The duke of Chateleraut ſent to priſon. Buchanan. Spotſwood,

This is the account Buchanan gives us of Chateleraut's impriſonment; which account the circumſtances of affairs renders very probable. But Camden and his copiers have been pleaſed to ſay only, the regent having ſummoned at Edinburg the lords of both parties, to labor ſome agreement, the duke of Chateleraut and lord Herris firſt repaired thither, and were ordered to priſon. In this manner has Camden maimed and disfigured the hiſtory of Scotland, to give ſome color to his invectives againſt the earl of Murray. I am about producing another inſtance of either his prepoſſeſſion, or inſincerity. I have reſerved it 'till now, tho' it be not its proper place, becauſe it would have been impoſſible to convince the reader of my aſſertion, were he not firſt informed of what has been advanced concerning the Scotiſh Queen's affairs. This ſort of digreſſion will, I hope, find a pardon.

Camden. p. 418. Leſley's Negociat.

Camden, immediately after a very ſuccinct account of King Henry Darnly's aſſaſſination, in 1567, and having inſinuated that the earl of Murray was the real author thereof, ſays, that the ſame Murray earneſtly preſſed Queen Mary to eſpouſe the earl of Bothwell, to which ſhe conſented at laſt, after much difficulty. He then proceeds thus:

Camden. p. 404.

" I ſhall willingly inſert here what George earl " of Huntley and the earl of Argyle, who were " the principal lords of Scotland, proteſted ſoon " after, as I have taken it from an original, ſigned " with their own hands, which they ſent to Queen " Elizabeth, viz.

Anderſon's Collect. Vol. IV. Part II p. 188.

" Foraſmuch as the earl of Murray and others, " to color their rebellion againſt the Queen, whoſe " authority they uſurp, do openly ſlander her, as " guilty of the murder of her huſband; we do " publicly proteſt and witneſs theſe things following. " In the month of December 1566, when the " Queen was at Craigmillar, Murray and Liding- " ton acknowledged before us, that Morton, Lind- " ſay and Ruthven ſlew David Rizzo, with no " other intent than to ſave Murray, who was at " that very time to be proſcribed. Therefore, " that they might not appear ungrateful, they " greatly deſired, that Morton and the reſt who " were baniſhed for Rizzo's murder, might be " recalled. But this they ſaid could not be done, " unleſs the Queen were divorced from her huſband, " which they promiſed to accompliſh, would we " but give our conſent. Afterwards Murray pro- " miſed to me (Huntley) that my ancient inheri- " tance ſhould be reſtored to me, and I ſhould be " an everlaſting favorite with the exiles, if I would " but countenance the divorce. Then we applied " to Bothwell for his conſent alſo. And laſtly, we " came to the Queen, and Lidington, in the name " of us all, earneſtly intreated her to reverſe the " baniſhment of Morton, Lindſay, and Ruthven. " The King's faults and offenſes againſt the Queen " and the realm, he agravated with very great " bitterneſs; and ſhewed how much it concerned " the Queen and ſtate, that the divorce ſhould be " made out of hand, it being impoſſible for the " King and Queen to live together in Scotland with " ſafety. She anſwered, ſhe had rather withdraw " for a time into France, 'till her huſband ſhould " be ſenſible of the errors of his youth, being un- " willing any thing ſhould be done to her ſon's " prejudice, or her own diſhonor. To this Liding- " ton replied, we who are of your council will " look to that. But I command you, ſays ſhe, " to do nothing that may blemiſh my honor, or " offend my conſcience. Let the thing remain as " it is, 'till God pleaſes to provide a remedy from " above: that which you imagine will be for my " good, may, I fear, turn to my hurt. To which " Lidington ſaid: Pleaſe to leave matters to us, " and you ſhall find nothing will be done but " what is juſt, and what the parliament will ap- " prove. A few days after, the King happening " to be murdered in a moſt execrable manner, we " do, from the inward teſtimonies of our con- " ſciences, hold in for certain, that Murray and " Lidington were the authors, contrivers and " abettors of this regicide, whoever were the " actors."

ELIZAB. AN' 1569.

This proteſtation, as may be eaſily obſerved, ſquares exactly with Camden's deſign in his annals of Queen Elizabeth, namely, to clear Mary from the crime of murdering the King her huſband, and to accuſe the earl of Murray. But withal, it is directly contrary to the teſtimony of Melvil, an eye-witneſs, who in his memoirs ſays not a ſingle word which can give occaſion to ſuſpect the earl of Murray was thought guilty of the murder. If this proteſtation therefore be true, Melvil's memoirs muſt be only a heap of fables, which no man of ſenſe will ever believe. But to ſhew that this writing is counterfeit, it will be proper to examine it particularly, and make ſome remarks which will diſcover the forgery.

Camden begins with ſaying: " I ſhall willingly " inſert here what George earl of Huntley, and " the earl of Murray, who were the principal lords " of Scotland, proteſted ſoon after.

This ſoon after, muſt have been two whole years at leaſt, as I ſhall ſoon demonſtrate.

" As I have taken it from an original, ſigned " with their own hands.

Camden has not affixed their ſaid lordſhips hands to the writing, probably, becauſe he knew not in what order they were to be ranged. However, in a certificate, one would think the ſignature is a point very material.

" Which they ſent to Queen Elizabeth.

Admiting this proteſtation to have been real, it could not be ſent to Queen Elizabeth 'till the latter end of 1568 at the very ſooneſt, when the earl of Murray went to York to accuſe Queen Mary before the Engliſh commiſſioners. This remark diſcovers the artifice of Camden, who, deſignedly neglecting to date the writing, places it in his annals the begining of 1567, immediately after the King's death, as if at this very juncture Murray had been accuſed of that Prince's murder; whereas it was not 'till after Queen Mary's retreat into England that ſhe thought of caſting the crime on him. It was not therefore thro' pure negligence that Camden dated not the proteſtation.

" Foraſmuch as the earl of Murray and others, " to color their rebellion againſt the Queen, whoſe " authority they uſurp, do openly ſlander her as " guilty of the murder of her huſband.

The earl of Murray cannot be ſaid to have uſurped the Queen's authority, 'till after he was declared regent, or the Queen to have accuſed him publicly of killing the King; 'till the York conference, or rather 'till that of Hampton court, that is, in October or November 1568. Now, at that time the two factions were actually formed. Murray was head of the one, and Huntley of the other. So, ſuppoſing this writing not to be forged, what opinion can a reader have of the atteſtation of one avowed enemy againſt another? As to the earl of Argyle, Buchanan affirms, he was retired a little before to his own houſe; ſo that it is not probable he ſhould join with the earl of Huntley to frame this certificate at the time it muſt be ſuppoſed to have been been drawn. Were it dated, we might ſpeak of it with more certainty.

" We do openly proteſt and witneſs theſe things " following. In the month of December 1566.

This way of begining argues it was now ſome time ſince the matters they are about to mention were tranſacted.

" When the Queen was at Craigmillar, Murray " and Lidington acknowledged before us, that " Morton, Lindſay and Ruthven ſlew David Rizzo, " with no other intent than to ſave Murray, who " was at that very time to be proſcribed.

I have already made appear by Melvil's teſtimony, that the earl of Murray, far from owning that Rizzo was killed on his account, would not join with the party of the murderers, but remained conſtantly attached to the Queen. Beſide, the earl of Argyle, author of this proteſtation, was then a fugitive as well as Murray, and was no leſs to be condemned than he, and yet he ſpeaks here of this affair as if he were a ſtranger to it, tho' he was the moſt conſiderable of thoſe who were to be baniſhed, and tho' Melvil affirms, it was for his and the others ſakes who had taken arms againſt the Queen, Murray excepted, that Rizzo was murdered.

" Therefore that they might not appear un- " grateful, they greatly deſired, that Morton, and " the reſt who were baniſhed for Rizzo's murder, " might be recalled.

What has Lidington to do here, when he was never concerned in Rizzo's affair? and wherein conſiſted his ingratitude, if the exiles were not recalled?

" But this, they ſaid, could not be done unleſs " the Queen were divorced from her huſband.

Rizzo was killed by the King's order, and in his preſenſe, and ſolely, according to the author of this proteſtation, to ſave the earl of Murray. The point was to get recalled the murderers, who had been baniſhed for this murder commited by the King's order, and theſe exiles cannot be recalled by the Queen, the only perſon offended, except ſhe is divorced from the King. Let this conſequence be well examined, and it will never be thought, that the earls of Huntley and Argyle were ſo weak as to reaſon in ſo wretched a manner. In December * 1566, that is, about the time of the Prince's baptiſm, the King was looked on as a cypher, and expoſed to all ſorts of inſults from the Queen.

" Which they promiſed to accompliſh, would " we but give our conſent.

All that time the earl of Murray had no credit at court. It was Bothwell who ruled all. I know not how it ſtood then with Lidington. However, Murray and Lidington are repreſented here as the perſons who were to be the chief agents in accompliſhing the Queen's divorce, and as wanting for that purpoſe only the bare conſent of the earls of Huntley and Argyle. This carries not with it the leaſt probability.

" Afterwards Murray promiſed to me (Huntley) " that my ancient inheritance ſhould be reſtored to " me, and I ſhould be an everlaſting favorite with " the exiles, if I would but countenance the " divorce.

The author of the proteſtation has confounded the times. Murray, having then no power, could not make any ſuch promiſe to the earl of Huntley: none but Bothwell was able to make and perform it. Beſide, it is not likely the Queen, when ſhe recalled the earl of Huntley, who was under ſentence of death, ſhould ſtill detain his ancient inheritance which had been confiſcated.

" Then we applied to Bothwell for his conſent " alſo.

This confounds the whole hiſtory of Scotland. Murray and Lidington are made authors of the project of Queen Mary's divorce, and the earl of Bothwell, as one who is only to give conſent, tho' it is certain he had then abſolute ſway over the Queen, who married him very ſoon after.

" And laſtly, we came to the Queen, and Li- " dington, in the name of us all, earneſtly intreated " her to reverſe the baniſhment of Morton, Lindſay " and Ruthven. The King's faults and offenſes " againſt the Queen and the realm, he agravated " with very great bitterneſs; and ſhewed how " much it concerned the Queen and ſtate, that the " divorce ſhould be made out of hand, it being " impoſſible for the King and Queen to live toge- " ther in Scotland with ſafety.

Can it be conceived that, to induce the Queen to pardon men who had killed her favorite in her preſenſe, and by the King her huſband's expreſs order, there ſhould be occaſion to agravate the King's faults, and demonſtrate to the Queen, that ſhe muſt be divorced from him?

" She anſwered, ſhe had rather withdraw for a " time into France, 'till her huſband ſhould be " ſenſible of the errors of his youth, being un- " willing any thing ſhould be done to her ſon's " prejudice, or her own diſhonor.

The author of this proteſtation repreſents the Queen in December 1566, as being under oppreſſion, and ſpeaking of retiring into France 'till the King ſhould be pleaſed to amend his errors. This ſuffices to manifeſt the whole to be a forgery; for it is not likely, the earls of Huntley and Argyle ſhould argue in this manner.

" To this Lidington replied, We who are of " your council will look to that. But I command " you, ſays ſhe, to do nothing that may blemiſh " my honor, or offend my conſcience. Let the " thing remain as it is, 'till God pleaſes to provide " a remedy from above: that which you imagine " will be for my good, may, I fear, turn to my " hurt.

The artifice of theſe words, which are put into Mary's mouth, conſiſts in this: the Queen having commanded all theſe nobles to do nothing with reſpect to her divorce, Murray and Lidington found no other way to get the exiles recalled, but by having the King aſſaſſinated. As if the King alone was an invincible obſtacle to the recalling the baniſhed lords, who killed Rizzo by his orders, and in his preſenſe. I confeſs the reaſoning appears to me incomprehenſible.

" A few days after, the King happening to be " murdered in a moſt execrable manner.

What has been juſt related paſſed in December 1566, according to the proteſtation, and the King was killed in February 1567, that is, two months after. Now can it be ſuppoſed, that the earls of Huntley and Argyle could poſſibly miſtake ſo groſly, as to call two months a few days?

" We do, from the inward teſtimonies of our " conſciences, hold it for certain, that Murray and " Lidington were the authors, contrivers, and " abettors of this regicide.

The inference the author of this paper would draw, that the earls of Murray and Lidington were the contrivers of the King's murder, from their having projected the Queen's divorce, appearing doubtleſs to him liable to ſtrong objections, he ſeems partly to give it up, when he grounds it wholly on the inward teſtimony of Huntley's and Argyle's conſciences.

" Whoever were the actors."

It was notorious that Bothwell was the contriver of the King's murder, and Camden himſelf makes no ſcruple to own it, joining however with him the earl of Murray. But the author of the proteſtation durſt not name him, becauſe it was giving a ſenſible wound to the honor of her Majeſty,

* Not September, as our author conſtantly miſtakes it. Prince James was Chriſtened December 15, 1566.

Majeſty, who, within a few months, married the murderer.

I ſhall only add one remark, which to me ſeems deciſive to demonſtrate the forgery of this paper. Lidington was never accuſed, but in this writing only, of being concerned in King Henry's murder (1). On the other hand, ſo far was he from being conſidered as the Queen's enemy, that he was rather vehemently ſuſpected by the young King's and the earl of Murray's party, and not without reaſon. What Melvil ſays of him, and of the occaſion of the York and Hampton-court conferences, is a clear evidence that he continued ſiding with the regent only to have opportunities to ſerve Mary. Buchanan confirms Melvil's teſtimony, in a book intitled, The Camelion, wherein he pretends to ſhew, that Lidington betrayed the young King's party; and in his hiſtory he drops many the like expreſſions againſt him. Now, how can it be imagined that the earls of Huntley and Argyle, heads of Mary's faction, ſhould be ignorant that Lidington was privately laboring for them? If they knew it, can there be any likelihood that, at the very time when Lidington was at York or Hampton-court, and frequently confering with the duke of Norfolk to prevent Murray's accuſing the Queen, theſe two chiefs of the party ſhould publicly accuſe their ſecret friend of being author of the King's murder, eſpecially as there was not the leaſt ground for ſuch a charge? But, very poſſibly, the author of this proteſtation was ignorant of Lidington's ſecret practiſes; and ſeeing him among thoſe who attended the regent at York, imagined he might ſafely unite them in one accuſation.

But howſoever it was, tho' this proteſtation be as true as it appears to be counterfeit, it cannot ſerve for proof to ſupport what Camden advances concerning the earl of Murray, becauſe it will be ſtill true, that it came from one of his moſt inveterate enemies. I return to what paſſed in Scotland during the year 1569.

The regent has advice of Norfolk's deſigns. Melvil, p. 100. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

Not long after the duke of Chateleraut's arreſt, the regent convened the chief nobility at Perth, to communicate to them certain letters he had received, whereon it was neceſſary they ſhould conſult. The firſt was from a friend in England (2), to give him notice of the project in favor of the duke of Norfolk to eſpouſe the Scotiſh Queen, telling him withal, the conſpiracy was in ſuch a ſtate, that all the forces of Great-Britain were not ſufficient to prevent its ſucceſs; and adviſing him therefore to think in time of his own affairs.

Mary deſires her marriage with Bothwell may be nulled. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

The ſecond letter was from Queen Mary, and directed to the ſtates of Scotland. It was to deſire, that the validity of her marriage with the earl of Bothwell might be examined; adding, if any eſſential defect appeared therein, ſhe would very willingly conſent it ſhould be diſſolved. As Bothwell was ſtill living in Denmark, it was requiſite his marriage with the Queen ſhould be annulled, before ſhe could eſpouſe the duke of Norfolk. For this reaſon ſhe wanted the ſtates of Scotland to get it diſſolved, pretending only to give her conſent to it, tho' without it ſhe could not proceed.

Queen Elizabeth's demands to the ſtates of Scotland for Mary. Buchanan. Camden. Spotſwood.

The third letter was from Queen Elizabeth, to the ſame ſtates, to demand, in Mary's favor, one of theſe three particulars. The firſt, "That ſhe "ſhould be reſtored to the throne as formerly." The ſecond, "That ſhe ſhould reign jointly with "the King her ſon." The third, "That ſhe "might live in Scotland, with ſuch honors as ſhould "not be prejudicial to the King's authority." Camden, who agrees in this with Buchanan, will have it, that theſe demands of Elizabeth are to be conſidered as the effect of her compaſſion for the Queen of Scots. But where was the compaſſion, to propoſe to the ſtates three things ſo diſproportionate, and to leave the choice to them? She knew, the two firſt would be rejected; and tho' the third ſhould be accepted, many difficulties would occur before it could be ſettled. Thus, what Camden conſiders as the effect of Elizabeth's pity, was in reality only a conſequence of the project ſhe had formed, to prolong the affair, under the ſpecious color of favoring her priſoner.

The Scotiſh peers, aſſembled at Perth, concluded that Queen Mary's letter ought not to be anſwered, becauſe ſhe addreſſed to the ſtates as if ſhe was ſtill their Sovereign, which they would not allow. She did what ſhe could to remove this difficulty; but all her indeavors ſerved only to confirm them the more in their reſolution. They were far from being willing to facilitate Mary's marriage with the duke of Norfolk, by gering Bothwell's diſſolved. Mary, who knew not of their being ſo well acquainted with her ſecrets, highly complained of their ſcrupling to annul a marriage which had ſerved them for a pretext to take arms againſt her: but very little regard was had to her complaints.

The Scotiſh peers anſwer to Elizabeth. Buchanan. Thuanus.

As to Elizabeth's demands, their lordſhips reſolved to reject the two firſt, and accept the third, if Mary would therewith be ſatisfied, and ſent their anſwer to the court of England by a certain young gentleman. But Elizabeth, who only ſought to gain time, wrote to them, that ſhe deſired a perſon of more conſideration might be ſent to confer with her concerning a matter of ſuch weight. This occaſioned their deputing Robert Pitcairn.

The regent has Lidington arreſted; Melvil, p. 100. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

While Pitcairn was on his way, the regent, finding Mary's faction daily grew ſtronger, thro' the hopes wherewith Norfolk's project inſpired the whole party, judged it requiſite to make ſure of Lidington's perſon. This miniſter, by feigning himſelf attached to the King's party, ſerved Mary to the utmoſt of his power, and, as he was a man of good ſenſe and capacity, did the regent abundantly more prejudice, by outwardly ſiding with him, than if he had openly declared for the Queen. So, the regent having on ſome pretenſe decoyed him to Sterling, ordered him to be apprehended, and ſent priſoner to Edinburg: but Kircaldie coming unexpectedly with part of the caſtle gariſon, reſcued him, promiſing to ſee him forth-coming when required. This glaring action rendered Kircaldie ſtrongly ſuſpected by the King's whole party (3).

who is reſcued by Kircaldie. Melvil. Buchanan.

Mean while, the duke of Norfolk being ſecured in the Tower, without having compaſſed any of his deſigns, all Mary's projects, as well in Scotland as England, evaporated in ſmoke. Shortly after, the earls of Huntley and Argyle were reconciled to the regent, and ſubmited to the King's authority; whereby the Queen's faction was, for a while, in ſome meaſure quite extinct. This ſhews how far Mary and her adherents grounded their hopes on the duke of Norfolk. I ſhall cloſe this year with a brief recital of what paſſed in France and the Netherlands.

The duke of Alva ſtill continued his oppreſſions in the Netherlands. He had ſet up the Inquiſition, and ordered the council of Trent to be received, as well as the new biſhops, whoſe juriſdiction had been hitherto rejected. The bloody council ſtill acted with fury. All privileges and immunities of the cities, univerſities and provinces, were left to his Catholic Majeſty's diſcretion. In a word, the duke of Alva ordered the hundredth part of all revenues to be paid the King, after that, the twentieth part of the real, and the tenth of the perſonal eſtates, every time they were ſold. Some magiſtrates of towns, having preſumed ſo far as to appeal to King Philip from theſe ordinances, were ſeverely puniſhed. An' 1570. The earl of Northumberland ſeized in Scotland. Buchanan. Camden. Leſley.

Very early in the inſuing year, 1570, the earl of Murray, having notice that the earl of Northumberland was concealed in Scotland, found means to have him ſeized, and then impriſoned him at Loch-levin. Camden ſays, he offered to deliver to Elizabeth the ſaid earl in exchange for Queen Mary; but this carries not with it the leaſt probability. That Queen was better guarded in England than ſhe could be in Scotland; and Murray was no ſtranger to Elizabeth's reaſons never to releaſe her.

A few days after, Murray was ſhot thro' the body by one of the family of Hamilton, who pretended it to be only in revenge of a private injury: but it ſoon appeared to be by direction of Mary's party (2). On the morrow, thoſe of the families of Scot and Carr, the Queen's moſt zealous friends, entered England in arms, and deſtroyed the borders with fire and ſword. As they had no particular ground for this incurſion, it is eaſy to perceive, they were excited by the heads of Mary's faction, who were willing to attempt giving a new turn to affairs. Their ſcheme was this:

Motives of this invaſion. Buchanan. Thuanus.

The Scotiſh Queen's party was ruined, and without any likelihood of being ever able to raiſe its head, as the earl of Murray could be always certain of ſuccors from England in caſe of neceſſity: wherefore the chiefs of that faction (3), whoſe ſubmiſſion to the King was involuntary, formed new projects. They conſidered the ſtrict union between England and Scotland, as a ſtrong ſenſe againſt all their attempts in Mary's favor, and therefore reſolved to break it at any rate. To ſucceed, they judged it abſolutely neceſſary firſt of all to diſpatch the earl of Murray, that the kingdom might for ſome time be in a ſort of anarchy, as in effect it happened. That done, they hoped, by provoking the Engliſh on their borders, they ſhould excite them to take vengeance on the Scots without diſtinction; that this would revive the old enmity between the two nations, and ſo all Scotland would be united againſt England; that then ſuccors might be ſafely ſent for from France and Spain, and the project be reſumed of invading the Engliſh borders, while the Catholics ſhould on their part act within the kingdom. Lord Seaton's embaſſy to the duke of Alva, and the Pope's bull, of which mention ſhall preſently be made, plainly evidence this to have been their intent, tho' Camden is pleaſed to conſider this invaſion as a mere caprice of the Scots and Carrs.

Lidington, being ſet at liberty, labors for the Queen. Buchanan.

Immediately on Murray's aſſaſſination, Kircaldie releaſed Lidington, who uſed all his art to hinder the King's party from approaching to the election of a new regent. He intimated, that Scotland would never injoy quiet, except choice was made of a regent who ſhould be approved by the two parties, and conſequently it was neceſſary to aſſemble the chiefs of both ſides, that they might bring matters to the requiſite concluſion. What he urged had indeed the appearance of good: but he knew, it would be difficult to aſſemble all the grandees in one place, and even tho' they ſhould actually meet all together, they would never agree on the choice. However this ſerved to gain time, in hopes that Queen Elizabeth, by reſolving to revenge the injury ſhe had received, would drive to deſpair all the Scots, and unite againſt her the whole Scotiſh nation. He ſucceeded in the firſt part of his deſign, and by his intrigues ſo managed, that the election of a regent was poſtponed. But he was not ſo happy in the other part of his project. Elizabeth and her council were too wiſe to fall into the ſnare. On the contrary, the more they found that indeavors were uſed to unite all the Scots in one party, the more they judged it neceſſary to keep them divided, nothing being ſo advantageous to Elizabeth as to foment confuſion and diſcord in that kingdom, 'till ſhe could take other meaſures.

Elizabeth avoids the ſnare laid for her.

She complains of the violators of the peace, but not of the whole nation. Buchanan. Melvil. p. 105. Spotſwood. Camden.

To that purpoſe, ſhe ſent Randolph into Scotland, to complain of the inroad made into England: but inſtead of charging the whole nation, as was expected by the authors of this invaſion, ſhe ſaid withal by her embaſſador, ſhe was very ſenſible thoſe who governed Scotland were not concerned in this inſult on the Engliſh, and therefore ſhe was willing to diſtinguiſh the innocent from the guilty: that ſhe however demanded a ſuitable reparation, and if they who were at the helm could not procure it for her, ſhe offered them the aſſiſtance of her forces: that, in caſe they refuſed it, ſhe would ſend an army into Scotland, not to attack the Scots in general, but to puniſh ſuch only as wantonly, and without provocation, had inſulted the Engliſh. As it was then a time of anarchy, there being no re-

The regent, it ſeems, was told of it, and yet would not be at the pains to ſearch the houſe. gent yet, anſwering the embaſſador was put off 'till May, when the ſtates would be aſſembled. Randolph inſiſted not on a ſpeedy anſwer, but contented himſelf with exhorting the Scots to peace and concord, while he privately labored to foment their diviſions, and hinder their union. This is what Melvil clearly ſhews in his memoirs. Mean while, Elizabeth prepared an army, which ſhe intended to ſend into Scotland, as well to revenge her ſubjects, as to ſupport the King's party, and procure the election of a regent, who ſhould not act contrary to the intereſt of England.

Melvil, p. 105.

Notwithſtanding the chiefs of Mary's faction ſaw Elizabeth would not fall into their net, they indeavored however to inſenſe her againſt the whole nation, by libels and ſcandalous calumnies which they took care to publiſh. But all their artifices were not capable of making her alter her courſe. Mean while, her army, which was to be commanded by the earl of Suſſex, was preparing with all poſſible diligence.

Libels publiſhed in Scotland againſt Elizabeth, who avoids the ſnare. Buchanan.

During this interim, Mary's adherents, having reſumed courage ſince the earl of Murray's death, held frequent councils upon the ſituation of their affairs. Their aim was to gain time, in expectation of the ſuccors, of which Verac the French envoy (1), gave them hopes. They alſo expected ſupplies from the Netherlands; and as the aids could not be ready ſo ſoon as they wiſhed, they indeavored to amuſe the King's party by propoſals of agreement: but theſe latter conſtantly refuſed coming to any concluſion 'till the ſtates were aſſembled.

Buchanan. Thuanus. Spotſwood.

In this interval, the laird of Grange releaſed the duke of Chateleraut, lord Herris, and all the other priſoners, and thereby Mary's faction was conſiderably reinforced: nevertheleſs it could not yet have been very ſtrong, as being able to act only by negociations. Howſoever it was, the heads of that party reſolved to meet at Linlithgow, under title of the ſtates, as deeming themſelves (there being no regent) to have as much right to convene the ſtates as had their opponents. In this aſſembly they vainly ſought means to ingage England to break with the whole Scotiſh nation. Elizabeth was too much on her guard to be eaſily ſurpriſed: ſo that finally perceiving they could not ſucceed, they judged it neceſſary for their ſafety to attempt geting poſſeſſion of Edinburg; but as this could not be effected by force, they deſired permiſſion of the magiſtrates of that city to hold there the aſſembly. This was readily granted; but the Edinburgers kept ſuch ſtrict watch, that Mary's friends were balked of their deſign. Mean time, ſundry negociations between the two parties were ſet on foot; none of which produced any effect.

Mary's party aſſemble, and try in vain to take Edinburg. March. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

Soon after, on news of the earl of Suſſex's being come to Berwick, the Edinburg aſſembly broke up. The chiefs had already diſpatched deputies to Elizabeth, to indeavor diverting the threatened ſtorm, and to gain time 'till the French ſuccors arrived. They even offered to make her umpire, and were ſo well ſeconded by the French embaſſadors, that ſhe readily conſented to be mediatrix between the two parties. But ſhe inſiſted, that the affair for which ſhe ſent forces into Scotland, had no relation to the differences between the two factions, it being only to chaſtiſe the violators of the peace, who were owned by neither party; nor indeed was either able to procure her any ſatisfaction: ſo the earl of Suſſex received no counter-orders. When that general had reached Berwick, the duke of Chateleraut ſent Melvil, to know whether he intended to join one of the parties, or labor their reconciliation. Melvil, in his memoirs, ſays that, in his conferences with the earl of Suſſex, he found the earl had orders indeed to favor the King's party, but would not quite diſcourage the Queen's. He infers, that his chief aim was to continue the troubles in Scotland; which is very likely.

The Engliſh army approaches. Buchanan. Spotſwood.

Elizabeth accepts being umpire between the two parties; but on certain conditions. Camden.

The Engliſh army entering Scotland in April, ravaged the lands of the Scots and Carrs, and of thoſe who were concerned in the late incurſion into England (2). Camden ſays, in this expedition were burned upwards of three hundred houſes, and about fifty caſtles. Melvil adds, the earl of Suſſex aſſaulted and took the caſtles of Hume and Falſt, belonging to lord Hume, to oblige that nobleman, who had thitherto remained in a kind of neutrality, to declare for Mary's party, leſt the balance ſhould incline too much to the King's ſide. This conjecture is grounded on the project formed by the Queen's faction, to unite all Scotland, and on Elizabeth's intereſt to prevent ſuch union.

Early in May the ſtates, ſummoned in the King's name, met at Edinburg. Their firſt care was to depute Robert Pitcairn to Elizabeth, to beſpeak her favor, and acquaint her with their being ready to chuſe a regent to her liking.

While Pitcairn was on his way, Mary's partiſans beſieged the caſtle of Glaſgow, which made a braver defenſe than they expected. The earl of Suſſex having thereof notice, detached ſir William Drury, governor of Berwick, with a thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe. At their approach, the beſiegers retired and diſperſed themſelves in the mountains. Mean while Drury, being joined by a body of Scotiſh royaliſts, ravaged the lands of the Hamiltons, and took the caſtle of that name, appertaining to the duke of Chateleraut.

In the interim Pitcairn, returning from England, reported to the ſtates, that Elizabeth thought it very ſtrange that, ſince Murray's death, ſhe had not been informed of the poſture of affairs in Scotland; that her ignorance in that reſpect had kept her in ſuſpenſe concerning the courſe ſhe was to take: that at length, tired with continual ſollicitations, ſhe had conſented that a conference ſhould be held between the two parties, wherein ſhe was very willing to act as mediatrix, provided they would both refrain from violent methods, and leave things as they were: that ſhe deſired therefore the ſtates to obſerve this condition, and defer the election of a regent 'till the ſucceſs of this conference ſhould be known. This demand greatly imbaraſſed the ſtates. They could remain no longer without a head, and yet durſt not diſoblige the Queen of England, who alone was able to ſupport them. Wherefore they reſolve to elect an Inter-Rex, who could be revoked without any conſequence, and the choice fell on the earl of Lenox, then in England. Soon after, they received from Elizabeth a letter, acquainting them with her conſent that they might chuſe a regent, and recommended to them the earl of Lenox, who was inſtantly elected.

Mean while the earl of Huntley, receiving from Spain money and ammunition, took the field, and reſtored the caſtle of Brechin. Not long after, the earl of Lenox arrived in Scotland, and when the ſtates brake up reſolved to recover that caſtle, which was of ſo great importance. He aſſembled for that purpoſe his forces at Linlithgow, and demanded

Grange was properly of the Queen's party, but had other views than the reſt of her friends. His project was to ſet himſelf at the head of a third party, with which he pretended the other two ſhould join, to reſtore Mary to the crown, on certain conditions: and this occaſioned his ruin, as will hereafter appear. Sir James Melvil, author of the memoirs ſo often quoted, was in the ſame ſentiments, as he diſcovers in ſeveral places, but probably waited for a more favorable opportunity to declare.

Grange's refuſal hindered not the regent from maſtering Brechin, and forcing the earl of Huntley to betake himſelf to the mountains, whether he could not be eaſily purſued. Soon after, Mary's party obtained a truce, thro' inſtances made by Elizabeth, who ſought only to prolong the affair; as, on their part, Mary's friends ſtrove to gain time, to wait the effects of the duke of Alva's aſſurances. Some time before, they had ſent him lord Seaton to deſire aid, and he had promiſed them ten thouſand men: but the diſorders which unexpectedly aroſe in the Netherlands prevented him from being ſo good as his word (1).

Plots in England to free Queen Mary. Camden. Thuanus.

While theſe matters paſſed in Scotland, diverſe plots were forming in England to free the captive Queen. Monluc, biſhop of Valence, came to London, and very earneſtly ſollicited the Scotiſh Queen's liberty: nor was the Spaniſh embaſſador leſs urgent on the ſame article. Queen Elizabeth was the more jealous of France's and Spain's zeal for Mary, as at the ſame time his Holineſs* cauſed a bull, dated laſt year, to be affixed one night in diverſe parts of London (2), whereby he excommunicated Elizabeth, and abſolved her ſubjects from their oath of allegiance. On the other hand, it was diſcovered, that ſome Norfolk gentlemen were combined to arm themſelves and raiſe a rebellion in that county (3). This conſpiracy taking vent, the authors were apprehended: but her Majeſty pardoned all except three, of whom two were John Throckmorton, and Felton who poſted up the bull. Likewiſe ſoon after, ſhe had intelligence, that two of the earl of Derby's ſons had ploted the Queen of Scots releaſe. As John Leſley biſhop of Roſs, who acted as Mary's embaſſador, was the chief promoter of all theſe plots, it was thought fit once more to confine him to the biſhop of London's palace: he had not been long at liberty, having been under arreſt for being deeply concerned in the earl of Northumberland's conſpiracy. Notwithſtanding the juſt ſuſpicions which all theſe machinations might give Elizabeth of the duke of Norfolk, who was conſidered as head of the Scotiſh Queen's faction, he was diſcharged from the Tower (4): but it was not 'till after he had expreſſed great repentance for his fault, and proteſted, both verbally and under his hand, that he would never more think of eſpouſing the Queen of Scots.

The duke of Norfolk releaſed. Leſley. Camden. Thuanus.

Elizabeth might very eaſily perceive, that the Scotiſh Queen was the ſole cauſe of all theſe combinations and diſturbances. If her own quiet would have been the conſequence of that Queen's releaſe, ſhe would gladly have ſet her at liberty. But tho' Mary's adherents, and thoſe who ſollicited in her behalf, pretended they acted only from a motive of compaſſion, and exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of detaining her in priſon, Elizabeth was not ignorant that their views extended much farther. The Pope, Spain, the houſe of Lorrain, the duke of Alva, the Engliſh, Scotiſh and Iriſh Catholics confined not themſelves to the freeing this unhappy Queen from captivity: their aim was to ſet her on the throne of England; and conſequently it was more dangerous for Elizabeth to releaſe than keep her confined: but ſhe did not think proper to divulge her thoughts; as her adverſaries were, on their part, extremely careful to conceal their deſigns. She therefore continued feigning herſelf to deſire nothing more cordially than to find means to reſtore Mary to the Scotiſh throne, provided it could be effected without danger to England. To this end, ſhe ſent Cecil (5) to make her ſome captious propoſitions, tending merely to amuſe the public. Mary, giving them a hearing, returned a general anſwer, declining to make particular replies to each article, without the conſent of her chief partiſans in Scotland, to whom ſhe deſired they might be communicated, in order to their anſwering them as they ſhould judge requiſite. The propoſals, with the Scots anſwers, were to the following purport, viz.

Remarks on theſe propoſals and anſwers.

In cloſely examining theſe propoſals, it would be very eaſy to ſhew that ſome were only to create a belief of Elizabeth's acting with moderation and ſincerity; that others were but ſnares to ſurpriſe the Queen of Scots; and that the execution of ſome was utterly impracticable. Elizabeth's intention was therefore purely to amuſe the public.

On the other hand, the replications were as little proper to procure any accommodation between the two Queens. They who drew theſe anſwers pretended, that Mary ſhould treat with Elizabeth upon equal terms, as ſhe might have done had ſhe been on her throne at Edinburg: but the Engliſh had no ſuch meaning. Mary was priſoner in England, and the point was to releaſe and reſtore her to the throne. She accepted the ſaid terms to obtain theſe two great advantages; but withal ſhe is made to ſay, that ſhe expected Elizabeth ſhould be bound to the like or equivalent conditions: which was the ſame as ſaying, that otherwiſe ſhe would not accept what was offered her. Nothing could be more pleaſing to Elizabeth, ſince it was a certain means to prolong the negociation. Had Mary accepted theſe propoſals without any reſtriction, ſhe would perhaps have imbaraſſed Elizabeth's council: at leaſt they would have been forced to ſeek means to obſtruct the execution, and thereby the Engliſh court would manifeſtly have incurred the whole blame.

Moſt certainly, Elizabeth had no mind to releaſe her priſoner on any terms whatever. She was a very dangerous rival, even when in priſon; how much more ſo had ſhe been at liberty? From her return to Scotland, on the demiſe of her firſt conſort, King Francis II, ſhe had never ceaſed holding intelligence in England, or attempting to excite Elizabeth's ſubjects to rebellion. This is what very evidently appears in Melvil's memoirs. Her misfortune in falling under Elizabeth's power induced her not to diſcontinue her practiſes. On the other hand, her project of marrying the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Northumberland's conſpiracy, and the correſpondence of her adherents with foreign courts, tended only to raiſe her to the throne of England, even while Queen Elizabeth was living. In a word, it was manifeſt, that the Pope, King of Spain, Princes of Lorrain, Engliſh Catholics, all the Iriſh, and part of the Scots, were laboring to accompliſh this deſign. How imprudent then would it have been to releaſe her, that ſhe might the better proſecute her pretenſions? Indeed, on King Francis II's deceaſe, ſhe relinquiſhed the title of Queen of England, and proteſted ſhe claimed not the crown of England 'till after Elizabeth and her iſſue: but that a bare proteſtation may ſerve for ſecurity, the ſincerity of the perſon proteſting muſt be firſt well eſtabliſhed. Here was quite the contrary; Mary's whole procedure evidencing ſhe deſiſted not from her claim: ſo her bare proteſtation was only her word, on which it was very hazardous to rely. Certainly, this Queen's greateſt unhappineſs conſiſted in having over zealous adherents, who by every ſtep they took were ſtill puſhing her towards deſtruction. But this is no wonder: they acted not for her ſake, but to advance their own particular intereſts and thoſe of Popery, to all which ſhe ſerved for a pretext. James Melvil, who was not Mary's enemy, obſerves in his memoirs, that both parties equally prejudiced her, the one in acting directly againſt her, the other in ſerving her too zealouſly. He adds, the Queen's party groundleſly flattered themſelves with ruining their adverſaries, who were ſupported by England. The reaſon he gives is very ſtrong, viz. that there was no likelihood of her party's ever receiving much aſſiſtance from the French court, which dreaded nothing ſo much as ſeeing the two crowns of England and Scotland on the ſame head. On this occaſion he recites a certain paſſage, which may be of great ſervice to diſcover the ſituation of Mary's affairs. Sir Robert Melvil, returning from his embaſſy to England, gave Queen Mary a paper, ſigned by twenty-five Engliſh earls and barons, promiſing to ſet her on the throne of England. Mary ſent this paper to the cardinal of Lorrain, her uncle, deſiring withal the aſſiſtance neceſſary to execute that deſign. But the cardinal himſelf diſſuaded Queen Catherine di Medicis from thinking on any ſuch enterpriſe, demonſtrating the prejudice France would receive by the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland: nay, to prevent its being effected by other means, they gave notice thereof to Queen Elizabeth, who always feigned ignorance of what ſhe was told by the French court. Melvil affirms, he had this from the Scotiſh Queen's own mouth, at a time when ſhe was diſſatisfied with the cardinal. It is then evident, that the eagerneſs of Mary's friends was prejudicial to her: but, more particularly, thoſe who continued the war in Scotland only helped to ſecure the affairs of Elizabeth, who thereby was ſheltered from the quarter ſhe had moſt to fear; whereas the Scots, by their union, would have been more conſiderable, and Elizabeth would undoubtedly have had more condeſcenſion for her priſoner. On this principle it was that Grange and Melvil labored to procure ſome agreement between the two factions, wherein they indeavored to render Mary a very eſſential ſervice: but it was no eaſy matter to induce rigorous men to ſacrifice their paſſions and intereſts to the public welfare. The council of England improving theſe diſpoſitions, never ceaſed fomenting the troubles of Scotland, under color of appeaſing them, 'till it ſhould be Elizabeth's intereſt to end them. This Melvil plainly ſhews in his memoirs; but it would be tedious to alledge the proofs. Thus Mary was in a wretched condition, thro' the ill counſels which were given her, and which ſhe was ſo unwiſe as to follow with ardor. The biſhop of Roſs, her agent at London, a great zealot for his religion, but whoſe views were not very extenſive, did her infinite damage by his paſſion and pains to cheriſh the diſcontent of the Engliſh Catholics. As Elizabeth had had good ſpies, ſhe was not ignorant that this pretended embaſſador was concerned in all the ſchemes formed againſt her, whence ſhe could not but infer, that he acted conformably to his miſtreſs's inclinations and orders. As ſoon as this prelate had the articles propoſed to Mary, he ſent copies to the Pope, to the Kings of France and Spain, and to the duke of Alva, intimating to all theſe Potentates, that Mary would be at length conſtrained to accept them, if ſome vigorous effort was not made in her favor: but his ſollicitations were fruitleſs. The King of Spain being then imployed in his marriage with Ann of Auſtria his niece (1), daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, left the care of ſuccoring the Scotiſh Queen to the duke of Alva; but the duke was himſelf ſufficiently buſied in the Netherlands. Thoſe of Bruſſels having refuſed paying the hundredth penny, gibbets were already erected to puniſh the diſobedient, when he heard the Prince of Orange was levying forces in Germany. So, inſtead of aiding the Queen of Scots, he was preparing for the war which he ſaw ready to kindle in the Flemiſh provinces, and wherein he would very ſeemingly have to deal as well with the Netherlanders as the Germans.

Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada. Camden.

As for the court of France, beſide their never really intending to ſet the Engliſh crown on Mary's head, but only to create Elizabeth troubles, they began to form projects which admited not their eſpouſing Mary's cauſe openly. Tho' King Charles had gained ſeveral victories over the Hugonots, he with vexation beheld he had ſtill to begin again, and that theſe people chuſing rather to die ſword in hand than at the ſtake or gallows, it would be extremely difficult to deſtroy them by open violence. He therefore reſolved, in order to attain his ends with more facility, to amuſe them with a peace, which he granted them in Auguſt this year. From that time his ſole care was to diſſemble his ſentiments, and make them believe they had nothing more to fear from him. To convince them the better that the deſign of extirpating them was intirely relinquiſhed, Catherine di Medicis propoſed a marriage between the King her ſon and Elizabeth; who replied in two words, "that he was too great and too little." This project failing, Catherine propoſed her ſecond ſon, the duke of Anjou, as a more ſutable match. This was therefore no favorable juncture for the Queen of Scotland, ſince the French court could not publicly undertake any thing in her behalf without diſconcerting their own meaſures.

Propoſals of marriage to Elizabeth. Digges's embaſſ.

Camden.

An' 1571.

Secretary Cecil was created baron of Burleigh, the begining of 1571. No man had better deſerved than he to receive this mark of diſtinction, which was very conſiderable in the reign of a Queen who confered honors with great circumſpection.

Cecil made lord Burleigh. Feb. 25. Dugdale. Camden.

I have more than once intimated that Elizabeth was reſolved not to declare openly for either of the Scotiſh factions, but to prolong the negociation as much as poſſible, that ſhe might never want a pretenſe for detaining Mary in priſon. We are now to ſee a conſequence of this reſolution in the courſe ſhe purſued during the year 1571. Tho' in June, laſt year, ſhe had agreed to a conference between the two parties, of which ſhe was to be mediatrix, ſix months were paſſed, and nothing more ſaid of it. At laſt Elizabeth, reſolving to negociate her marriage with the duke of Anjou, queſtioned not but, on that occaſion, the French court would ſtrongly ſollicit her in the Scotiſh Queen's behalf. To be provided therefore with a plauſible evaſion, ſhe finally cauſed the conference to be held in the months of February and March, that ſhe might be able to tell his Gallic Majeſty, that Queen Mary's affair was upon terms of agreement; being however fully determined ſo to manage, that the conference ſhould be quite fruitleſs.

Camden.

Eliz. An' 1571.

The earl of Morton, Pitcairn, and others, were ſent from Scotland to the conference, which was to be held at London, to maintain the King's cauſe. For Mary, appeared the biſhops of Roſs and Galloway, with lord Levingſton; and Queen Elizabeth appointed ſeven of her privy-counſellors (2) to hear the reaſons of both parties. They immediately required the earl of Morton, and his collegues, to declare plainly the Scots inducement to depoſe their Queen, and give the crown to the Prince her ſon. The Scotiſh deputies delivered a large remonſtrance in writing, wherein they took for granted, that the Queen was privy to the King her huſband's death, and afterwards married the earl of Bothwell the murderer: that to juſtify their conduct with regard to the Queen, there were too points to be examined, the one of fact, the other of right. For the firſt, they ſtood to the proofs given by the earl of Murray, at Hampton-court, before the Engliſh commiſſioners, and which the Queen of England had in her hands: that the ſaid earl had ſo evidently proved Mary guilty of the crime laid to her charge, that they thought it needleſs to repeat the ſame things, which beſide they could not even think on without exceſſive reluctance.

Feb. 28.

As to the point of right, which conſiſted in knowing, whether the Scots had power to depoſe their Sovereigns when they became unworthy of the throne, they maintained, it was a right inconteſtable, injoyed by the Scotiſh nation, even from the commencement of their monarchy. This principle they ſupported with diverſe inſtances drawn from the hiſtory of Scotland, and of other countries, as Spain and Denmark.

Elizabeth ſtill purſuing her ſcheme, not to declare herſelf, replied to the Scots remonſtrance, which was communicated to her, very ſuccinctly, that ſhe was not thoroughly convinced of the juſtice of their proceedings, and deſired them to confer with her miniſters, in order to find ſome expedient to adjuſt this matter. But they ſaid, it was needleſs to ſearch for expedients, ſince they had no power to agree to any diminution of the King's authority. Whereupon Elizabeth cauſed a propoſal to be made to Mary's agents, which ſhe knew they would not accept; namely, to give her in hoſtage the heads of their party, with ſome places in Scotland (3). In effect, they haughtily rejected it, and made other offers which the Engliſh commiſſioners rejected in their turn. Finally, they demanded of the Scots, to give the young King of Scotland in hoſtage to the Queen; to which they anſwered, they were not impowered to ingage in any ſuch promiſe. Camden ſays here, that Mary's agents made a jeſt of this evaſion, affirming, "the deputies wanted not power, ſince the "ſame crime renders all the complices equal.

meet in May. She however detained them ſome time longer, being willing to know, before their departure, whether the Queen of Scots would conſent to the conference: but, ſo far was ſhe from agreeing to it, that ſhe loudly complained of her deputies ſuffering her right to be called in queſtion, and revoked their powers; nevertheleſs, ſhe ordered the biſhop of Roſs to reſide ſtill at London, as her embaſſador. This gave Elizabeth great ſuſpicion, being ſenſible that prelate was the chief promoter of all the combinations againſt her; but ſhe durſt not refuſe him, for fear of giving occaſion to ſay, ſhe did not own Mary for Queen, and thereby wound her pretended impartiality. At length, April eight, the Scotiſh deputies departed, after a ſix weeks fruitleſs ſtay in London: nor was it Elizabeth's intention that this conference ſhould produce any agreement. Tho' this did not evidently appear in her whole conduct, it might eaſily be ſeen in a letter of Cecil to Walſingham, then embaſſador in France, wherein he frankly told him, that the ſole aim, in that conference, was to gain time. Another letter to Walſingham from the earl of Leiceſter on the ſame ſubject, manifeſtly diſcovers Elizabeth's policy. The earl informed him of her Majeſty's having concluded, that Mary was unworthy to ſway the ſcepter, but could ſcarcely be perſuaded her ſubjects had power to depoſe her: that therefore ſhe remained in ſuſpenſe, not being able to determine either to reſtore Queen Mary, or defend the Scots cauſe, as not deeming it intirely equitable. The truce between the two Scotiſh factions being expired, during the conference at London, or not long after, the earl of Lenox took by ſurpriſe the town of Dunbarton, which had 'till then been in the hands of Mary's partiſans. Verac, the French embaſſador, was taken there, and ſent to St. Andrew's, whence he was ſuffered to make his eſcape without much difficulty. But the caſe was otherwiſe with the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, * who being alſo taken priſoner on the ſame occaſion, and ſent to Sterling, was ſentenced to be hanged. A certain prieſt charged him with being a complice in the late King's murder; with which accuſer (1) being confronted, inſtead of defending himſelf, he only aſked, what thoſe prieſts merited who revealed the ſecrets of confeſſions? It is reported that Cardan, going to Scotland to cure him of a dropſy, told him, when he had reſtored him to health, that he had by the help of his medicines freed him from the preſent danger, but it was not in his power to prevent his dying on a gibbet.

It was not ſolely what related to Scotland which found imployment for Elizabeth. She was ingaged in another buſineſs which gave her no leſs trouble, by reaſon of its difficulties, and the conſequences wherewith it might be attended. Her miniſters, knowing her enemies were in perpetual motion, and when one ſcheme failed were inſtantly contriving another, grew apprehenſive leſt in the end her prudence would be over-matched. In Walſingham's negociations is a letter, from a ſecretary of ſtate, telling him, that while the Scotiſh Queen's affair was in hand, her friends were meditating how to carry her off, whereof the court had ſome dark intimations. The earl of Leiceſter wrote to the ſame embaſſador, that Mary's adherents were bolder than ever, which apparently proceeded from their hopes of the ſucceſs of ſome freſh attempt. The miniſters therefore believed marriage alone could ſecure Queen Elizabeth from ſo many conſpiracies which were from day to day renewed. Her alliance with ſome powerful Prince would naturally produce a good effect, by reaſon of the ſuccors which might thence be had on occaſion, beſide that it would ſtrike a dread into her Majeſty's enemies. On the other hand, they imagined, if it pleaſed the Almighty to bleſs her nuptials, the birth of a Prince would deprive the Scotiſh Queen of very many partiſans. On this principle, they never ceaſed repreſenting to Elizabeth the reaſons which ought to determine her to marry. At length, whether ſhe really yielded to theſe reaſons, or to be freed from their importunities, ſhe told them, that nothing prevented her but the difficulty of finding a ſuitable match; nor was it in reality eaſy to make a fit choice. The party muſt be either a Proteſtant or a Romaniſt: but as her inducements to marry were chiefly two, viz. to make a ſtrong alliance, and to have a ſucceſſor; in chuſing a Proteſtant, the firſt of theſe inducements would not be anſwered, becauſe there was no Prince of the Reformed religion whoſe alliance could be greatly advantageous to England. In determining on a Papiſt, there was no choice, ſince the duke of Anjou, the King of France's brother, was the only fit perſon: but this project wanted not its difficulties. Her Majeſty gave to underſtand, that in marrying ſhe did not mean to give herſelf a maſter, or even an equal, ſince ſhe was reſolved to hold the reins of government alone, and communicate to her conſort only the external honors of royalty. In the ſecond place, ſhe did not pretend the Engliſh Catholics ſhould reap any advantage from her eſpouſing a Prince of their belief: but there was no likelihood the duke of Anjou would ſubmit to what Elizabeth required, or diſſemble his religion to injoy the bare title of King, which ſufficed not to ſatisfy his ambition. Mean while, the miniſters were ſo urgent with their royal miſtreſs to marry, that at length they obtained her conſent to treat with France on that head: but, very ſeemingly, ſhe gave her conſent only becauſe ſhe imagined it would be in her power to break off the negociation whenever ſhe pleaſed, by the difficulties ſhe ſhould ſtart. However, ſhe concealed her ſentiments from her miniſters. Burleigh, for ſome time, thought her ſincere. The earl of Leiceſter was not intirely of that opinion, but knew not what to think. Howſoever it was, Elizabeth was told, that Catherine di Medicis, having fully comprehended the motives which induced her to reject the propoſals of a marriage with Charles IX, had intimated, that the duke of Anjou would be properer for her: it was alſo hinted to her, that the young Prince was not any way a bigot, and might poſſibly be brought to the church of England's communion; wherefore nothing remained but ſo to manage that the French court ſhould ſeem to make the firſt advances, after which the treaty might commence. To that end it was that, in Auguſt 1570, Norris was recalled from his embaſſy in France, to make room for ſir Francis Walſingham, who was doubtleſs deemed a properer perſon to manage this affair, being alſo a creature of lord Burleigh, who was highly deſirous of the marriage.

Walſingham continued the whole reſidue of this, and part of the next year at Paris, without any overture being made, and yet the match was much talked of. He thereof ſent notice to the Engliſh court, and preſently after received inſtructions from Burleigh, importing, that if any perſon of diſtinction ſhould ſpeak to him of the marriage, he might anſwer, that, on the report, he had taken care to inquire how her Majeſty ſtood inclined in that reſpect, and found, as the good of her people was her chief

Soon after, lord Buckhurſt being ſent to Paris, as embaſſador extraordinary, King Charles, and his mother Queen Catherine, opened their minds to him on that ſubject, and a negociation commenced: but as this project was not executed, I ſhall here content myſelf, without deſcending to particulars, to ſhew the real cauſes of breaking off the ſaid treaty.

The marriage begins to be negociated. Walſingh. Negociat. Stow.

It is in a manner certain that neither Elizabeth nor the French court had any inclination to conclude this marriage, tho' it ſeemed to be ſeriouſly negociated on both ſides. Elizabeth found a double advantage in this feigned negociation. Firſt, ſhe amuſed her own miniſters, who preſſed her earneſtly to marry. Secondly, her adverſaries, believing this alliance was actually on the point of being concluded, would of courſe remain quiet: and indeed, it was not likely they ſhould think of attacking her, when they ſaw her ſo near being ſtrictly united with France. It was therefore requiſite, the better to amuſe thoſe who might have formed plots againſt her, to ſhew ſome earneſtneſs for this marriage, leſt, if ſhe acted with indifference in this affair, her moſt ſecret thoughts ſhould be diſcovered.

Charles IX and Elizabeth equally diſſemble.

Elizabeth's reaſons.

On the other ſide, the French court propoſed this marriage only to amuſe Elizabeth, and with her all the Proteſtants of Europe, but particularly the Hugonots. To all appearance, Charles IX had already formed the inhuman project which brake out in the year inſuing. But this was only the begining of a more extenſive ſcheme, which was to deſtroy all Proteſtants in general, and attack Elizabeth, when ſhe leaſt expected ſuch a viſit. The Pope and King of Spain were ingaged in the deſign, and feigned being alarmed at what was negociating at Paris, purely to intrap with more facility thoſe they intended to ſurpriſe. It was therefore neceſſary for the court of France to appear paſſionately deſirous of the match, and to yield as far as poſſible, but without coming to any concluſion in point of religion. So the difficulties ſtarted by Elizabeth, in this negociation, were greatly ſubſervient to the deſigns of France, as they gave room to make advances capable of deceiving the public, and cauſing it to paſs for granted that they had no ill deſign againſt the Proteſtant religion: by this means they removed all ſuſpicion both from the court of England and the Hugonots. In effect, it was ſcarcely to be even imagined that, while King Charles IX and his mother teſtified ſuch a zeal to accompliſh the propoſed marriage, they were meditating the extirpating all the Hugonots in France: nay, they were extremely careful to remove ſuch ſuſpicion by their conſummate diſſimulation towards them, pretending to give ear to the leading Hugonots, and repoſe in them intire confidence. Nevertheleſs, the French court, ſpite of the many precautions uſed to conceal their deſigns, made Elizabeth extremely jealous during the whole negociation, by their preſſing and repeated inſtances for the Scotiſh Queen's inlargement. Elizabeth could not comprehend this way of proceeding. The King of France, as ſhe thought, having propoſed her eſpouſing the duke of Anjou, and a ſtrict alliance between the two crowns, ſhould have been intirely in her intereſt, whereas ſhe ſaw him zealous for Mary's, which was directly oppoſite: nay, ſhe alſo at the very juncture diſcovered that France privately favored the Queen of Scots project, which could not be reconciled with the deſign of the marriage and alliance. For this reaſon ſhe frequently intimated to Charles and his mother, that ſhe was offended at their conduct: but ſhe was anſwered with proteſtations of friendſhip, eſteem and regard, and with excuſes that, Mary being Queen dowager of France, leſs could not be done than to ſollicit in her behalf. Charles did not even ſcruple to own privately, that what he did was merely for form, that he might not appear abſolutely to abandon that unfortunate Queen. It will perhaps be thought ſtrange, that Charles ſhould not carry his diſſimulation ſo far as to declare openly, he would no farther concern himſelf about Mary; but ſuch a piece of politics would have ſpoiled all. The deſign of the religious league was to extirpate the Hugonots at once, that being freed from the fear of any diverſion in France, the Catholics might carry their arms into England. If therefore Mary's reſtoration to the throne of Scotland could have been obtained, whether by treaty or ſollicitation, or any other way, England might have been invaded with much greater eaſe, while inſurrections were raiſed within the kingdom: this was the ſcheme which had been formed from the begining of Elizabeth's reign. To invade England by ſea, would neceſſarily have been very expenſive, beſide that ſuch an undertaking was liable to greater inconveniencies, as Philip II afterwards experienced. Scotland therefore alone could afford a paſſage; but to that end the kingdom was to be governed by perſons well affected to the Catholic religion. This was the aim of all the intrigues, public and private, for the Queen of Scots reſtoration. I am perſuaded that ſuch as have intimated, that compaſſion for Queen Mary induced her adherents to act for her, had no juſt idea of the inceſſant and extraordinary movements in her favor: not that I ſhall offer to deny that, among thoſe who ſerved her, ſome acted from that motive; but that was not the ſentiment of thoſe who managed affairs. In the intention of thoſe, Mary's reſtoration was only a means to execute more momentous projects.

It is therefore certain, the court of France never ſeriouſly thought of accompliſhing the marriage, and, in all appearance, Queen Elizabeth herſelf was as little inclined to it, tho' her miniſters did their utmoſt to perſuade her. As ſhe had at firſt declared by Walſingham, that ſhe would not allow the duke of Anjou exerciſe of his religion, the court of France imagined there would be no great danger in making ſome advances with reſpect to that point, ſince they were almoſt ſure of finding therein occaſion of rupture, as well as a continual pretenſe to prolong the treaty as they pleaſed. The duke of Anjou came therefore by degrees to be ſatisfied with a ſmall chapel in ſome private corner of the palace, and the French embaſſador had orders to proteſt, that the duke could not be contented with leſs, and to demand a poſitive anſwer in ten days. Hitherto the Queen had refuſed to agree that the duke ſhould have the exerciſe of his religion at all, nay had pretended, he ſhould accompany her when ſhe went to chapel, and be preſent at divine ſervice. The buſineſs then was to anſwer the duke's propoſal, which probably was to be the laſt: but, while ſhe was deliberating, the French embaſſador ſhewed to ſome courtiers of diſtinction letters from Paris, whereby it appeared, the court of France inſiſted not on that article ſo ſtrenuouſly as ſome would have inſinuated. On the other hand, lord Burleigh was informed, by a French gentleman of good conſideration, that if the Queen ſtood her ground, the court of France would finally give way. Moreover Walſingham wrote from Paris, that the duke of Montmorency had given his opinion in council, that it would be beſt not to make the leaſt mention of religion in the marriage treaty, which was the ſame as leaving this article intirely to Queen Elizabeth. All theſe inſinuations were ſo many ſnares laid for Elizabeth by the court of France, to induce her to refuſe what ſeemed ſo very reaſonable, and that it might appear the rupture proceeded not from the duke. She ſuffered herſelf to be over-reached, and in her anſwer deſiſted not from her pretenſions.

France that he might venture to proceed one ſtep farther, he offered to leave this article of religion undetermined. But Elizabeth would not agree to it, ſaying, it would be a moſt infallible means to ſow diſcord between her and her ſpouſe. In a word, the Gallic court went ſo far, as to be ſatisfied with the Queen's promiſe in writing, that the duke of Anjou ſhould not be proſecuted according to the laws of England, if he ſecretly exerciſed his religion in a private chapel. Whereupon Elizabeth, with great difficulty, agreed at length to this:

Camden. p. 433.

"That if the duke of Anjou would promiſe to "accompany the Queen when ſhe went to chapel, "and would not refuſe to hear and learn the prin- "ciples of the church of England, ſhe would "agree, that neither himſelf nor his family ſhould "be compeled againſt their conſcience to conform "to the Engliſh church, 'till they ſhould be other- "wiſe perſuaded. Moreover, that neither himſelf "nor his domeſtics, the number of whom ſhould "be agreed on, ſhould be diſturbed in the uſe of "any rites and ceremonies different from thoſe "eſtabliſhed by law, provided they were not re- "pugnant to the word of God, and on condition "it were done in a private place, for the ſatisfying "their conſciences, and ſo as the people might "not take occaſion from thence to violate the "eſtabliſhed laws of the land." It was with much difficulty that the French embaſſador got the terms, "repugnant to the word of God," to be changed into theſe, "repugnant to the church of God."

It is eaſy to perceive that, when Elizabeth ſeemed to relax a little on this article, ſhe added reſtrictions which required explication, and which left a door to go back, in caſe ſhe had been taken at her word. Hence therefore it may be infered, that ſhe did inſiſt ſo much upon the article of religion, only becauſe ſhe thought it ſerviceable to break off the negociation. Accordingly we find, in Walſingham's memoirs, that the earl of Leiceſter, and lord Burleigh, were finally convinced of her not being any way inclinable to matrimony.

The negociation breaks off.

The affair ſtanding thus, Charles IX told Elizabeth, by La Mothe Fenelon his embaſſador, that he thought her anſwer very hard, and deſired her to ſend ſome truſty perſon to ſettle with him all matters concerning the marriage. Her Majeſty replied, ſhe could not proceed to any other article, without firſt knowing whether the King and duke intended to allow what ſhe had propoſed touching religion: ſo, the buſineſs there came to a ſtop. Charles ſtill feigned to expect the truſty perſon he had demanded, and the Queen pretended ſhe waited for the court of France's conſent to the article about religion, as ſhe had ſent it. This negociation laſted from March 'till September, and the rupture altered not the good intelligence between the two courts. On the contrary, Charles thanked the Queen for dealing with him ſo frankly, and, without farther mention of the marriage, deſired to conclude with her a defenſive league. Elizabeth readily conſented. As ſhe had no ally, it was her intereſt to unite with France, as well to diſingage that crown from the Queen of Scots intereſt, as to diſcourage the Pope, King of Spain, and Engliſh Catholics, by this alliance: but ſhe knew not that Charles's aim was only to amuſe both her and the Hugonots, whoſe deſtruction was determined, tho' he affected to careſs and make uſe of them, to execute his pretended projects againſt Spain. However this be, Elizabeth ſent ſecretary Smith into France, to negociate the league, jointly with Walſingham.

While the Queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou was treating at Paris, and both ſides affected to publiſh it would ſoon be concluded, the Queen of Scots was grievouſly imbaraſſed, as plainly perceiving ſhe was going to loſe France. This doubtleſs obliged her to turn towards Spain, and indeavor obtaining thence the aſſiſtance ſhe wanted. To that purpoſe, ſhe diſpatched Ridolfi to the Pope, and the King of Spain, to acquaint them with the ſtate of her affairs. At the ſame time ſhe wrote to the duke of Norfolk, and ſent him in cypher the copy of her letters to Rome and Madrid, recommending to him Ridolfi as a truſty perſon to whom ſhe deſired him to give letters of credit. On the receipt of theſe letters, the duke ordered Higford his ſecretary, who had the key, to decypher them, and then bid him throw them into the fire. But whether Higford was already gained by the court, or deſigned to betray his maſter, he hid all theſe papers under a mat in his bed-chamber.

Ridolfi, who was the Pope's private agent, did all he could to perſuade the duke of Norfolk to undertake the Queen of Scots defenſe. He repreſented to him, there were in England many malecontents, who would be glad to ſee him at their head, and by that means he might revenge the injuries he had received, and the long impriſonment he had indured. He put him in hopes of powerful ſuccors from the Pope and King of Spain, adding, that in this he would do no wrong to Elizabeth, ſince it was only to obtain her conſent to marry the Queen of Scots, and oblige her to tolerate the Romiſh creed in England. At the ſame time the biſhop of Roſs frequently told the duke, by Barker, one of his confidents, that by the help of his friends, who were very numerous, it would be eaſy for him to ſeize the Queen, become maſter of her perſon, and detain her in cuſtody 'till he had eſpouſed Queen Mary, and provided for the ſecurity of the Catholic religion. But the duke rejected the biſhop of Roſs's project, and even refuſed to give Ridolfi the credential letters which he deſired for the courts of Rome and Madrid, and for the duke of Alva. But tho' the duke of Norfolk's whole procedure in this affair is not particularly known, it is however certain, he ingaged in it too far, in expectation of eſpouſing the Scotiſh Queen: but it cannot well be conceived, how he intended to accompliſh his enterpriſe, or what he deſigned to do after marrying her ſaid Majeſty. Nevertheleſs it is eaſy to conjecture that his Sanctity and the Catholic King, who ſet to work both Ridolfi and the biſhop of Roſs, would never have thought of imploying the duke of Norfolk, had they not received from him ſome aſſurances, that he would conform to their meaſures.

The duke proceeds cautiouſly, but reſumes the project of marrying Queen Mary. Leſley's Negociations. Camden.

Ridolfi, having confered with the Pontif and duke of Alva, informed a certain domeſtic of the Scotiſh Queen's, named Baily, of what he had negociated; and, as this man was bound for England, gave him diverſe letters for Queen Mary, the Spaniſh embaſſador, the biſhop of Roſs, and the duke of Norfolk (1). Baily was no ſooner landed at Dover, but he was ſeized. His packet was taken from him, and ſent to lord Cobham, governor of the Cinque-Ports. But the biſhop of Roſs, having notice of this accident, ſo artfully managed lord Cobham, the duke of Norfolk's ſecret friend, that the letters were changed, and in their ſtead were put others containing nothing criminal, or of moment, which were delivered to the council. However, Baily was put to the rack, and confeſſed the true letters were in the biſhop of

Not long after, the court made a new diſcovery, which proved fatal to the duke of Norfolk. The French embaſſador, intending to diſtribute ſome money in Scotland among the Queen's friends, applied to the duke of Norfolk, who deſired him to put it into the hands of Higford and Barker, to deliver it to one Brown, who was to convey it to Lowther and Baniſter, and theſe were ordered to ſend it to lord Herris. Brown, who was not in the ſecret, receiving the money well packed up, and finding by the weight it was gold, whereas he had been told it was ſilver, carried it to the ſecretary of ſtate. The packet being opened, there was found a letter in cypher from La Mothe Fenelon to Verac the French embaſſador in Scotland. Hereupon Higford, the duke of Norfolk's ſecretary, being apprehended, immediately confeſſed he had that money from the French embaſſador. He diſcovered likewiſe where he had hid the Queen of Scots papers, which the duke his maſter had ordered him to decypher and tranſcribe. This ſufficed to get the duke of Norfolk arreſted and ſent to the Tower, the ſeventh of September. Upon him was found a long memorial in cypher, dated the ſeventh of February this year, wherein the Queen of Scotland told him, ſhe was adviſed to retire to Spain rather than France, by reaſon of the duke of Anjou's marriage with Elizabeth, which was much talked of. She added, when ſhe ſhould be in Spain, ſhe would feign a deſire to marry Don Juan of Auſtria; but that the duke ſhould not be alarmed at it, becauſe ſhe reſerved herſelf for him. Finally, after ſpeaking of Elizabeth in very injurious terms, ſhe deſired the duke to diſpatch Ridolfi to Rome with inſtructions (1).

He ſaid farther, that the biſhop of Roſs having preſſed him to write to the duke of Alva by Ridolfi, he had refuſed it, neither would he give him any inſtructions about the affair for which he went to Rome. He confeſſed alſo, he had helped to convey to Verac a letter from the French embaſſador reſiding at London. As to the papers he had received from the Queen of Scots by Ridolfi, he ſaid, they were burned, as he really believed. Then his houſe was ſearched, and the cypher which the Queen of Scots and he uſed was found with the papers hid by the ſecretary. Conſultations about the biſhop of Roſs. Octob. 24. Lesley's Negociations. Camden. Thuanus.

While proofs were collecting againſt the duke of Norfolk, in order to form his proceſs, the council debated on what was to be done with the biſhop of Roſs. He aſſumed the character of the Scotiſh Queen's embaſſador, and had ſeemingly been acknowledged for ſuch, Elizabeth not having thought proper to deny Mary the title of Queen, or openly to ſhew ſhe was a priſoner. So the caſe being ſomewhat uncommon, certain civilians (2) were conſulted upon three queries. Firſt, whether an embaſſador, convicted of conſpiring againſt the Prince to whom he is ſent, ought to injoy the privileges of an embaſſador? The civilians replied, ſuch embaſſador, by the law of nations, forfeits his privileges. Secondly, whether a Prince depoſed can give his miniſter or agent the title of embaſſador? The anſwer was, the right of ſending embaſſadors belonged only to Sovereigns, and a Prince legally depoſed cannot confer that title. (It muſt be obſerved, Elizabeth had not owned that Mary was legally depoſed.) Thirdly, whether a Prince who comes into another Prince's dominions, and is there held priſoner, can have a public agent? And, whether that agent may ſtile himſelf embaſſador, even if it be notified to him that he ſhall be no longer acknowledged for ſuch? It was anſwered, (3) [If ſuch a Prince has not forfeited his royalty, he may have ſuch agent; but whether that agent may ſtile himſelf embaſſador, and be ſo reputed, depended upon the authority of his commiſſion. And] a Prince may forbid any embaſſador his dominions, if he does not keep within the bounds of his office: but however, the privileges of embaſſadors are not to be violated.

Theſe queries being thus anſwered, the biſhop of Roſs was brought before the council, and charged with intriguing to diſturb the kingdom's tranquillity. He refuſed at firſt to anſwer, inſiſting on the privileges of embaſſadors: but, at length, ſeeing this defenſe was little regarded, and witneſſes began to be produced againſt him, he ſaid, that by a cuſtom inviolable grown into a law, the Engliſh and Scots could not be evidences againſt each other. It was thereupon examined, whether this cuſtom was to take place any where but on the borders, eſpecially in a caſe where the ſafety of a Queen and realm was concerned. In ſhort, the biſhop was ſent to the Tower, and ſome time after examined on twenty-three articles, to each of which he anſwered in particular: but Camden has not thought fit to give us either the examination or the anſwers. He ſays only in general, that the biſhop excuſed the Queen his miſtreſs, for that, being a priſoner, and in the flower of her age, it was no wonder ſhe ſhould uſe her indeavors to eſcape: that the project of her marriage was formed by the advice of diverſe Engliſh peers, ſome of whom were privy-counſellors: that indeed the duke of Norfolk had promiſed to think no more of the affair; but his promiſe was not capable of breaking a prior ingagement (4): finally he labored to juſtify his own conduct, for that being an embaſſador, he was obliged to ſerve the Queen his miſtreſs to the utmoſt of his power: adding, that he propoſed the deſign of ſeizing the Queen to the duke of Norfolk, only to try him; and he refuſed to name the great men who had promiſed to aſſiſt him in this attempt; but he confeſſed, that, by the orders of the Queen his miſtreſs, he had conſulted the earl of Arundel, Lumley, Throckmorton, and the lord viſcount Montague, about the Queen of England's demand, that the King of

Scotland

ELIZAB. AN' 1571.

Scotland ſhould be put into her hands. This is all Camden ſays of the biſhop of Roſs's defenſe: but it is not unlikely the fear of death, with which he was threatened, made him diſcover ſome particulars which Camden has not been pleaſed to publiſh, as will hereafter appear.

The Queen informs the court of France of the duke of Norfolk's affair. Digges's Ambaſ. p. 147.

The duke of Norfolk's impriſonment making a great noiſe in France and elſewhere, Elizabeth cauſed the reaſons to be imparted to Charles IX by Killegrew, whom ſhe ſent to Paris to eaſe Walſingham, who was indiſpoſed. The new embaſſador told the Queen-mother, that it was now two years ſince the Queen of Scots, without giving thereof any information to his royal miſtreſs, had deſigned marrying the duke of Norfolk, who was therefore impriſoned in the Tower, without however being deprived of the injoyment of his eſtate: that afterwards, the duke ſwore to relinquiſh all thoughts of that marriage, and the Queen of Scots, both by letters and agents, promiſed the like: that nevertheleſs they had ſtill continued their intrigues, as it was eaſy to prove by their own letters; and, under color of freeing the Scotiſh Queen, had projected to ſet her on the throne of England, by raiſing a rebellion in the kingdom, and calling in foreign troops, which evidently appeared by their letters and the confeſſions of their accomplices: that the Queen of Scots had expreſly ordered her agents to conceal her deſigns from the court of France, becauſe ſhe was intirely devoted to Spain, having even reſolved to convey her ſon thither, and eſpouſe Don Juan of Auſtria.

Act to maintain the Queen's title. D'ewes, p. 136, &c. Statut. Camden.

In the preſent ſituation of the French court, Elizabeth's complaints againſt the Queen of Scots were not much regarded. But the parliament of England took the Queen's intereſt extremely to heart, and to prevent the dangers to which ſhe was expoſed by combinations, paſſed a very remarkable act. It was provided, "That if any man ſhould "attempt the perſonal hurt of the Queen, or the "depriving her of any part of the ſovereignty; "raiſe war, or ſtir up others to war againſt her: "if any one ſhould dare to give out that another "perſon has a juſter title than ſhe to the crown; "or ſhould ſay ſhe is a heretic, ſchiſmatic or infidel; or ſhould uſurp her right and title during "her life; or ſhould affirm the parliament has not "power to ſettle and limit the ſucceſſion to the "crown, every ſuch perſon ſhould be guilty of "high-treaſon (1)". It was moreover inacted, "That whoſoever, by bulls or other mandates of "the Pope, ſhould reconcile any man to the church "of Rome, and thoſe who ſhould be ſo reconciled, ſhould be guilty of treaſon: that whoſoever ſhould relieve ſuch reconcilers, or ſhould "bring into England any Agnus Dei's, Grains, "or other things conſecrated by the Pope, ſhould "incur the penalty of a Præmunire, loſs of goods, "and perpetual impriſonment." It was provided "likewiſe, "That all the fugitives ſhould within "ſuch a time, under forfeiture of their eſtates, "return and ſubmit themſelves to the government, and that all the fraudulent conveyances of their lands ſhould be void." It was alſo moved, That if, for the future, the Queen of Scots ſhould be concerned in any conſpiracy, ſhe ſhould be proceeded againſt by law, as the wife of an Engliſh peer. But Elizabeth ſuffered not this bill to paſs, being ſatisfied with giving her priſoner to underſtand what ſhe would be expoſed to if ſhe continued her practiſes.

Before we examine what inſued on the late diſcoveries, it will be requiſite we take a tranſient view of what paſſed in Scotland, after the earl of Morton's return. Early in May, the Queen's party poſſeſſed themſelves of Edinburg, by the aſſiſtance of Kirkaldie, laird of Grange, who favored them, tho' he pretended to keep the caſtle for his Majeſty. This done, the chiefs of that party convened ſuch ſtates as belonged to their faction at Edinburg; and then alſo the earl of Lenox aſſembled the ſtates of young King James's party in the ſame city's ſuburbs. Theſe two parties did nothing but vent reciprocal reproaches, and, as if they had given each other the word, they reſolved each apart to meet again in Auguſt, the King's ſtates at Sterling, and the Queen's at Edinburg. Theſe reſolves being, at the time appointed, put in execution, the lords at Edinburg formed the project of forcibly carrying away thoſe peers of the adverſe faction, who were at Sterling without any precaution. Melvil ſays, his friend Grange was the author, contriver and manager of this enterpriſe. He would have headed them perſonally, but his friends would not ſuffer him to be expoſed to the danger: this is the ſame Grange, whom Melvil repreſents as a neutral perſon, and aiming only at the good of his country. This project was executed with ſuch conduct and ſucceſs, that the regent and the earl of Morton were inſtantly made priſoners. In all appearance, few of the King's lords would have eſcaped, had not the victorious ſoldiers fallen to plundering: but while they were diſperſed about the town, the earl of Mar ſallied from the caſtle with the gariſon, and compeled them to retire. In the diſorder, the earl of Morton fortunately eſcaped, but the regent was carried away, and murdered on the road in cold blood by one hired to do it, in ſpite of the officer who guarded him. A few days after, the earl of Mar, * was elected regent, to the exceſſive mortification of Morton, who aſpired to that dignity, and was ſupported by the Engliſh embaſſador.

To rightly comprehend the poſture of Scotland's affairs, it is neceſſary to conſider, that tho' there ſeemed to be only two factions in that realm, viz. the King's and the Queen's, it had nevertheleſs five, there being ſo many different opinions in thoſe two; whence followed that all of the ſame party looked not one and the ſame way. Some were wholly attached to the Queen, and their chief view was to reſtore Popery. Others earneſtly adhered to the King's party and the Proteſtant religion. The new regent, like his predeceſſor, was deſirous to unite both factions, and labored to bring all to the young King's obedience, which he hoped to accompliſh, by granting the Queen's adherents whatever favors they could reaſonably expect. Grange and his friends had formed the ſame deſign of uniting the two parties, but in ſuch a manner as that the kingdom ſhould be governed in the Queen's name. In fine, the earl of Morton, who was penſioner to the court of England, was at the head of a fifth party who, tho' outwardly for the King, ſought only to thwart ſuch as were for uniting the two factions. This was properly Elizabeth's party, or at leaſt the party ſhe moſt favored, notwithſtanding ſhe affected a neutrality. Her embaſſador Randolph, a man of a great genius, and very fit for his office, was the inſtrument ſhe made uſe of to ſtrengthen it. Nothing could be more prejudicial to England, than the union of the two parties, which was, at any rate,

(1) The act goes on: "And if any one, during the Queen's life, ſhould by book written or printed, maintain that any perſon "is, or ought to be the Queen's heir or ſucceſſor, except the natural iſſue of her body, &c." But abundance of jeſts were paſſed on the clauſe, "except the natural iſſue of her body," ſince, in law, thoſe children are called natural which are begoten out of wedlock. So that Camden (p. 436.) ſays, being then a young man, he himſelf often heard people ſay, that the word natural was inſerted into the act by Leiceſter, with a deſign, one time or other, to impoſe ſome baſtard ſon of his upon the Engliſh for the Queen's natural iſſue.

ſtrenuouſly indeavored. It was to be feared that, after this union, Queen Mary's partiſans would grow too powerful in the parliament, and procure reſolutions contrary to Elizabeth's and England's intereſts. Thus diſcord among the Scots was yet for Elizabeth's advantage, 'till affairs ſhould take a different turn. But as Mar, the new regent, was a perſon not to be directed as ſhe wiſhed, ſhe previouſly laid her meaſures to procure the earl of Morton a party capable of being oppoſed to the regent, if requiſite. Such was the poſture of Scotland's affairs in 1571. We muſt now examine what was tranſacting in France.

Affairs of France. Mezerai.

Diſſimulation of Charles IX. Thuanus.

During this whole year, the court of France uſed the higheſt diſſimulation to draw the Hugonots into their ſnares: no favors at court but for them. King Charles feigned a diffidence of his brother, the duke of Anjou, and to be diſpleaſed with the Guiſes, who, as he gave out, held him in a ſhameful dependency. Beſide this, he made uſe of two very effectual method to deceive the admiral. The firſt was, to counterfeit a fixed deſign of making war upon Spain, and of intruſting him with its management. The ſecond was, to conclude the marriage of his ſiſter, Princeſs Margaret, with the King of Navarre. After that, the admiral and Hugonots no longer doubted the King's being well-diſpoſed towards them, eſpecially as they ſaw him very intent upon the duke of Anjou's marriage with the Queen of England, and as compliant as poſſible with reſpect to religion.

Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada.

At this very time, the Prince of Orange was laboring to put in motion the Netherlands, having reſolved to make ſome attempt while his Catholic Majeſty's arms were imployed againſt the Infidels(1). The Kings of Sweden and Denmark refuſing to aid him, he applied to Elizabeth, who durſt not give him aſſiſtance, tho' ſhe was not ignorant of the correſpondence held by the duke of Alva in Scotland and England with Mary's party: ſhe even forbid her ports to all ſuch ſhips of Holland and Zealand, as acted againſt the Spaniards. In this extremity, the Prince of Orange ſent his brother, count Lewis, to King Charles IX, who loaded him with careſſes, and even imparted to him the falſe ſecret of his pretended deſign to make war upon Philip: but all this was only to deceive him. Mean while, count De la Marc, with twenty-four cruiſing veſſels, did the Spaniards all poſſible damage. This was all the Prince of Orange could effect during this year.

The duke of Norfolk tried and condemned. State-Trials. Stow. Hollingſh.

The ſixteenth of January, the duke of Norfolk was brought to his trial, before the peers of the realm. His accuſation ran; 1. That he had attempted to deprive the Queen of her crown and life, and ſeize the throne himſelf, by the help of foreigners. 2. That, unknown to the Queen, he had treated a marriage with the Queen of Scots, tho' he knew ſhe had uſurped the title and arms of England. 3. That he had lent her a great ſum of money. 4. That he had ſupplied with money the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, who were baniſhed the kingdom, and declared enemies of their country. 5. That he had writ to the Pope, King of Spain, and duke of Alva, deſiring aid to free the Queen of Scots, and reſtore the Popiſh creed in England. 6. Laſtly, that he had ſent ſupplies to lord Herris, and others her Majeſty's enemies in Scotland.

It may in general be ſaid, that the duke made a very weak defenſe to moſt of theſe articles: but he could not eaſily deny what was proved againſt him by his own letters, and the confeſſions of his ſervants and accomplices. Beſide, a certain intercepted letter from the biſhop of Roſs, in priſon, to Queen Mary, clearly evidenced the duke had formed pernicious deſigns againſt the government. Camden thought not proper to give us the contents of the ſaid captive prelate's epiſtle: but it was ſeemingly very much to the purpoſe; ſince the duke deſired to ſee whether it was the biſhop's own hand. When he was ocularly convinced of it, he made the ſame defenſe as the biſhop had done before, urging, that the teſtimony of a Scot againſt an Engliſhman was not valid. In this they both groundleſly pretended to take advantage of a cuſtom introduced on the borders of the two kingdoms, where, in caſes of depredation, the evidence of one nation againſt the other was not admited, as being parties: but this cuſtom was not become ſo general as to be of ſervice to the duke in his cauſe. The ſtrength of his defenſe was, that his deſign to marry the Scotiſh Queen could not be deemed high-treaſon, neither could it be thence infered, that he intended to ſeize the throne. The Queen's attorney replied, that all the circumſtances of the affair, and the duke's whole procedure manifeſtly ſhewed he aimed at ſomething more than barely to eſpouſe a depoſed and impriſoned Queen; for, by the meaſures he would have taken with ſome foreign powers, it plainly appeared that, in marrying the Queen of Scots, he deſigned to aſſert her claim to the crown of England. Finally, after a long examination, he was condemned by his peers as guilty of high-treaſon: but the ſentence was not executed 'till June.

Mean while, the Queen created Walter d'Evreux earl of Eſſex. He was deſcended, by the great Grandmother's ſide, from the noble family of Bourchier, which had long borne that title. At the ſame time, lord Clinton, high-admiral, was made earl of Lincoln, and four new barons were ſummoned to the inſuing parliament.

Act on the duke of Norfolk's account.

The parliament, underſtanding that ſchemes were formed to free the duke of Norfolk, paſſed a ſtatute, whereby it was death to attempt the delivery of a priſoner condemned for high-treaſon. By the ſame act, it was perpetual impriſonment and forfeiture of eſtate, if the priſoner was only accuſed of high-treaſon, tho' not condemned (2).

His execution. State-Trials. Camden. Hollingſh.

At length Elizabeth, having been long in ſuſpenſe, ſigned a warrant for the duke of Norfolk's execution, on the ſecond of June. He confeſſed part of his crimes, excuſed himſelf as to the reſt, and in general owned he was juſtly condemned: but he declared, he never had any thoughts of reſtoring the Popiſh religion in England, and that he died a Proteſtant. He was ſon to the earl of Surrey, beheaded in the latter part of Henry VIII's reign, for quartering the arms of Edward the Confeſſor with his own, without the King's permiſſion. All of that family had firmly adhered to the Catholic religion, except this duke who, very early in Queen Elizabeth's reign, imbraced the reformation. Since he declared that he died in the Reformed religion, I ſee not how his ſincerity can juſtly be queſtioned: but who can tell how far his ambition might have carried him, had he found his projects more practicable? At leaſt, it cannot be denied, that they who ſet him to work fancied they had reaſon to rely on him. After all, if any one doubts that the end of this conſpiracy was to re-eſtabliſh Popery in England, he may be ſatisfied by the teſtimony of Hieronymo Catena, in the life of Pius V. into England to excite the Engliſh to rebel againſt Elizabeth.

The Queen of Scots examined. Camden. Thuanus.

Ten days after the duke of Norfolk's death, Elizabeth ſent privy-counſellors to the Queen of Scots, not to accuſe her criminally, as Camden affirms, but to inform her of what ſhe had been charged with at the trials of Norfolk and his accomplices, and to tell her, the Queen would be extremely glad ſhe could juſtify herſelf. It was chiefly to let her know that her practiſes were diſcovered, and therefore ſhe had been more cloſely confined and the number of her domeſtics reduced. Elizabeth was alſo well pleaſed to let her ſee, ſhe had good ſpies, and knew that it was not barely to obtain her liberty that ſo many powers imployed their intereſt in her behalf, but rather to ſet her on the throne of England. Wherefore the privy-counſellors repreſented to her, 1. That ſhe had aſſumed the title of Queen of England, and afterwards refuſed to ratify the treaty of Edinburg whereby ſhe had ingaged to renounce it. 2. That ſhe would have married the duke of Norfolk without the Queen's knowledge, and there was reaſon to believe it was with deſign to dethrone her, ſince ſhe would have uſed foreign troops to ſet the duke free. 3. That ſhe was deeply concerned in the northern rebellion. 4. That ſhe had relieved the rebels in Scotland and Flanders. 5. That ſhe had ſent Ridolfi to the Pope and King of Spain, to ſollicit them to invade England. 6. That ſhe had received letters from the Pope, wherein he aſſured her of his protection. 7. That ſhe had procured the Pope's bull, to abſolve the Queen's ſubjects from their oath of allegiance. 8. Laſtly, that ſhe had ſuffered her agents in foreign parts to ſtile her publicly, Queen of England. All theſe facts were but too true; however, as it was not eaſy to convict her that ſhe had acted with the intention aſcribed to her, ſhe therefore boldly made her defenſe to this effect:

Mary's anſwer.

That if ſhe had aſſumed the title of Queen of England, it was by command of the King of France her conſort, and ſhe had quited it on his deceaſe; nay, ſhe had declared, and ſtill did declare, ſhe would not claim it ſo long as Elizabeth or her iſſue lived: that, in deſiring to marry the duke of Norfolk, ſhe had no deſign to hurt Elizabeth, but rather was of opinion the match would be advantageous to England: that if ſhe had not renounced the marriage, it was becauſe ſhe was contracted to the duke (1): that ſhe deemed herſelf obliged, by conjugal love, to warn him of the danger, and perſuade him to make his eſcape: that ſhe was acceſſary to no rebellion, but, on the contrary, was always ready to diſcover whatever came to her knowledge, if Elizabeth would have vouchſafed to ſee and hear her: that ſhe had never relieved the Engliſh rebels, but only recommended the counteſs of Northumberland to the duke of Alva: that hearing Ridolfi was in the Pope's favor, ſhe made uſe of him in concerns no way relating to England: that ſhe had not imployed any perſon to free her, but had willingly liſtened to ſuch as offered their ſervice for that purpoſe, and with that view had given her cypher to Rolſton and Hall: that the letters ſhe had received from the Pope, contained only matters of piety and conſolation: that ſhe was not the procurer of the bull, and had only ſeen a copy of it, which when ſhe had read ſhe threw into the fire: that if any in foreign parts ſtiled her Queen of England, ſhe could not help it: that ſhe had never deſired aid of the Pope, or the King of Spain, to invade England, but implored their aſſiſtance to reſtore her to her kingdom: finally, that in caſe ſhe was to ſtand trial, ſhe deſired it might be before the parliament, as a Princeſs of the blood-royal of England.

ELIZAB. AN' 1572.

Theſe anſwers evidence, that Mary denied not the facts, but only the intention aſcribed to her. But, on the other hand, tho' this intention could not be fully proved, her bare denial was not ſufficient to ſhew ſhe never had it, or to efface the ſuſpicions entertained of her. However, as there was no deſign to bring her to a trial, the affair reſted there; but Elizabeth was ſtill perſuaded, that the end of Mary's and her friends intrigues and extraordinary movements was to dethrone her.

Negociation of the defenſive league with France. Walſingh. Negociat. Digges's com. emb.

The negociation of the defenſive league between France and England was ſtill continued at Paris, with great diſſimulation on Charles's ſide. He inſiſted on difficulties which ought not to have cauſed any delay, ſince his ſole aim was to make uſe of this league to ſurpriſe the Hugonots; but this ſerved the better to ſcreen his deſigns. He pretended to be much afraid of the power of Spain, and therefore was obliged to join with England. The difficulties of the league conſiſted in two points. Firſt, Elizabeth required, that both parties ſhould mutually promiſe to aſſiſt each other, in caſe either ſhould be attacked, tho' on account of religion: but Charles ſaid, he could not admit of that clauſe, for fear of offending his ſubjects, and all the Catholic powers. He was however willing to agree, that the article ſhould be expreſſed in more general terms, which ſhould have the ſame meaning, namely, that the two parties ſhould mutually defend each other, if either was attacked on any account whatever. The Engliſh embaſſadors objected, that England feared no attack, but only on account of religion, whereas France had numberleſs quarrels with other ſtates, and therefore the condition would not be equal. To remove this difficulty, Charles offered to write to Elizabeth a letter with his own hand, wherein he would declare, that he underſtood the cauſe of religion to be included in the general clauſe. But the Engliſh not being ſatisfied with this ſecurity, required at leaſt a private article under the great ſeals of France and England. Charles thereupon loudly exclaimed againſt the injury done him, in believing him capable of falſifying his word, and ſaid, he prefered his honor to his life. Walſingham, one of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, was ſo biaſſed in Charles's favor that he thought him a perfectly honeſt man: he even wrote to lord Burleigh, that he did not doubt but the ſecurity was ſufficient. In ſhort, after many debates, Elizabeth was contented with the letter which Charles offered.

p. 169.

Second difficulty. p. 170, 177, 191.

The ſecond difficulty conſiſted in that the King of France would poſitively include Queen Mary in the treaty, whereto Elizabeth would not conſent. She thought it very ſtrange, that the King of France ſhould ſo heartily eſpouſe the Scotiſh Queen's intereſt at ſuch a juncture. Mary was uſing her utmoſt indeavors to dethrone her: the deſign of the league between France and England was for a mutual defenſe againſt the attacks of their enemies, and at the ſame time France eagerly labored to have the Queen of Scots releaſed, that is, inable her to execute her deſigns. Such a procedure was incomprehenſible to Elizabeth, and it gave her many ſuſpicions. However, as ſhe believed the league neceſſary for her ſafety, ſhe overlooked diverſe particulars which juſtly made her diſtruſt his Gallic Majeſty's ſincerity. The ſole expedient could be deviſed to ſurmount this difficulty, was inſerting in the treaty a dubious clauſe to this effect, "That "both parties ſhall maintain the preſent laws of "Scotland." Elizabeth underſtood the preſent and actual government of that kingdom, under the king's authority; and Charles had in view the preceding government, under Mary's adminiſtration, conſidering the preſent as illegal: but withal he intimated, that he deſired the inſerting thoſe terms, which were capable of a double meaning, only to avoid the blame of abandoning the Queen of Scots. Elizabeth imagined it a great advantage, that Mary was not mentioned in the treaty. Theſe two difficulties being removed, the league was ſigned at Blois, the 11th of April being to the following purport, viz.

Articles of the league between France and England. Camden. p. 443.

Charles and Elizabeth ſhall mutually aſſiſt each other againſt all perſons who ſhall attack them under any pretenſe whatſoever.

The league ſhall remain in full force 'till a year after the deceaſe of either party.

The party requeſted ſhall be bound to ſend to the party requiring, a ſuccor of ſix thouſand foot, or of five hundred lances, (which form a body of cavalry fifteen hundred ſtrong) at his option, with eight warlike ſhips, manned with twelve hundred ſoldiers, the whole at the expenſe of the party requiring.

There ſhall be no innovations made in Scotland, but the two contracting powers ſhall indeavor to preſerve the peace of that kingdom, according to the preſent laws, without admiting the approach of any foreign forces.

Mutual embaſſies. Camden. Walſingh. Negociat. p. 206, &c. 214. Stow. Camden.

Some time after, Elizabeth diſpatched over to France the earl of Lincoln, to ſee the treaty ſworn; and marſhal Montmorency came to London on the ſame account. Elizabeth ſwore to the league the ſeventeenth of June, and honored the marſhal with the order of the garter. While Montmorency was at the Engliſh court, he never ceaſed ſtrongly to ſollicit for the inlargement of Queen Mary, to whom this eagerneſs did more hurt than good. On the other hand, Elizabeth ordered the earl of Lincoln to ſhew the King of France the intercepted letter, from the Queen of Scots to the duke of Alva, wherein it appeared that ſhe put herſelf intirely under the protection of his Catholic Majeſty. Montmorency would likewiſe have reſumed the affair of Queen Elizabeth's marriage with the duke of Anjou, but did not much inſiſt thereon: ſeemingly, he had no orders to preſs it very ſtrenuouſly, conſidering what happened in France immediately on his return, I mean, the maſſacre of St. Bartholemew's, wherein were inhumanly butchered admiral Chatillon, and all the Hugonots who had been decoyed to court, under color of the nuptials of the King of Navarre with Princeſs Margaret, King Charles's ſiſter. It is needleſs to expatiate on this horrible maſſacre, ſo univerſally known: it ſuffices in a word to obſerve, it demonſtrated to all who had the uſe of their faculties, that France had then the moſt perfidious court our world ever beheld.

This maſſacre threw all the Proteſtants in Europe into the utmoſt conſternation, eſpecially when they knew it was openly approved at Rome (1). The Proteſtant Princes of Germany began to prepare for their defenſe, believing it was only the introduction of a combination to deſtroy their religion throughout Chriſtendom, and the Swiſſers in a diet reſolved never more to ſupply France with forces. But the Engliſh court reflected on it particularly, not queſtioning its being a conſequence of the Bayona league, and that the ſtorm would ſoon break upon England. Walſingham, who had expreſſed ſuch a ſingular eſteem for Charles IX, wrote letter after letter, to give warning, that he was no longer to be truſted, tho' he ſhould repeat his proteſtations of friendſhip to her Majeſty, and his aſſurances punctually to obſerve the late treaty (2).

Charles IX ſhews great regard for Elizabeth. Walſingh. Negociat.

It was not without reaſon that Charles ſtill deſired to keep fair with Elizabeth. Tho' he had maſſacred infinite numbers of his Hugonot ſubjects, he ſaw the reſt runing to their arms to ſcreen themſelves from his butchery. The city of Rochelle, which was as their bulwark, had refuſed to open her gates to the King's forces. Some were already in arms in Languedoc, and other provinces, and in all appearance Charles was on the point of entering into a new war, wherein he would have to deal with a deſperate people. Apprehenſive as he was that Elizabeth would aid the Hugonots with all her forces, there was no diſſimulation but what he practiſed to divert her from it. When ſhe told him, by her embaſſador, that after the late maſſacre ſhe could no longer repoſe in him any confidence; he indeavored to excuſe himſelf in the beſt manner he could. One while he ſaid, it was done without his knowledge; another while, that he was forced to it, in order to prevent a conſpiracy formed by the admiral againſt him, the Queen his mother, and his brothers. Nevertheleſs, at the very juncture while he expreſſed the greateſt deſire to maintain a good intelligence with Elizabeth, he was taking private meaſures to raiſe her diſturbances both in England and Scotland. After the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew's, the Pope ſent a legate into France. The duke of Savoy, a great friend to Spain, was come to Paris, and Charles's pretended dread of Philip's deſigns was intirely vaniſhed: nay, there was a ſtrict union between the two Kings. On the other ſide, Walſingham gave frequent notice, that the duke of Guiſe held ſecret conferences with the Scots, and the Queen-mother ſent very often for the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's embaſſador, at unſeaſonable hours. All theſe particulars were plain indications to Elizabeth and her council, that the friendſhip of France was not to be relied on, tho' it had been earneſtly ſollicited.

Elizabeth's jealouſy. Ib. p. 259, 265, 268, &c.

Affairs being in this ſituation, Elizabeth could not readily determine what courſe ſhe ſhould take. She ſuſpected ſome dangerous machination was on foot, but could not be certain. On one hand, ſhe was afraid, France and Spain were in league againſt her; but ſhe could not conceive how it was poſſible for them to agree, their intereſts being diametrically oppoſite: nevertheleſs ſhe conſidered that Charles IX ſuffered himſelf to be biaſſed by the Lorrain Princes, whoſe views and his were widely different, and who regarded their own private intereſt more than the welfare of France: beſide, his exceſs of religious zeal might cauſe him to overlook his true intereſt. In this ſtate of uncertainty, ſhe judged it moſt adviſable to ſtand on her guard, and make preparations as if ſhe was to be ſpeedily invaded, and to equal the King of France in diſſimulation, giving him however to underſtand, that ſhe was not to be eaſily laid aſleep; ſo, both playing the hypocrite, never were known ſuch ſtrong and ſo frequent proteſtations of friendſhip between Charles and Elizabeth, as in the firſt months after St. Bartholomew's maſſacre. Both ſaid, they deſired above all things to keep the league inviolably, tho' Charles had no occaſion for Elizabeth's aid, and Elizabeth could no longer depend on the amity of ſuch an ally. There was ſcarce a poſſibility of their having any real love for each other. Charles looked on Elizabeth as the protectreſs of the creed he was laboring to extirpate, and Elizabeth could only conſider him as a Prince without faith or honor, and as a ſworn enemy to the religion ſhe profeſſed. Notwithſtanding all this, Charles offered to renew the league with a freſh oath, and propoſed a marriage between Elizabeth and his youngeſt brother, the duke of Alenſon. In ſhort, to give Elizabeth a ſenſible mark of his pretended friendſhip, he intreated her to ſtand godmother to the Princeſs brought him by his Queen, laſt October. Elizabeth anſwered to the firſt propoſal, that the treaty of Blois not having been violated on her part, ſhe ſaw no manner of neceſſity to renew or confirm it by freſh oaths. As to her marrying the duke of Alenſon, ſhe ſo expreſſed herſelf, that ſhe left it undetermined, whether ſhe would accept or refuſe it. And in anſwer to Charles's requeſting her to be godmother to the Princeſs his daughter, ſhe ſaid that, notwithſtanding her ſubjects, and diverſe foreign Princes diſſuaded her from entering into a ſpiritual alliance with a ſworn enemy of the Proteſtant religion, ſhe was willing however to give him a proof of her deſire to preſerve their mutual friendſhip, as far as ſhe was able. Thus, it was all diſſimulation on both ſides: but I know not whether Elizabeth can be juſtified for not having refuſed this laſt article, in order at leaſt to notify her deteſtation of Charles's late horrible barbarity. Howſoever this be, the whole reſidue of this year paſſed in reciprocal proteſtations of a ſincere amity, but withal, in a mutual diffidence. Charles was apprehenſive Elizabeth would aſſiſt the Hugonots, and thereby all his meaſures be broken. Elizabeth had a mind, before ſhe came to any concluſion, to dive ſomewhat deeper into the deſigns of her adverſaries, and to that purpoſe it was requiſite for her to keep, at leaſt outwardly, ſome correſpondence with King Charles. Mean while, the Hugonots knew not what to think of her. They ſaw themſelves on the brink of deſtruction, conſidering the great power wherewith King Charles was preparing to attack them, and at the ſame time they beheld Elizabeth, who was their ſole refuge, appearing as godmother to the daughter of their perſecutor and butcher: but the Hugonots protection was not the point ſhe had chiefly in view: her zeal for the Proteſtant religion was ever ſubordinate to her own particular intereſt.

The earl of Northumberland beheaded. Stow.

I muſt now touch on the Scotiſh affairs, whereon Elizabeth's eye was conſtantly fixed. The diſcovery of Norfolk's conſpiracy had greatly weakened Mary's faction. Some had abandoned her cauſe, and others were ready to do the like: if they ſtill perſevered, it was only to obtain advantageous terms for ſhifting ſides. Grange, governor of Edinburg caſtle, Lidington, lord Hume, Robert Melvil, and ſome others, who were in the caſtle, ſtill affected a ſort of neutrality, and a fervent zeal for their country's welfare: but they made this welfare to conſiſt in a certain union of the two factions, which ſhould not be any way to the captive Queen's detriment; that is, they would have the King's authority to be annulled; and if it could not be agreed, that the ſtate ſhould be governed in Mary's name, as indeed it was very difficult to gain that point, at leaſt that the adminiſtration of affairs ſhould be put into the hands of a certain number of regents elected by both parties, without any mention of Queen or King: by this means they would have preſerved Queen Mary's rights intire, and fruſtrated all the adverſe faction's meaſures. Very apparently, James Melvil, author of the memoirs, was in the like ſentiment, tho' he deſired to be looked on as neuter, and as ſuch was imployed on both ſides to officiate as mediator. However, thoſe of this party durſt not fully open their minds, but flattered themſelves that, being maſters of Edinburg caſtle, with the help of ever ſo few ſuccors, they ſhould be able to ſupport their pretenſions. They imployed the whole winter of the year 1572 in ſeveral negociations in France and the Netherlands, to obtain the aid they wanted. From both theſe quarters they were put in hope of aſſiſtance; but it was only empty promiſes without the leaſt effect. The French court durſt not pull off the mask, for fear of obſtructing the grand deſign, which was executed within a few months. For that reaſon, they at length conſented that the Queen of Scots ſhould not be mentioned in the treaty of Blois. They were contented to agree with the Engliſh embaſſadors, that the two crowns ſhould ſend plenipotentiaries into Scotland, to adjuſt the differences between the Scots, or compel them to lay down their arms. In effect, Charles IX nominated Du Crocq, who had been frequently in Scotland, to labor this agreement, ordering him to paſs thro' England, and ſtrongly ſollicit Elizabeth to ſend the Scotiſh Queen over to France. He moreover gave him certain inſtructions, which he was to communicate verbally to the captive Queen. Elizabeth thought this proceeding very extraordinary, juſt as the treaty of league was going to be concluded: ſo, ſuſpecting ſome myſtery in this conduct, ſhe flatly refuſed Du Crocq leave to ſee Mary, and even to purſue his journey to Scotland 'till the league was ſigned.

The court of France ſuſpected by Elizabeth with reſpect to Scotland. Walſingh. Negociat. p. 156, 177, 181.

A few days after, ſhe made a diſcovery which greatly increaſed her ſuſpicions. Lord Seaton, a Scot, who ſtiled himſelf Mary's embaſſador to the duke of Alva, had taken a journey to Paris, and there held diverſe conferences with Charles and the Queen-mother. Then he returned to Bruſſels, and not long after ſet out for Scotland: but the ſtormy weather obliging him to land at Harwich, he diſguiſed himſelf like a common ſeaman, and, before it was known who he was, croſſed England, and arrived at Edinburg, where he frequently confered with Grange, and the other chiefs in the caſtle. As he could not take with him his papers, they were found in the ſhip, whereby it was diſcovered that his inſtructions ran to incourage thoſe in Edinburg caſtle to hold out, and give them hopes of a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. It was alſo known, he was commiſſioned ſome time before, by the Scots of Mary's faction, to aſſure the duke of Alva that, with a little aid, it would be eaſy to carry off the young King, and tranſport him to Spain. Finally, Elizabeth had alſo notice, that Grange and his aſſociates, who had commenced a treaty of accommodation with the earl of Mar, would hear no more of it, ſince they had ſeen lord Seaton. All this, added to Du Crocq's inſtances for the Queen of Scots liberty, and for leave to ſpeak with her, induced Elizabeth and her council to conclude that this envoy was not ſent into Scotland to appeaſe the troubles of that kingdom, but rather to foment them. This was the more credible, as he had ſaid himſelf, that his inſtructions reached no farther than to exhort the Scots to peace. Suffering him therefore to confer with Mary, or to purſue his journey into Scotland, would not have been very prudent.

It has been already obſerved, that the court of England was no leſs active than that of France to perpetuate the combuſtions in Scotland; and this was certainly ſo during the earl of Lenox's regency, the Scotiſh Queen's party being then very ſtrong, and it was to be feared the two factions would unite to England's great detriment. But after the duke of Norfolk's death the caſe was altered. Queen Mary's faction being conſiderably debilitated, the council of England thought it time to terminate the commotions of Scotland, by giving ſome content to thoſe in the caſtle of Edinburg, in order to induce them to ſubmit to the King, and ſurrender that important fortreſs. To this end, the earl of Mar, with Elizabeth's conſent, had begun with thoſe of the caſtle a negociation, interrupted by the arrival of lord Seaton.

She takes new meaſures with regard to Scotland. Melvil. p. 115.

The league between France and England being ſoon after concluded, the earl of Mar thought it a favorable opportunity to reſume the negociation with thoſe of the caſtle; and to that purpoſe offered them, by James Melvil, very advantageous conditions. Melvil inſinuates, that the regent's inducement to this accommodation was only to free his country from the Engliſh yoke. He adds farther, that Grange, ſcrupling to demand any terms for reſtoring Scotland's tranquillity, left it to the diſcretion of the regent, who privately ſwore to the peace, in preſenſe of two or three perſons only. But Walſingham's memoirs evidence Melvil not to have been well informed, ſince this agreement was made with Elizabeth's approbation, and even ſome articles were ſigned, whereof ſecretary Smith ſent a copy to Walſingham at Paris.

Negociation of the regent of Scotland with Mary's party. Melvil. p. 117.

This project was defeated by the death of the earl of Mar. He went to Edinburg with deſign to have this private treaty approved, and the earl of Morton was the chief perſon to be prevailed with to ſign it. To this end, he made him a viſit at Dalkieth, where he was honorably received, and treated magnificently: but before the banquet was over, he found himſelf ſeized with a violent illneſs, which ſcarcely ſuffered him to ride to Edinburg, where he died. Many ſuſpected he was poiſoned. However, on the twenty-fourth of November, the earl of Morton was choſen regent, by the intereſt of Elizabeth's friends in Scotland.

Morton elected regent.

Nothing could be more advantageous to Elizabeth, than to ſee the regency of Scotland in the hands of a perſon who depended on her, and whom ſhe could manage in a manner juſt as ſhe pleaſed. But, on the other ſide, the court of France, where the Guiſes then ruled, finding that, by the earl of Morton's promotion, they were on the point of utterly loſing Scotland, reſolved to do their utmoſt to ruin the new regent, and ſupport thoſe who ſtill held the caſtle of Edinburg: and in effect that was their only way to preſerve any ſort of influence on the affairs of that country. The duke of Guiſe, who managed all, plainly foreſaw that the earl of Morton, if left unmoleſted, would not fail, with England's aſſiſtance, abſolutely to cruſh Mary's party, and ſhut out for ever the French from Scotland. He reſolved therefore to ſend thither Verac, with money to ſupply the occaſions of thoſe in the caſtle, under color of laboring to appeaſe the troubles. But Verac not being ſoon enough ready, the money was put into the hands of Grange's brother, who had been ſent into France to ſollicit ſuccors. At the ſame time, great pains were taken to gain the earls of Argyle and Athol; and the duke of Chateleraut was told, if Grange could hold out 'till Whitſuntide, he would be ſtrongly aſſiſted by the Pope, Spain, and France: this was what Walſingham, who had good ſpies at Paris, had frequently writ to the court of England. It was therefore no longer Elizabeth's intereſt to foment diviſions among the Scots: on the contrary, it was requiſite Mary's faction ſhould be deſtroyed, before the meaſures which were taking in France and Flanders could have their effect. We ſhall ſoon find ſhe neglected not her intereſt.

Elizab. An' 1572.

During this whole year, the Scotiſh Queen and her adherents greatly relied on the duke of Alva's aſſiſtance, and yet they had nothing to hope from that quarter. From the begining of the year to the Pariſian maſſacre, the duke had been ſo imployed, that it was not poſſible for him to think ſeriouſly on Queen Mary's concerns, tho' he wanted not inclination to annoy Elizabeth. Count De la Marc, whom (to avoid a rupture with Spain) the Queen had driven from her ports, had ſeized the Briel in Holland, and by that unexpected blow revived the courage of thoſe who wiſhed a deliverance from the Spaniards domination. Not long after, the whole province of Holland threw off their yoke, and Fluſhing, with ſome other towns in Zealand, followed that example. The duke of Medina-Celi, ſent afterwards from Spain with a fleet, was defeated by the confederates, and moſt of his ſhips taken. In a word, while the duke of Alva was buſied in reducing the revolted towns in Holland, the news of Mons being ſurpriſed by count Lewis of Naſſau obliged him to quit Holland in order to attempt the recovery of that city. Mean while, the Prince of Orange entered the Netherlands at the head of a ſtout army raiſed in Germany (1). On the other hand, Charles IX ſent Naſſau five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, commanded by Genlis, which were defeated by the duke of Alva, to whom Charles himſelf had ſent notice of the march of this aid, deſigned only to amuſe the Hugonots. The tragedy, which was preſently after acted in France, having opened the Prince of Orange's eyes, he was forced to diſband his army, finding the King of France, who promiſed to contribute towards its ſupport, would not keep his word. Mean time, the duke of Alva was imployed in the ſiege of Mons, which ſurrendered not 'till the nineteenth of September. After the ſiege, his troops under conduct of Frederico de Toledo his ſon, were buſied in taking Zutphen, Naerden, and other places. Hence it appears that, during the courſe of this year, the duke of Alva was not able to ſend any forces to Scotland, tho' Mary's friends were ſtill building on ſuch ſuccors. Mary's expectation of aſſiſtance from Spain proved greatly to her detriment, becauſe, when her practiſes were diſcovered, Elizabeth became more intent on ending the troubles of Scotland: beſide, the King of France grew ſomewhat cool, when he found Queen Mary threw herſelf into the arms of the Spaniards (2).

Marriage of the duke of Alenſon re-propoſed. Camden. Walſingh.

A little before, Queen Catherine had ſent to Elizabeth count Rais, her confident, to propoſe once more the marriage of the duke of Alenſon, her third ſon: but this was not the ſole motive of his coming. The ſaid count had orders to obſerve what paſſed in England, where count Montgomery, and ſome other French refugees, were equiping a fleet to relieve Rochelle, which, after a long blocade, was at length formally beſieged: the duke of Anjou commanded at the ſiege, having with him the duke of Alenſon, his brother, and all the Catholic nobles of France. Elizabeth anſwered, concerning the propoſal of the marriage, that ſhe was very willing to begin a treaty about it, provided the article of religion was firſt ſettled; elſe it was in vain to ſay any more of it.

Elizabeth's anſwer.

Much about this time, Montgomery ſailing to the relief of Rochelle, the French embaſſador exclaimed againſt his being ſuffered to depart, and alſo that the Engliſh merchants had ſupplied the beſieged with proviſions. Anſwer was made, that thoſe who lately ſailed from the ports of England, were perſons diſowned, and bore counterfeit colors, and, if they could be taken, ſhould be rigorouſly chaſtiſed. As for the merchants, they were men who followed their gain where-ever they hoped to find it; and, not being able to ſend their commodities to any other port of France, ſince the people were left at liberty to butcher whom they pleaſed, it was no wonder they ſhould ſend them to Rochelle, where they could vend them with ſafety. Apparently, the court of England had connived at Montgomery's armament (which however had no effect) and at ſending proviſions to the Rochellers. This was all the aſſiſtance Elizabeth gave the Hugonots in their wretched condition. She had reſolved to avoid a rupture with France; whether ſhe hoped to gain that nation to her intereſt, or make the world believe the union between her and King Charles to be ſtricter than it was in reality. This was doubtleſs to render her enemies, both at home and abroad, leſs eager to form plots againſt her.

Complaints of France about the ſuccors given to Rochelle; Walſingh. Negociat. evaded by the Queen. Camden.

End of the war in Scotland.

We are at length on the point of ſeeing a period put to the troubles of Scotland. Morton, the new regent, having good intelligence of what paſſed at the court of France, and knowing it was reſolved powerfully to aſſiſt the Queen's faction, after the reduction of Rochelle, believed he ought to improve this interval to prevent their deſigns. He propoſed therefore to Grange, by James Melvil, to renew the negociation begun before the earl of Mar's death. Grange and his aſſociates made at firſt ſome ſcruple, becauſe they expected the French ſuccors promiſed them by lord Seaton: however, not to give occaſion to ſay, they were quite averſe to peace, and in order to gain time 'till Whitſuntide, Grange replied, he was willing to accept the ſame terms had been offered by the earl of Mar, provided the Queen's whole party were included in the treaty. The regent, who was better informed than Grange imagined, eaſily judged this anſwer tended only to prolong the negociation by the difficulties in procuring general content. He refuſed therefore to treat with the whole party, and offered to give Grange and his friends all the ſatisfaction they could reaſonably expect; but his offer was rejected. Whereupon he turned to the duke of Chateleraut, and the earls of Huntley and Argyle, who were not ſo ſcrupulous as thoſe of Edinburg caſtle. They treated for themſelves and dependents, that is, for almoſt all the reſt of Mary's party, without regarding the concerns of Grange and his aſſociates. They perceived no farther reliance was to be had on the aſſiſtance of France, which was too remote, and withal very uncertain, conſidering the inteſtine feuds wherewith that realm was afflicted. The treaty which they made with the regent, aſſiſted by Drury and Killegrew, the Engliſh embaſſadors, was to this purport:

ELIZAB. AN' 1573.

That they ſhould ſubmit to the King, and conform to the eſtabliſhed religion: and that whoſoever violated this article ſhould be declared a traitor. Camden. p. 448. Spotſwood.

That the ſentences pronounced againſt the Hamiltons and Gordons ſhould be repealed; excepting however ſuch as concerned the murders of the earls of Murray and Lenox, which ſhould be left to the Queen of England's deciſion.

That the Queen of England ſhould bind herſelf by ſome public inſtrument, that the Hamiltons and Gordons ſhould not be proſecuted for the murder of the earls of Murray and Lenox, without her expreſs conſent.

The ſtates of the realm, meeting ſoon after, did by their authority confirm this agreement.

Grange no ſooner had notice of the agreement which was negociating between the regent and the heads of Mary's faction, but he ſtrove to raiſe obſtacles by offering to ſurrender Edinburg caſtle in ſix months: but as the regent had better intelligence than Grange imagined, it was eaſy for him to perceive this offer tended only to gain time 'till the French ſuccors ſhould arrive (1). At length, when Grange underſtood Mary's chief adherents were on the point of ſigning their treaty, he offered inſtantly to deliver the caſtle, provided he might put it into the hands of the earl of Rothes; but the regent judged it not proper to ſtation in that fortreſs a governor of Grange's nomination: beſide, the whole procedure of thoſe in the caſtle, and the evaſions they uſed to avoid ſurrendering it, ſufficiently manifeſted their little cordiality to have matters accommodated; ſo, without farther ceremony, he proclaimed them traitors, and prepared to beſiege them in good earneſt. Melvil ſays, on this occaſion, that he knows not what rage poſſeſſed the regent, to deſire to gain a place by way of ſiege which was offered to be ſurrendered voluntarily and inſtantly. It is not indeed very probable that the earl of Morton ſhould willingly expoſe himſelf to the difficulties of ſuch a ſiege, could he have obtained the place otherwiſe: but what Melvil aſcribes to the regent's rage, may, with much more likelihood, be imputed to the cavils of thoſe of the caſtle, who ſtrove to prolong the time 'till the promiſed ſuccors ſhould arrive. In Walſingham's negociations are diverſe letters from Queen Elizabeth, lord Burleigh, and ſecretary Smith, blaming Grange and his companions for their fool-hardy preſumption and inſuperable obſtinacy, in attempting alone to maintain the troubles of Scotland. Melvil, Grange's intimate friend, gives quite another turn to this affair, and throws the whole blame on Morton.

applied to the Queen of England. I have already shewn of what consequence it was to the said kingdom that the commotions in Scotland should be ended before France was in a condition to interfere. For this reason, Elizabeth hesitated not to conclude with the regent a treaty wherein, among others, were included the following articles:

Elizabeth's treaty with the regent. Camden.

Elizabeth should send to the regent men, ordnance and ammunition, for besieging Edinburg castle, jointly with the Scots.

No capitulation shall be granted to the besieged, without the regent's and English general's mutual consent.

The castle, if reduced, shall be delivered to the King of Scotland.

On the castle's reduction, all the prisoners there taken shall be detained, to be proceeded against according to law, the Queen of England being therewith first acquainted.

Camden. Stow. Hollingsh.

Pursuant to this treaty, her said Majesty ordered sir William Drury to march into Scotland with fifteen hundred men, and a train of artillery, which was a manifest violation of the Blois treaty, which ran, "That no foreign troops should be suffered to "enter Scotland." But as Elizabeth had, by lord Seaton's papers, discovered that France designed to infringe this very article, she doubtless thought it would be a piece of folly to suffer herself to be anticipated. Howsoever it be, the castle was invested, and the besieged, for a whole month, made a most desperate defense: but their water then failing, they were forced to surrender at discretion, if we may credit the English and Scots of the King's party. Melvil affirms, on the contrary, that they capitulated, but the capitulation was not regarded. Thus much is certain, the laird of Grange, James Kirkcaldie his brother, and some others, were condemned to be hanged, and the sentence was accordingly executed (1). Lidington died in prison, having, as some affirm, poisoned himself. Lord Hume and sir Robert Melvil were released (2). Thus ended the civil wars of Scotland, and here Elizabeth's adversaries lost all hope of invading her from that quarter. From what has been hitherto advanced on this subject, a reader may readily comprehend how highly the Scotish affairs imported Queen Elizabeth. Accordingly, she was ever studiously intent on the transactions of Scotland, where she very successfully managed her interest with the most refined policy.

Verac arrested at Scarborough and sent to London. Walsing. Negociat. p. 334.

Just when Mary's chief partisans were about to sign their treaty, Verac, who was sent into Scotland to incourage the party to stand their ground, was forced by a storm into Scarborough. The president of the northern Marches, having thereof notice, ordered him to be conveyed to London, without giving ear to any of the arguments he alledged against it in pleading his character. It was afterwards known that, the moment he was seized, he burned all his papers. The French embassador was very clamorous, highly exclaiming that Verac was hindered from pursuing his voyage to Scotland: but he was told, that her Majesty had no advice of the sending this embassador, and if she had known it would have taken care he should have been treated with the respect due to his character: that he had been brought to London, by the general order given the president of the north to deal thus by all foreigners who should land in those parts, except they were known to be merchants.

ELIZAB. AN' 1573.

Elizabeth's lofty expressions to the French embassador. Walsingh. Negociat. p. 335.

The embassador was not extremely well satisfied with this answer; but he had still less reason to be so with that he soon after got to his urgent request for leave to have with the Scotish Queen a private conference. This request had been often in vain repeated. At length Elizabeth, tired with his importunities, flatly told him, she was not ignorant of the practises of the King of France and Queen-mother, in favor of Mary, and how they stood affected to England: that nevertheless she had always inviolably observed the late treaty (3), and would still observe it, chusing rather the breach should come from France, than from her: that, in case of a rupture, she questioned not she should be able to defend herself, being well assured of the affection of her subjects: that she could scarcely restrain some who offered to relieve Rochelle at their own expense, and maintain in Gascogne, six months, an army of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse.

On the embassador's demanding leave for Verac to pursue his journey to Scotland, the Queen agreed to it, after some affected delays: but while she was puting obstacles in his way, she caused a letter to be sent from the earl of Morton, telling her, that Verac's coming to Scotland would be very displeasing to him, as well as to the duke of Chateleraut, and the earl of Huntley, with whom he was in perfect friendship: that therefore he believed the envoy would do well to save himself the trouble of that journey. While they were debating at London about this affair, the castle of Edinburg surrendered, and so Verac's journey became intirely needless.

Queen Catherine unwarily discovers herself. Walsingh. Negociat. p. 342.

Queen Catherine di Medicis, politic as she was, could not help making a false step, in discovering to Walsingham, that the French court's design was to foment the troubles of Scotland. On the said embassador's warm complaints of the intrigues of France with respect to Scotland, she protested, that neither the King her son nor herself comprehended his meaning, and that their intention was only to persuade the Scots to agree, and acknowledge Queen Mary for their Sovereign. That is the very point, replied the embassador, the Queen my mistress complains of, since it is a direct breach of the treaty of Blois. Catherine, finding she had said too much, turned the discourse, and complained of Verac's being detained in England. To which Walsingham made the same answer as had been given to La Mothe Fenelon, at London.

Elizabeth in profound tranquillity. Camden. Strada.

Scotland being in peace, under the authority of the young King, and of a regent devoted to England, Elizabeth was freed from great anxieties. The recalling the duke of Alva from his government of the Netherlands was a farther augmentation of her felicity. The commander Requesens, who succeeded De Alva, finding he had full imployment, refused interfering in the affairs of England and Scotland, and so Elizabeth had nothing to apprehend from that quarter. Her enemies had no longer admitance into Scotland, and England being safe from all attacks but by sea, she lived some years in great tranquillity: beside, France was not in condition to make any considerable attempt upon her, as well

(1) Melvil gives Grange a most extraordinary character. He says, he heard Henry II of France say, (pointing to him) "Yonder "is one of the most valiant men of our age." The grand constable of France would never speak to him uncovered. Camden says, a hundred of the family of the Kirkaldies offered to be vassals for ever to the regent, to pay a yearly pension of three thousand marks, and two thousand pounds Scotish in hand, if he would spare his life. He was (says Melvil) gentle and meek, like a lamb in the house, but like a lion in the field. King James, when he came of age, took up his bones, and buried them honorably, restoring his heirs, p. 122, 123.

Mean while Elizabeth, being deſirous alſo to ſecure herſelf from all domeſtic attempts, commanded the biſhop of Roſs, author and promoter of all the machinations formed againſt her, to depart England. He deemed his coming off ſo eaſily a ſingular happineſs; and, retiring to France, continued his practiſes, tho' to very little purpoſe. He there wrote a hiſtory of Scotland, from the earlieſt times to the year 1561. What he ſays of the earl of Murray, towards the cloſe of this performance, treating of the firſt commotions in Scotland, and which Camden has taken care to copy, plainly ſhews what might have been expected from him, had he continued it to the end of the war.

The biſhop of Roſs ſent away. Novemb. Leſley's Negociations. Camden.

Tho' Elizabeth had, in her anſwer to the propoſal concerning her marriage with the duke of Alenſon, inſiſted that the article of religion was firſt to be ſettled, nevertheleſs Catherine di Medicis failed not preſſing her on the ſame topic. She ſaid, the court of France would yield in that point, but ſpecified not how far they deſigned to extend their conceſſions. Moreover, ſhe made the duke of Alenſon, then at the ſiege of Rochelle, to write her ſeveral letters, expreſſing his ardent longing to have the marriage ſucceed. In a word, ſhe was ſo earneſtly ſollicited for permiſſion that the duke might make her a viſit, that ſhe conſented, provided he would not take it amiſs if he was obliged to return without bringing the affair to any concluſion: but the ſiege of Rochelle holding longer than was imagined, prevented his ſaid Highneſs from taking the advantage of this permiſſion.

France preſſes Elizabeth about the marriage. Camden.

This ſiege, which had laſted ſo long, was finally raiſed, on the twenty-fifth of June, after the city had withſtood thirty thouſand cannon ſhot, nine general aſſaults, beſide twenty of leſs moment, and the effects of ſixty mines. The duke of Anjou loſt upwards of twelve thouſand men. The news of his being elected King of Poland, and of the Poliſh embaſſadors being on their way to offer him that crown, afforded him a pretenſe to relinquiſh his enterpriſe, which perhaps would not have ended to his honor; and the raiſing this ſiege brought with it peace to the Hugonots, who were ſcarcely able to ſupport themſelves. Charles IX was jealous of his ſaid brother, whom the Queen-mother loved paſſionately. This created between the King and his mother a diſſenſion which, very ſeemingly, was fatal to King Charles. He thought it long 'till his brother was ſet out for Poland, and the Queen ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe to retard his departure. At length, Charles conceived ſuch ſuſpicion of all theſe delays, that he could not forbear threatening the Queen his mother, who was finally obliged to ſuffer this her beloved ſon to depart, and the King would needs accompany him part of the way: but he could not go ſo far as he deſigned, by reaſon of a diſtemper wherewith he was ſeized, and of which he never recovered. Elizabeth, having intelligence of his Poliſh Majeſty's departure, and of King Charles's indiſpoſition, judged it not convenient to receive the duke of Alenſon's viſit, before ſhe had a fuller knowledge of the royal family of France's affairs. She therefore wrote him a letter, deſiring he would poſtpone his journey, and gave him for reaſon, that the Engliſh would not look with a good eye on a Prince coming from the ſiege of Rochelle, and wearing a ſword tinged with the blood of their brethren.

Queen Elizabeth's letter to the duke of Alenſon not being capable of diſcouraging him, he made freſh inſtances for leave to come into England, to which Elizabeth at length yielded and ſent him a ſafe conduct. But, in the interim, the Queen his mother, ſuſpecting he deſigned to ſupplant the King of Poland, his brother, in caſe King Charles died, ſo ordered it that the King ſet a guard over him as well as the King of Navarre, who was charged with ſuggeſting to him this deſign. However this be, the Queen-mother, perceiving Charles's end approached, thought fit to take this precaution, to ſecure the crown to the King of Poland, who was then abſent. In effect, Charles IX died the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. The manner of his death was ſo extraordinary that it gave occaſion, not only to the Proteſtants but the Catholics themſelves, to conſider it as a ſtroke of divine vengeance for the horrible maſſacre he had ſo inhumanly procured. The blood guſhed out of all the paſſages of his body, and even ſpouted thro' his pores. The Queen-mother ſo well took her meaſures that, prevailing on the expiring Monarch to confer on her the regency of the kingdom, ſhe kept all quiet 'till the arrival of his Poliſh Majeſty, who ſucceeded his brother, by the name of Henry III. As ſoon as Henry III was arrived in France, it was in his council reſolved to make war upon the Hugonots, tho' they had given no occaſion; and preſently after hoſtilities were renewed. Mean while, as Henry apprehended the Queen of England would aſſiſt thoſe whom he deſigned to extirpate, his firſt care was to renew with her the league of Blois, after moving the queſtion to her, whether "the mutual defenſe againſt all men, mentioned in "that league, did include the cauſe of religion?" Elizabeth anſwered, it did, as ſhe could prove by a letter from the late King, which ſhe had by her: adding, if he were attacked on account of religion, and required her aid, in virtue of the treaty, ſhe ſhould be always ready to give it. Indeed, ſhe ran no great risk in making that offer, being fully perſuaded the French King would not uſe Engliſh troops againſt the Hugonots: beſide, by the terms of the league, ſhe was not bound to ſend him any forces, ſince, inſtead of being attacked, he was himſelf the aggreſſor. A Tumult on the borders of Scotland. July. Camden.

England was indifferently quiet during the year 1575. Only a single occurrence happened on the borders of Scotland, where sir John Forster and Carmichel holding a conference, each at the head of a troop of his own nation, quarreled and fought. The English were worsted, sir George Heron lost his life, and Forster, being taken prisoner, was conducted to the earl of Morton, who treated him very courteously, but detained him some time, lest, if he were presently dismissed, he might attempt a revenge. Having finally released him, he made him promise to appear in Scotland at a set day. Elizabeth thought the regent of Scotland's procedure somewhat strange, and at first took this affair very heinously; but Morton found means to appease her, by making all the submissions she required. This year died the duke of Chateleraut (1).

AN' 1576. Death of the earl of Essex in Ireland. Sept. 22. Camden.

The year 1576 affords as little matter for the history of England as did the preceding. We find only that the earl of Essex died in Ireland, and the earl of Leicester privately married the widow, unknown to Queen Elizabeth, tho' he was suspected of having got Essex poisoned. He was still so firmly fixed in the good graces of his royal mistress, who was so biassed in his favor that no man durst tell her his thoughts. It was one of Queen Elizabeth's greatest failings to place her esteem on a person who so little deserved it.

As it is necessary for the sequel of our history to know what passed in England's neighborhood, I cannot well avoid making a brief digression, not so much to inform the reader of matters sufficiently known, as to refresh his memory.

Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada. Camden.

Don Luis de Zuniga Requesens, governor of the Netherlands, died this year. After his decease, the council of state administered alone the Flemish provinces affairs, 'till a new governor should arrive. The council consisted of natives and Spaniards. Soon after, the Spanish militia happened to mutiny, and determined on pillaging Brussels. The magistrates, alarmed at the danger, applied to the council of state, who declared the mutineers rebels, tho' several of the counsellors favored the seditious: and in effect, presently after, the small town Alost was sacked, and the council of state took no care to punish the authors of that outrage, or prevent the like calamities wherewith other towns were menaced. For this reason, certain of the Brabant nobility drew together at Brussels a company of the citizens, and investing the place where the council of state held their sessions, expeled such of the members as were suspected to countenance the mutineers, and placed in their stead persons better affected to their country's welfare. The new council of state, thus composed, joined the confederates, who were now in arms in defense of their liberties, and they entered together into a league to rid themselves of all the Spaniards. Then Hieronymo de Roda, a Spaniard, one of those who were expeled the council, headed the revolters, and sent for the Spanish troops which were in Holland, with whom the Germans joined. This body, grown very considerable, plundered Maestricht and Antwerp, without any possibility of preventing them.

The Prince of Orange, who was in Holland, seeing the affairs of the Netherlands reduced to this point, offered the council of state his troops, his person, and the assistance of the provinces of Holland and Zealand, which began to make a separate state under his government. On this offer, the said council determined on entering into treaty with those two united provinces. The conferences were held at Gaunt, where with unanimous consent, Luxemburg excepted, was formed the alliance of the Netherland provinces, named the Union, or Pacification of Gaunt, for the defense of their laws and liberties. Notwithstanding this, they were still willing to acknowledge his Catholic Majesty's authority, provided he would govern according to their ancient laws. This union being thus formed, the fortresses raised by De Alva, to keep the Netherlands in subjection, were every where demolished. Some time after, the association was sworn by the clergy and nobility, solemnly approved by the council of state, and published at Brussels. Philip II thereby lost in a manner all his authority in the Netherlands, having only the bare title of Sovereign, except he would confine himself to the rights injoyed by his predecessors; which was very far from his intentions.

Affairs of France. Mezerai. Thuanus. P. Daniel.

France injoyed not more tranquillity than the Netherlands. The duke of Alenson had assembled an army against the King, in favor of the Hugonots. On the other hand, the Prince of Condé, with the forces levied by Prince Casimir in Germany, entered France and joined the duke of Alenson. Thus the Hugonots, whom the court had destined to extermination, were in a condition to sell their lives at a dear price, having at their head the King's brother, the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, with a gallant body of troops thirty thousand strong: but the Queen-mother had the address to disconcert all their measures. She sent them offers of peace, and during the negociation found means to sow jealousies among them, and win from them the duke of Alenson and Prince Casimir. Finally, she ingaged them to agree to a pacification which, for all its seeming advantages, proved fatal to them, as it disunited their forces. This treaty was concluded the ninth of May, and six months after registered by the parliament of Paris. The Hugonots had never obtained a peace so advantageous since the troubles commenced. In October, the duke of Alenson came to court, where the Queen his mother absolutely disingaged him from the Hugonots party. He then assumed the title of duke of Anjou, borne by the King his brother before his accession to the Gallic throne.

No sooner was the peace signed than, answerably to the sincerity for some time since practised by the French court, they took new measures to extirpate the Hugonots. Treaties and oaths went then for nothing, and were considered only as legal snares to intrap heretics. Cardinal Este, the Pope's legate, and Don Juan of Austria, who was going governor-general of the Netherlands, arrived at the court of France, and had on this subject diverse conferences with the King, the Queen-mother, and the duke of Guise. Guise was looked on as head of the Catholic party, and therefore his eminence the legate did with him concert measures whereof King Henry had very little knowledge. The method by them judged propereſt to attain their end, was to unite several societies, made in diverse provinces by the zealous Catholics, and form one general association against the ancient creed's adversaries. This is what was named the Holy Union, or simply, the League. Humieres was the first who signed it in Picardy, from whence it afterwards spread throughout the Kingdom. Of

The Queen-mother moſt readily acceded, not thro' any religious zeal, but becauſe the Hugonots had threatened calling her to account for her adminiſtration during her regency. In fine, the King himſelf, ſeduced by ill counſels and his own ſupine indolence, was hurried away with the torrent, ſuffering the increaſe of that evil which was one day to prove is deſtruction.

The late pacification being negociated, the Hugonots earneſtly ſollicited a general meeting of the ſtates, imagining, beſide many deputies of their own perſuaſion, they ſhould have for them the duke of Alenſon's party, and abundance more who were diſſatisfied with the government. But when the deputies came to be elected, the duke of Alenſon had already ſhifted ſides; moreover the court, by intrigues and liberalities, found means to get choſen a great number of deputies who were the Hugonots enemies: ſo the ſtates, aſſembling at Blois, inſtead of making any motions in favor of the Reformed religion, were juſt ready to intreat his Majeſty's confirmation of the league, and his appointing the duke of Guiſe for head; but King Henry, now grown extremely jealous of Guiſe, reſolved to parry that blow. To that end, he declared himſelf head of the league, and ſigning it firſt with his own hand, cauſed all his court grandees to ſubſcribe, and ſent it into the provinces that all others might do the like. Soon after, the ſtates having ſent to requeſt him, that he would not allow in his kingdom any religion but the Catholic, he anſwered; it was his intention; and if he was under a neceſſity of promiſing the contrary, even with oaths, he would keep thoſe promiſes and oaths only 'till he had forces ſufficient to inable him to retract. Thus the Hugonots were conſtrained to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of their blood, without the leaſt hope of ſeeing any end to their calamities by a treaty, ſince the King himſelf declared he would never make any with them but only to deceive them.

AN' 1577. Affairs of the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada. Camden. p. 458.

Don Juan of Auſtria, early in the year 1577, entered the Netherlands, full of vaſt projects. He was a Prince of great genius, and of ambition ſuitable to his birth. The condition of a ſubject was a burden of which he would gladly have been eaſed. All his views tended to ſovereignty. His firſt ſcheme was to make himſelf King of Tunis. That failing, he thought of marrying the Queen of Scots, and becoming Sovereign of all Great-Britain. Camden affirms, he had this from the mouth of Antonio Perez, who told him moreover, that the project was imparted to and approved by Pope Gregory XIII, but was concealed from King Philip: ſeemingly, this was the ſubject of Don Juan's conferences at Paris with the duke of Guiſe. Thus Don Juan, when he arrived in the Netherlands, had in his head two grand deſigns: firſt, abſolutely to ſubdue thoſe provinces: ſecondly, to poſſeſs himſelf of England and Scotland. Elizabeth was not ignorant of the firſt; but to the ſecond ſhe was yet a ſtranger.

Grotius. Strada.

The pacification of Gaunt was communicated to the Spaniſh court, and Philip, giving way to the times, thought proper by his edict to confirm it: ſo, when Don Juan of Auſtria came to the Netherlands, he was forced to ſign it before he was owned for governor. This was followed by a general aſſembly held at Marche en Famine, where it was reſolved to publiſh what they termed a Perpetual Edict, for expeling from their country all the Spaniſh troops, purſuant to the Gaunt treaty. Philip approving alſo this edict, the Spaniards were tranſported into Italy, all fortreſſes remaining in poſſeſſion of the ſtates. Hitherto Don Juan had been forced to diſſemble: but, ſome time after, he took off the maſk and ſurpriſed the caſtle of Namur. At the ſame time, he ſollicited the German troops, who were waiting for their arrears, to ſurrender the places where they were in gariſon: but he was prevented by the ſtates, who found means to gain thoſe troops before him. The ſtates imputed this rupture to Don Juan's ambition, and carried their complaints to the King, to whom Don Juan alſo wrote, that the cabals of the Prince of Orange had conſtrained him to provide for his own ſafety. Howſoever this be, the ſtates of Brabant called the Prince of Orange to their relief, and gave him the ſuperintendency of their country, by confering on him the title of Ruart (1). This procedure raiſed a jealouſy in the duke of Arſcot, and ſome other Brabant grandees, who, to ruin the Prince of Orange's credit, propoſed to the united provinces the electing a governor-general, under color they ſhould all have the ſame head. The Prince of Orange perceived he was aimed at, but, not to give occaſion to a fatal diviſion of the confederates forces, oppoſed not the election. The choice fell on Archduke Matthias, the Emperor Rodolphus II's brother, and the Prince of Orange was declared his lieutenant. However in the Archduke's patent were inſerted certain conditions which left the whole authority to the ſtates, but gave Matthias the title and honors of governor. This done, Matthias ſtealing away, as was pretended, from his brother the Emperor's court, repaired to the Netherlands, where he was put in poſſeſſion of his dignity. Then the ſtates proclaimed war againſt Don Juan, who had taken care to be prepared, by ſending to Italy for troops, which were already on their way.

The ſtates declare war againſt Don Juan.

Then, and not before, Elizabeth perceived ſhe muſt turn her eyes towards what paſſed in the Netherlands, becauſe, at the ſame time, the Prince of Orange informed her of Don Juan's deſign to marry the Queen of Scots, and the ſtates ſent embaſſadors to requeſt her aſſiſtance. So, finding that Prince's views to be more extenſive than ſhe imagined, ſhe immediately gratified the ſtates deſire, by lending them a hundred thouſand pounds ſterling (2). Camden ſpeaks here of a treaty whereby her Majeſty ingaged to aſſiſt the ſtates with a thouſand horſe well-mounted *, on condition the commander † of the ſaid ſuccors ſhould be admited into the council of ſtate, and nothing determined without his concurrence. But Grotius mentions not ſuch treaty in his annals of the Netherlands. He ſays only, from that time Elizabeth ſo far concerned herſelf with the united provinces affairs, that ſhe ſuffered not the ſtates to come to any important reſolution without giving her notice. In effect, it was highly her intereſt ſo to order it, that the war, now begining in the Netherlands, ſhould be continued in ſuch a manner as to diſable Don Juan of Auſtria from executing his projects upon England. Nor were theſe projects a mere chimerical invention of the Prince of Orange, to ingage Elizabeth in the Famiano Strada makes thereof poſitive mention in his hiſtory: he even ſays, Gregory XIII ſent a nuncio to Don Juan with fifty thouſand crowns, to be imployed in the projected expedition upon England, but that he was forced to uſe it in his war againſt the ſtates. Mean while, at the very juncture when Elizabeth lent money to Philip II's enemies, ſhe wrote to him, That ſhe deſigned not any way to violate the ancient alliance between England and the houſe of Burgundy: that, on the contrary, ſhe ſupplied the confederates with money, only to ſecure theſe provinces to him, and hinder them from deſperately throwing themſelves into the arms of France. Very probably, Philip was not abundantly ſatisfied with theſe reaſons, but feigned to be ſo, not to induce Elizabeth to do more.

At this time the affairs of France were in a moſt deplorable ſituation. The ſtates procedure at Blois could not but raiſe a civil war in the kingdom. The Hugonots, finding their deſtruction reſolved on, made a counter-league, whereof the King of Navarre was declared general, and the Prince of Condé appointed for his lieutenant. The former edict of pacification being revoked, as had been determined by the ſtates, hoſtilities were renewed on both ſides, but with great diſadvantage to the Hugonots, who found themſelves much infeebled: however, as this war too highly increaſed the credit of Guiſe, of whoſe power King Henry was exceſſively jealous, his ſaid Gallic Majeſty judged it his intereſt to grant a peace to the Hugonots. Thenceforward this Monarch plunged himſelf into ſenſualities, and ſuch extravagant profuſeneſs that he forfeited the love and eſteem of his ſubjects. The Lorrain Prince well knew how to improve the advantages the King's conduct procured him, as will in the ſequel plainly appear.

The Pope and King Philip's deſigns upon Ireland. Camden. Walſingh. Negociat. p. 58—93. Strype's Ann. Vol. II. p. 8—10.

While Elizabeth aided the Netherland confederates, under color of preventing their applying to France, Philip retaliated this courteſy by attempting to raiſe a rebellion in Ireland. This project was formed ſome time before, in favor of his Holineſs, Gregory XIII, who wanted to procure for his ſon, Giacomo Buoncompagno, the crown of that iſland. Of this ſcheme Thomas Stukely, a fugitive Engliſhman, was the original author, and Philip II undertook to ſupply whatever was requiſite towards its accompliſhment. In the year 1570, Stukely repaired to Pius V, and perſuaded him, it would be very eaſy to burn the Engliſh fleet, and then conquer Ireland; and to that purpoſe he deſired the command of a few ſhips, and three thouſand Italians. The ſaid project, which could not then be executed, was reſumed under the Pontificate of Gregory XIII, who was allured with the hope of procuring the crown of Ireland for his above-named baſtard. As Stukely knew that, beſide the royal navy, Elizabeth could, in caſes of neceſſity, equip a good number of other ſhips, he propoſed the freighting of as many Engliſh veſſels as poſſible, by Flemings, French, Spaniards, Italians, &c. and the ſending them ſome long voyage: that effected, he was to attack the navy-royal, which was then very weak, and try to burn the ſhips in the ſeveral harbors. Next he propoſed to make a deſcent in Ireland, where he queſtioned not being joined by the native Iriſh; and after expulſing the Engliſh, he was to get his Sanctity's ſaid ſon proclaimed King. There is no great appearance of King Philip's much depending on the ſucceſs of this enterpriſe; but he doubtleſs hoped to cauſe a diverſion which ſhould hinder Elizabeth from aſſiſting the revolted Netherlanders, or at leaſt convince her, that ſhe ought to be more cautious of offending him. However this be, the Pontif, having confered on Stukely ſeveral honorable titles (1), taken from the kingdom of Ireland as if he had been in poſſeſſion, furniſhed him with ſome ſhips, and eight hundred Italian ſoldiers, maintained by his Catholic Majeſty. Stukely ſailed from Cività Vecchia, and ſafely arrived at Liſbon, with intent to purſue his voyage and undertaking. But Don Sebaſtian, King of Portugal, being then paſſing into Africa, to war upon the Moors, perſuaded Stukely to accompany him in his expedition, and obtained King Philip's permiſſion. Not long after, they both periſhed in the moſt memorable battle of Alcazar (2), and Philip relinquiſhed the project of conquering Ireland for that of ſecuring the crown of Portugal on the demiſe of old cardinal Don Enrique, who ſucceeded Don Sebaſtian.

Continuation of the Netherlandiſh affairs. Camden. Grotius. Strada.

The war commencing in the Flemiſh provinces, ſeveral companies of volunteers in England were raiſed, who went to ſerve the ſtates, with Queen Elizabeth's conſent, or at leaſt connivance. On the other hand, part of the Spaniſh troops, diſmiſſed on Don Juan of Auſtria's arrival, were now returned to the Netherlands, and Alexander Farneſe, ſon of Octaviano, had brought Don Juan a ſtout band of Italians. With theſe forces, Don Juan gained, at Gemblours, a ſignal victory over the ſtates army, which was followed by the reduction of diverſe places. Some time after, King Philip offered peace to the ſtates; but, as it was on conditions widely different from the Gaunt pacification, and as he talked not of recalling Don Juan of Auſtria, his offer was rejected.

Diſſenſions in the Netherlands. Grotius. Strada. Thuanus.

The ſtates affairs were nevertheleſs in a very indifferent poſture. The jealouſies among their grandees, and the diverſity of religions, bred very dangerous troubles in this new-born republic. The duke of Anjou and Prince Caſimir equally offered their aſſiſtance to the ſtates, who knew not which way to turn: but at this very juncture there occurred a lucky and very unexpected accident. The city of Amſterdam which thitherto had been for the King, determined on joining the confederates, and thereby conſiderably ſtrengthened their party. On the other hand, what paſſed ſoon after, in the ſame city, greatly increaſed the ſuſpicion and diſtruſt of the Catholics. Thoſe who had been baniſhed, on account of religion, being recalled, found means to expel the magiſtrates, and put that city's government into the hands of the Reformed. The like was done at Haerlem, Utrecht, and other places; and this gave the Catholics reaſon to ſuſpect that, under color of maintaining the cauſe of liberty, there was a deſign to aboliſh the ancient religion, contrary to the pacification of Gaunt: and therefore, to prevent the execution of this project, the Catholics propoſed to give the government of the ſtate to the duke of Anjou, a Prince attached to his religion, and over whom they hoped the Prince of Orange would not have the ſame influence as over Matthias. The Prince of Orange not thinking proper to oppoſe this motion, for fear of confirming the Catholics ſuſpicions, the duke of Anjou was by the ſtates declared "Protector of the Bel-" gic liberties."

The duke of Anjou is choſen protector of the Belgic liberties.

The diviſions continue.

Mean while, the Reformed, fearing the duke of Anjou's arrival would produce ſome change prejudicial to their religion, preſented to the ſtates a petition, deſiring to be admited to the exerciſe of

This requeſt was granted, on condition the Catholics ſhould injoy the ſame privilege in Holland and Zealand; but theſe two provinces, without directly oppoſing this reſolution, found means however to evade the annexed condition. Thence aroſe great diviſions among the confederates. The Catholics would yield nothing in the provinces where they were maſters, ſince Holland and Zealand did not perform what was ordained, and the Reformed would forcibly ſeize what had by the ſtates been granted.

Thoſe of Gaunt augment the diſſenſion. Strada.

While theſe diſputes ſenſibly prejudiced the union of the confederate provinces, it fell out that the inhabitants of Gaunt expeled all the Romiſh prieſts from their city, and, without obeying the Archduke and Prince of Orange, who commanded their being recalled, prepared for their defenſe, in caſe any attempt ſhould be made to compel them to ſubmit. On the other hand, thoſe of Artois and Haynault refuſed to ſuffer the Reformed in their territories, and even pretended, that the Gauntois ought by force to be reduced to their duty. But the Prince of Orange ſtoutly oppoſed all violent methods, by reaſon of the manifeſt danger of turning againſt themſelves the arms of the confederates, at a juncture when Don Juan of Auſtria was preparing to do his utmoſt to deſtroy them: and in effect, ſoon after, he attempted to force the ſtates army, which was ſtrongly intrenched; but was vigorouſly repulſed. This attempt failing contrary to his expectation, he made freſh offers of peace, to amuſe the ſtates 'till the arrival of a conſiderable body of troops, which were on their march. For the ſame reaſon, the ſtates readily entered into treaty to gain time, becauſe they expected Prince Caſimir with an army, and the duke of Anjou, who was now on the borders of Haynault with eight thouſand men. Don Juan's ſuccors coming firſt, he broke off the negociation, and renewed the hoſtilities, being at the head of thirty thouſand foot, and ſixteen thouſand horſe. Prince Caſimir arriving alſo preſently after, the army of the ſtates was ſixty thouſand ſtrong, while the duke of Anjou took the ſmall town of Binck in Haynault. Caſimir's army was chiefly paid by Queen Elizabeth, whoſe intereſt it was to hinder Don Juan from growing too powerful in the Netherlands, tho', feigning to be ignorant of his deſigns, ſhe found other pretenſes to juſtify her aſſiſting the ſtates.

Camden. Thuanus.

The diviſions between Gaunt, and the provinces of Artois and Haynault, rendered ineffectual the ſtates grand armament. Some of their troops, complaining they were not duly paid, quited the army, and ſeized Menin. Soon after, colonel Montigny followed their example with his whole regiment, and headed all the deſerters: after that, he joined the troops of Artois, and made inroads into the province of Flanders. Then thoſe of Gaunt, ſeeing their neighbors ſo powerful, and able to give them law, called Prince Caſimir to their relief, and promiſed to pay his troops. The Prince accepted their offer, and coming to Gaunt the duke of Anjou refuſed to join the ſtates army, except Prince Caſimir would return with his Germans; and, as he could not prevail, he retired to France, leaving his troops free to join thoſe of Montigny. Thus theſe two Princes, who came into the Netherlands purpoſely to aid the confederate provinces, ſerved only to ruin their affairs, by fomenting diſcord among the inhabitants. Some time after, Caſimir paſſed into England, probably to vindicate his conduct to Elizabeth, who had

Death of Don Juan of Auſtria. Grotius. Camden. Strada.

Don Juan of Auſtria had not time to improve the troubles raiſed in the Netherlands, being prevented by death, the firſt of October. There had been a conſpiracy againſt him, for which two Engliſhmen, namely, Ratcliffe (1) and Grey, were executed. But he could not eſcape the poiſon which, if we may credit certain writers, was given him by order of the King his brother. On his deceaſe, the Prince of Parma aſſumed command of the army 'till farther orders from the court of Spain. His principal care was to cheriſh the diſſenſion among the Flemings, and the inhabitants of Haynault and Artois, wherein he ſucceeded to his deſire.

The duke of Anjou preſſes his marriage with Elizabeth. Camden. Thuanus.

While the duke of Anjou was in the Netherlands, he ſent into England a gentleman, named Bacqueville, to renew the treaty of his marriage with Queen Elizabeth. The King of France alſo ſent thither Rambouillet on the ſame errand, being very deſirous to get rid of a brother who gave him great uneaſineſs thro' his levity, which ſuffered him to be directed by perſons who had not always his intereſt in view. Her Majeſty received theſe envoys ſo very graciouſly, that it was univerſally preſumed ſhe really intended to marry. It is no eaſy matter to decide whether, being then forty-five years old, ſhe ſeriouſly thought of eſpouſing the duke of Anjou who was only twenty, or, taking a ſort of pride in being courted, deſigned merely to amuſe this youthful Prince. For my part, I really take it to be a pure effect of her policy, that her adverſaries, on the rumor of her going to marry the duke of Anjou, might be leſs eager to purſue the projects they had formed againſt her: I mean the private deſigns upon her life, ſince there was not then any likelihood of her being openly attacked, nor conſequently any urgent reaſon for determining her to marry. She had nothing to fear from Scotland. France was not then in a condition to make any conſiderable attempt upon England. The King of Spain was wholly intent on procuring the crown of Portugal. Finally, the ſituation of the Netherland affairs permited not Don Juan of Auſtria to execute his vaſt projects. Thus, in all appearance, Queen Elizabeth on this occaſion acted ſolely thro' policy. But before I recite the event of this negociation, it will be requiſite to give a general knowledge of what was tranſacted in Scotland during the year 1578.

Elizabeth, whoſe intereſt it was to preſerve peace in Scotland, under the adminiſtration of a perſon on whom ſhe could depend, was apprehenſive leſt at length the regent's ill conduct would deprive her of that advantage. Wherefore ſhe diſpatched Randolph into Scotland, under color of congratulating the King, who was then between eleven and twelve years old, on the progreſs he was making in his ſtudies: but this embaſſador's chief buſineſs was to inſtill into the earl of Morton ſomewhat more moderation, and perſuade him to live in a good underſtanding with the earls of Argyle and Athol, and ſome other nobles, who, being diſſatisfied, might in the end raiſe troubles in the kingdom. how to improve it, was himself the sole cause of his ruin.

Melvil,p.125.

The King had for governor Alexander Erskin, son or brother of the late earl of Mar, and four preceptors, one of whom was George Buchanan. The earl of Morton having imprudently disobliged these men, they found means to irritate the young King against him. This was not very difficult, considering the King's age, the continual access they had to him, and the frequent occasions the regent gave them to take notice of his ill management. When they had prepared young James in a manner to their wish, they sent for the earls of Argyle and Athol, who had already privately taken measures to execute their purpose. These two peers easily enough persuaded the King to lay aside this troublesome regent, and assume to himself the reins of government (1), promising therein to assist him. This was done so suddenly, that the earl of Morton, who suspected nothing, was not able to prevent it. The general states meeting at the same time, confirmed by their authority what the King had done, and appointed a council of twelve peers, among whom was the earl of Morton: but the said earl, instead of taking his place in the council, feigned to be quite weary of the court, and retired to his own house, where he seemed wholly imployed in cultivating his garden.

Melvil,p.126.

The young King having taken the government into his hand, sent thereof immediate notice to Queen Elizabeth, demanding withal the lands of the late earl of Lenox, his grandfather, and the renewal of the alliance between England and Scotland. It was not Elizabeth's and her council's method to be guided by motives of generosity, but rather to use artifice, in order to reap all possible benefit from every occurrence. Nothing could be more equitable than the Scotish King's demand. The countess of Lenox his grandmother, who lately died in England, had, during her life, injoyed the estate assigned her by Henry VIII, her uncle, when she married the earl of Lenox. He gave also certain lands to the earl her husband, to support the honor of being married to a Princess of the blood-royal. Who could therefore be their more legitimate heir than the King of Scotland, their grandson? The council of England pretended the inheritance might be claimed by Arabella, daughter of Charles Stuart, younger brother to the late earl of Lenox, under color that she was born in the kingdom; tho' in England the Princes of the royal family are not to be considered as foreigners, in what place soever they are born. Not that Elizabeth designed absolutely to debar the Scotish King from his inheritance, but desired to hold him in submission, by giving him to understand that the same reason might be used to deprive him of his right to succeed to the crown of England, and that he wanted her to surmount the difficulties which might occur. For this reason, she ordered the rents of those lands to be sequestered by lord Burleigh. As to the renewing the alliance between the two crowns, she appointed commissioners to treat of that affair with the Scotish embassadors. These commissioners required the embassadors, to make propositions answerable to the gratitude due from the King their master to her Majesty, for placing and supporting him on the throne, at the expense of her treasure, and the blood of her subjects. The embassadors replied, they had only power to renew the alliance between the two crowns, with one additional article for defense of the Protestant religion, received in Scotland since the last treaty. The English, desiring to make this alliance to be considered as highly advantageous to the King of Scotland, proposed that, in return for the favors King James had received, and daily did receive, from their royal mistress, and for the advantages this league was to procure to Scotland, he should promise not to make any alliance with other Princes or states, nor to marry without the Queen of England's concurrence. But the embassadors absolutely rejected this proposition.

Mean while, the earl of Morton, who had correspondents in Sterling, where the King resided, appearing one night at the town-gate with a band of armed men, it was opened to him, and he entered without opposition: he then went directly to the palace, possessed himself of the King's person, and, expeling all those of the adverse party, resumed the office and dignity which he had been constrained to relinquish. The earl of Athol, who had been made chancellor, died soon after, not without suspicion of poison. We must now return to the affairs of England.

AN' 1579.

Prince Casimir left not the court of England 'till about mid-February. He had been honored and caressed very extraordinarily, the Queen having given to understand she would be pleased if that Prince's stay in England was rendered as agreeable as possible. Before his departure, she confered on him the order of St. George, and herself buckled on his garter. It was not without views that she so caressed, and supplied with monies this Palatine Prince. He had still a considerable body of troops ready to assist the Protestants. In her then situation, nothing was more deserving of her care than to prevent the Protestants of France and the Netherlands from being ruined, since on their preservation depended her safety. Casimir was her instrument to continue in the Flemish provinces troubles which procured her the injoyment of quiet slumbers. When he arrived there, he found his cavalry had all accepted the duke of Parma's pass for their safe return into Germany, because, wanting their pay, they would no longer continue either in the service or country.

Simié, the French envoy, promotes the duke of Anjou's affairs. Camden. Thuanus.

At this very juncture, Elizabeth was also busied in another affair which required her whole attention: I mean, the negociation of her marriage with the duke of Anjou. Beside Rambouillet and Bacqueville, who had been in England some time on that account, his Gallic Majesty had likewise dispatched away thither Simié, a man of capacity, and extremely fit for the purpose. The Queen of England possessed a bountiful portion of wit and sense, and had a perfect knowledge of her own interests; but was not exempt from the passions and failings incident to her sex. Simié, having soon dived into her disposition, lost not his time in soliciting the duke of Anjou's suit by reasons of state and polities; she was in all those matters a greater proficient than himself: but he so well knew the propereſt method to win her heart, that he gained her ear more than the duke of Anjou himself could have done. All were surprised at the great change they saw in her, and at the progress the duke of Anjou had made by Simié's mediation; nay, it was even presumed that he had used philters or other such impious arts, so unaccountable was his address to render himself agreeable; if himself was not all the while her Majesty's dupe. He, above all, took great care to ruin the earl of Leicester, not having the same reasons as the English courtiers to manage that favorite. It was he who disclosed to the Queen Leicester's clandestine marriage with the earl of Essex's widow, and this discovery gave her such emotions that she was on the point of sending him

Leiceſter ſtormed to ſee himſelf thus braved by a foreigner; it is even affirmed, that he bribed one of the guards to aſſaſſinate him: at leaſt it is certain that her Majeſty, apprehenſive the French envoys might receive ſome inſult, took them under her eſpecial protection, and by proclamation commanded that none ſhould preſume to offer them any affront. Soon after, as the Queen was in her barge on the Thames, with the three French envoys, a piſtol-ſhot from a boat, wounded one of her barge-men. The man who fired it was inſtantly ſeized, and menaced with the rack; but he cleared himſelf ſo ingenuouſly, that the Queen was perſuaded of his innocence. She took occaſion from her pardoning this man, to diſplay the affection ſhe had for her ſubjects, ſaying, "She could believe no-"thing of her people, which a parent could not "believe of his own children."

Not long after this accident, the duke of Anjou came incog' to England with only two ſervants. He went to court, without being known, and after ſome private diſcourſe with her Majeſty, returned to France. Two months after, the Queen ordered ſome of her moſt truſty privy-counſellors to examine together the advantages and miſchiefs which might ariſe from her marriage with the duke of Anjou, and bring in their report (2).

AN' 1579.

While Elizabeth was intent on gaining the King of France's friendſhip, the duke of Guiſe was framing a ſcheme which might one day create her great diſturbances. As England could be conveniently invaded only from Scotland, Guiſe, who had not relinquiſhed the project formed by the late duke his father and the cardinal his uncle, was deviſing means to accompliſh it, by ſeting at variance Elizabeth and the King of Scotland. He for that purpoſe made uſe of Eſme Stuart, Baron d' Aubigny, who came to Scotland under color of paying his reſpects to the King, as his near relation. He was ſon of John Stuart, younger brother of Matthew earl of Lenox, the young King's paternal grandfather. This baron, who was ſettled in France, where his family held the lordſhip of Aubigny, being come to the King, ſo artfully inſinuated himſelf into his good graces, that he ſoon became a great favorite. There was alſo, about the ſame time, another nobleman, deſcended from a branch of the Stuart family diſtinguiſhed by the name of Oghiltry, who was greatly in King James's favor. Theſe two favorites joined together to ruin the earl of Morton, as well for their own intereſt-ſake, as becauſe it was neceſſary, in order to execute the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, to be rid of a perſon too firmly attached to the intereſt of England. To compaſs their ends, they perſuaded the King to take a progreſs into ſome of his counties, well knowing the regent had imployment which would not admit his attendance. Morton, no way diſtruſting theſe youths, who ſeemed only to mind trifles, oppoſed not this progreſs; during which, however, the two favorites inſtilled into King James the utmoſt averſion to the regent, and a ſtrong deſire to be freed from him. We ſhall ſee preſently the effects of this averſion: but it is firſt requiſite we briefly recite what had paſſed in the Netherlands (3).

The ſtates army being conſiderably weakened by the Germans retreat, the Prince of Parma beſieged Maeſtricht, while plenipotentiaries on both ſides were treating a peace at Cologn: but this negociation ſerved only to increaſe the diſunion among the confederates. From that time diverſe of the nobles left them. Montigny repaired to the Prince of Parma's army with the forces under his command. Artois and Haynault made a ſeparate treaty, and ſome other provinces returned to the Catholic King's obedience. The Prince of Orange, ſeeing this defection, ſpared not his indeavors to unite ſtill more ſtrictly the provinces which perſiſted in the reſolution to throw off King Philip's yoke. He finally ſucceeded, and cauſed the famous union of Utrecht to be ſigned, between Holland, Zealand, Friſeland and Utrecht, the articles whereof are to be ſeen in the hiſtories of thoſe countries. Gaunt and Ypres acceded afterwards to this union, and the Prince of Orange was nominated governor-general of Flanders. Mean while, the Prince of Parma took Maeſtricht, after which he diſbanded moſt of the Spaniſh and Italian troops, according to his promiſe. The city of London increaſing exceſſively, to the detriment of other towns, Elizabeth judged it neceſſary to remedy this inconveniency. She therefore, early in the year 1580, iſſued a proclamation, prohibiting any new buildings within three miles of the city-gates, on pain of impriſonment, and forfeiture of the materials (4). It would have redounded greatly to England's advantage, had this prohibition been punctually executed even to this day, ſince the city is now ſpread to ſuch a degree that it is grown a monſtrous head to a moderate-ſized body, to which it bears no manner of proportion.

But there was a ſtill more preſſing evil, which it was no leſs neceſſary to remedy: I mean, preventing the Engliſh ſeminaries in foreign countries from ſending Popiſh eccleſiaſtics to preach up in England ſedition and rebellion, under color of adminiſtering the ſacraments to Papiſts. The prieſts expeled England in the begining of this reign, had ſet up a college at Douay * by means of William Allen, a native of Oxford, afterwards cardinal. During the duke of Alva's government in the Netherlands, all the projects, formerly obſerved to have been ſet on foot in favor of the Scotiſh Queen, were formed in this college. But Don Luis de Requeſens having baniſhed all the Engliſh fugitives from thoſe provinces, the members of Douay college retired, ſome to Rome, others to Rheims, where they erected ſeminaries, under protection of his Holineſs and the cardinal of Lorrain, archbiſhop of Rheims. It was theſe two ſeminaries which ſupplied the Catholics in England with prieſts. While the court imagined theſe men only adminiſtred the ſacraments privately to thoſe of the Romiſh perſuaſion, no notice ſeemed to be taken: but it was finally diſcovered that they were indefatigably ſedulous in ſpreading pernicious principles, which might be attended with ill conſequences. They maintained, that the Pope had full power to dethrone Kings, * and, Elizabeth being excommunicated and depoſed by Pius V's bull, her ſubjects were freed from their al-

Four prieſts executed. Stow. Camden.

This prevented not thoſe two ſeminaries from continually ſending into England incendiaries, with whom were joined Robert Parſons and Edmund Campian, Jeſuits, who were the firſt of that order imployed to preach the ſaid dangerous tenets. They had obtained of the Pope a bull, dated the fourteenth of April, 1580, declaring that Pope Pius's bull did for ever bind Elizabeth and the Heretics, but not the Catholics, 'till a favorable opportunity ſhould offer to put it in execution. Theſe two Jeſuits had profeſſed the Proteſtant religion, and even borne offices in the univerſity of Oxford (1). After that, withdrawing from England they returned from time to time, appearing one while like eccleſiaſtics, then again like ſoldiers, or in ſome other diſguiſe, and frequented the Papiſts houſes under pretenſe of inſtructing and comforting them, but in reality, to inſpire them with ſedition and rebellion: nay, they had the aſſurance to challenge the Proteſtant clergy to diſpute in print. All this reaching Elizabeth's ears, ſhe iſſued a proclamation, commanding all thoſe who had any children * beyond ſea, to give in their names in ten days, and call them home within a month, with a prohibition to ſupply them with money after that time. By the ſame proclamation, all perſons were inhibited entertaining or haboring any Jeſuits or Prieſts, ſent from the ſeminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being puniſhed as ſeditious traytors and rebels.

Not long after were diſperſed printed books, intimating that the Pope and King of Spain had combined to conquer England and reſtore the Catholic religion, and exhorting the Engliſh Papiſts to incourage the deſign. Hereupon Elizabeth iſſued a ſecond proclamation, declaring, ſhe was ignorant of the practiſes of her enemies, but by the Almighty's bleſſing, and the help of her loyal ſubjects, ſhe was able to withſtand their attacks, both at home and abroad: that moreover, as the plots which were contriving were not only againſt her perſon, but alſo againſt the whole kingdom, ſhe did not intend to be cruel to the good, by ſparing the bad; and therefore ſuch as for the future would not keep within bounds of their duty, were not to expect any favor.

Deſcent of the Spaniards in Ireland. Camden. Stow.

The Pontif's and Catholic King's menaces were not intirely vain, ſince this very year gave light to a conſpiracy formed againſt Ireland. Arthur Grey, lord-deputy of that iſland, had intelligence that ſeven hundred Spaniards and Italians, ſent by the Pope and Philip II, were landed without oppoſition, under conduct of a certain Italian, named San Joſeppo, and had raiſed a fort they called Del Oro. * The earl of Ormond, who was not far from thoſe quarters, poſting thither with ſome troops, took a few priſoners, who declared, they had brought arms for five or ſix thouſand men, who were to join them, in order to drive from that iſland all the Engliſh. Ormond, not having forces ſufficient to beſiege the fort, contented himſelf with inveſting it, 'till the arrival of the lord-deputy, then on his march to join him. Soon after, the fort was beſieged in form, and on the fifth day forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. This good ſucceſs was ſullied by the cruelty of the Engliſh, who, under pretenſe of the great difficulty of guarding ſo many priſoners, cut in pieces the Spaniards, and hanged all the Iriſh.

This year was memorable for the return of Francis Drake from his voyage round the world. He had navigated in America, on the north and ſouth ſeas, and amaſſed a prodigious quantity of gold and ſilver taken from the Spaniards. At his return, which was in November, the Queen knighted him, and was pleaſed to dine in the ſhip which had made ſo great a voyage. After that, ſhe ordered it to be drawn aſhore near Deptford, and certain inſcriptions to be ſet up in memory of this notable navigation (2).

He required that he ſhould be chaſtiſed for his depredations, and daring to ſail in the ſeas which were under the King of Spain's dominion, and that all the treaſure plundered upon the Spaniards might be reſtored. He was told, that the Indian ocean was common to all the nations of Europe, and that the Engliſh no way allowed either the property aſſumed by the King of Spain, or the pretended donation of the Romiſh biſhop, who had no right to diſpoſe of countries and ſeas which belonged not to him: that Drake ſhould be always ready to anſwer in law whenever he ſhould be attacked, and, to prevent that captain's converting the gold and ſilver to his own uſe, her Majeſty had ordered all the effects he had brought home to be ſequeſtered, with deſign to give his Catholic Majeſty ſatisfaction, if he could prove the ſame rightfully appertaining to him or his ſubjects, tho' the charges ſhe had been at in defending Ireland againſt the Spaniards attacks, amounted to a far greater ſum. The affairs of Scotland began to give Elizabeth ſome uneaſineſs, becauſe ſhe knew King James's two favorites were uſing their utmoſt indeavors to turn him againſt England. The firſt point of their project was, to complete the ruin of Morton, whom they had already deſtroyed in his Majeſty's favor. The ſecond, to ingage King James to marry a French Princeſs. The third, to perſuade him, after his marriage, to declare the duke of Guiſe his lieutenant-general. dence of King James, who delighted to load them with favors. D'Aubigny had been made earl, and then duke of Lenox (1), and James Stuart was honored with the title of earl of Arran. On the intelligence ſhe had received, ſhe judged it neceſſary to begin with opening the young King's eyes in relation to his favorites ſchemes, or put him under a neceſſity to ſhew that he approved them, which could not but produce great diſcontent among the Scots. To this effect, ſhe diſpatched away to Scotland ſir Robert Bowes, to accuſe the duke of Lenox, before the King and council, of holding with the court of France, and particularly with the duke of Guiſe, intelligence deſtructive both to Scotland and England. The council of Scotland, governed by the duke of Lenox, thought not proper to admit the accuſation; but James, in order to juſtify his ſaid favorite, ſent into England lord Humes to wait on her Majeſty, who refuſed him audience. Nothing could be more pleaſing to the Scotiſh King's two favorites than the miſunderſtanding which began to be formed between their maſter and the Queen of England. Not to give him time to cool, one day, as the earl of Morton was preſent in the council, the earl of Arran charged him with being concerned in the King's murder. Elizabeth underſtanding Morton's diſgrace, and finding his attachment to England was the ſole cauſe of it, immediately diſpatched Randolph to ſollicit in his behalf: but the favorite's intention being rather to exaſperate than appeaſe, his interceſſion was in vain. Randolph ſeeing the King ſo beſet that it was not poſſible to prevail, demanded audience of the ſtates, then aſſembled. He repreſented, how neceſſary a good underſtanding with England was to them; what the Queen his miſtreſs had done for Scotland ſince the King's birth; how great affection ſhe had ever expreſſed for him, and with what pains and charge ſhe had always protected his faithful ſubjects: that, notwithſtanding all this, the duke of Lenox was indeavoring to ſow diſcord between the two kingdoms, and had ſo far ſucceeded, that the King now looked on the Queen of England, his good kinſwoman, as a declared enemy. The ſtates heard his harangue, and returned a general anſwer, which demonſtrated their being directed by the court: ſo, finding he could obtain nothing, either from the King or ſtates, he began to practiſe on the grandees, to perſuade them to riſe in arms, while Elizabeth ſhould ſend forces towards the borders (2). As all this could not be tranſacted without the knowledge of James and his favorites, the government of Sterling was taken from the earl of Mar, who was ſuſpected of being too good a friend of the Engliſh, and the King publiſhed orders to all his ſubjects fit to bear arms, to hold themſelves ready for a march on the ſhorteſt warning. But as Elizabeth's meaning was only to terrify the King of Scotland, and not to make war upon him purely for the earl of Morton's ſake, ſhe ordered her troops to retire. Probably, Elizabeth's indeavors to ſave the priſoner, rather haſtened his ruin, ſince preſently after he was condemned and beheaded. He confeſſed, the earl of Bothwell imparted to him his deſign to kill the King, but denied any hand in the murder. He ſaid alſo, he had intended to carry the King into England, that, being educated among the Engliſh, he might find leſs difficulty to obtain the crown of that kingdom on Queen Elizabeth's deceaſe. The earl of Morton being dead, the two favorites became more and more maſters of the King and the whole adminiſtration, without regarding what murmurs were among the people, who with the utmoſt indignation beheld themſelves at the mercy of two raw and unexperienced ſtriplings. The duke of Lenox had ſome good qualities; but had no knowledge of the affairs of Scotland, and was moreover a zealous Papiſt, and deemed the duke of Guiſe's creature. This gave ground for apprehenſion that he had formed projects deſtructive to Scotland's religion and liberty. The earl of Arran was a mere atheiſt, and one of the wickedeſt men exiſting, if Melvil's teſtimony is to be abſolutely credited. He pretended to be the duke of Lenox's friend, but labored his ruin; by giving him counſels ſufficient to make him forfeit the love and eſteem of both nobles and people. On the other hand, he gave the Reformed eccleſiaſtics private intimations that their religion was in imminent danger, if timely care was not taken to oppoſe the duke's pernicious deſigns. By theſe ſecret practiſes he ſo managed that Lenox became odious to the whole kingdom.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the court of France earneſtly preſſed the duke of Anjou's marriage with Elizabeth. Her ſaid Majeſty having finally agreed with Simié on the principal articles Henry III diſpatched over to England a pompous embaſſy, conſiſting of Francis of Bourbon Prince of Dauphiné, Arthur Coſſe marſhal of France, preſident Briſſon, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction. As to their children, the ſubſequent articles ſhall be ſettled, which ſhall be ratified in the parliaments of England and France, viz.

All the children, as well males as females, ſhall ſucceed to their mother's inheritance, each in their order, according to the cuſtom of England.

If the crown of France happens to fall to the duke of Anjou, or his heirs, and there be two males, the eldeſt ſhall ſucceed in the kingdom of France, and the ſecond in that of England.

If there be but one ſon, he ſhall inherit both crowns, but ſhall be obliged to reſide in England eight months in every two years.

If the duke never accedes to the crown of France, his children ſhall inherit his appenage.

If he ſurvives her Majeſty, he ſhall have the guardianſhip of the children; of the males 'till they are eighteen, and of the females 'till fifteen years of age.

If the duke dies before the time of guardianſhip be expired, it ſhall be left to the parliament's diſpoſal.

"After theſe articles relating to the children, and "ſerving to ſettle the ſucceſſion, it was farther "agreed:"

The duke ſhall preſer no foreigner to any poſt or office, in England.

He ſhall not carry her Majeſty out of the kingdom, without her own and the expreſs conſent of the peers.

If ſhe dies iſſueleſs, he ſhall pretend no claim to England.

He ſhall not convey the crown-jewels out of the kingdom.

He ſhall leave all fortreſſes in the hands of the Engliſh, and ſhall not remove from thence any warlike ſtores.

There ſhall be a particular treaty of league between France and England, with the proper ratifications.

By a ſeparate article, ſigned apart by itſelf, it was agreed, "The Queen ſhall not be bound to "conſummate the marriage, before ſhe and the "duke of Anjou ſhall thoroughly ſatisfy each other "in certain points, and ſhall certify the King of "France thereof within ſix weeks." It is not known on what account it was neceſſary to take this precaution.

The duke of Anjou made Sovereign of the confederate provinces.

The Netherland ſtates had, ſince laſt year, begun to treat with the duke of Anjou, concerning their offer of the Sovereignty of the confederate provinces, and this negociation was ſo far advanced, that the conditions were now agreed. So ſoon as the Prince of Orange was in a manner ſure of the ſucceſs of this affair, he ſo ordered, that the ſtates declared the King of Spain to have forfeited his Sovereignty in the Netherlands, and the duke was hourly expected to take poſſeſſion of his new dignity, and oppoſe the Prince of Parma, who was beſieging Cambray. In effect, the duke arrived in Auguſt, with an army of twenty thouſand men, and forced the Prince of Parma to raiſe the ſiege, and retire to Valenciennes. He made his entry into Cambray the eighteenth of Auguſt, and was declared Prince thereof, having firſt taken the oath.

Elizabeth ſtarts difficulties about her marriage. Camden. Digges's embaſ.

During this interval, Queen Elizabeth made appear that ſhe had altered her mind with regard to her marriage, or had never in earneſt thought of accompliſhing it. She only wanted a pretext to break off, or at leaſt to defer it 'till time ſhould produce a more favorable opportunity. To this end, ſhe ſent into France James Sommers, clerk of the council, to require that, purſuant to the laſt marriage-articles, a league offenſive and defenſive ſhould be inſtantly concluded between France and England. Henry III anſwered that, in the articles no mention was made of a league offenſive, but he was ready to ſign a defenſive one. Sommers replied, the league mentioned in the articles muſt be deemed offenſive, ſince there was already a league defenſive concluded in 1572, which, not having been violated, wanted no renewal. Elizabeth thereupon diſpatched away to Paris ſecretary Walſingham, to improve this difficulty, and add ſome others. Walſingham therefore told the King, when the Queen his miſtreſs firſt reſolved to marry, it was only to ſatisfy her ſubjects, who deſired a certain ſucceſſion by her children, to which end ſhe had prefered the duke of Anjou before all other Princes, on account of his perſonal qualities, and royal deſcent: nevertheleſs ſhe could not think of conſummating the marriage, 'till ſhe perceived whether it was pleaſing to her people, for fear ſhe ſhould be accuſed of conſidering too late: that ſhe heard, with grief, that many of her beſt-diſpoſed ſubjects were averſe to the marriage, and for that reaſon ſhe thought it neceſſary to delay it, tho' ſhe had ſtill the ſame eſteem for the duke of Anjou: that beſide, ſince concluding the articles, certain matters had fallen out which required her to think more attentively of her ingagement: that the duke having accepted the ſovereignty of the Netherlands, had incurred the diſpleaſure of his royal brother, and this new dignity could not but ingage England in a war with Spain, it not being poſſible for the duke to be in war and the Queen his ſpouſe remain neutral: that ſhe therefore believed the preſent juncture very unſeaſonable to conſummate the marriage; and that it was proper to defer it 'till the duke ſhould be diſingaged from his war, and the offenſive and defenſive league between France and England concluded, according to agreement. Henry, plainly perceiving this to be a mere evaſion, briefly replied, he was ready to renew the defenſive league, and would treat of a league offenſive as ſoon as the nuptials were accompliſhed.

The duke of Anjou arrives in England. Camden.

All this paſſed while the duke of Anjou was in the Netherlands. Having raiſed the ſiege of Cambray, and taken Cateau in Cambreſis, the ſtates preſſed him to join his forces with their army, to improve that fair opportunity: but the approach of winter furniſhed him with a plauſible excuſe to remand his troops into France, that he might imbark and perſonally ſollicit his affairs in England. He arrived there in November, and the reception given him by her Majeſty was ſo exceedingly courteous and reſpectful, that he deemed himſelf as good as ſure of ſucceſs. The Queen, diſcourſing him one day, as the anniverſary of her coronation was celebrating, took from her finger a ring, and put it on the duke's, which made all preſent imagine ſhe then plighted him her faith.

She ſuddenly retracts. Camden.

Mean while, this marriage was loudly and publicly murmured at, both in court and city. Walſingham, Hatton, and others of the Queen's confidents *, were extraordinarily clamorous. Such of her ladies as were moſt intimate with her, never ceaſed repreſenting to her all the miſchiefs which might thence accrue both to herſelf and the whole kingdom, and, by perſuaſions intermingled with tears, ſtrove to divert her from this reſolution. I know not whether I am miſtaken in ſuſpecting all this to be a mere farce, acted by her ſaid Majeſty's private orders, to furniſh a pretext to retract. Miniſters, courtiers and favorites are ſeldom known ſo openly to oppoſe their Sovereign's will, if they are not certain of approbation. ladies, went in the morning to the duke's apartment and had with him a private converſation. When ſhe withdrew, the duke was ſeen to throw away the ring ſhe had given him, and preſently to take it up again, heavily exclaiming againſt womens inconſtancy and Engliſh levity.

Remark on Elizabeth's conduct.

Elizabeth's whole conduct in what related to this marriage was ſo ſingular, that there is no gueſſing at her real ſentiments. Had the affair been barely a negociation, protracted and broke off when on the point of concluſion, there would not be much room for wonder. Nothing was more conformable to this Queen's character, and I may venture on ſaying to her intereſt: but the ſigning and ſealing the marriage-articles raiſes a difficulty not eaſily removed. It is ſcarce probable this politic Princeſs ſhould think of thus ſtrangely impoſing on a brother of the Gallic Monarch, and who might himſelf one day be King of France, Henry being thitherto iſſueleſs. This is ſo much the leſs credible, as there was then no viſible neceſſity of carrying to ſo high a pitch her diſſimulation. For my part, I can not better account for this extraordinary conduct than by ſaying, that when the negociation firſt commenced, her deſign was only to amuſe the duke of Anjou; that, afterwards ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be won, and ſigned the articles with ſincerity, in a reſolution to perform them; but that after ſigning ſhe repented, and choſe rather to affront the Prince than keep her word. Then it was that ſhe carried her diſſimulation to the greateſt height, in expreſſing a moſt extraordinary value and eſteem for the duke, and laboring withal to put him out of conceit with the marriage. There are two facts extremely difficult to be reconciled, otherwiſe than by coming into my ſaid ſuppoſition. The firſt is, during the duke's ſtay at court, a man loſt his hand for having ſatyriſed on her intended marriage (1): after that, ſhe publiſhed a manifeſto, to ſatisfy the public, that the duke of Anjou had no ill deſign againſt the Proteſtant religion, nor had made even a ſingle demand in favor of the Catholics. The ſecond fact, very oppoſite to the firſt, is, that ſhe took the opportunity while the duke was with her, to put to death Edmund Campian, a Jeſuit, with three other prieſts (2), convicted of attempting to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom, and obſtinately maintaining, that the Queen was legally depoſed. It is eaſy to perceive, if her eſteem and affection for the duke of Anjou had been ſuch as ſhe pretended, ſhe would at leaſt have defered chaſtiſing thoſe men 'till after his departure: but, moſt indiſputably, her deſign was to let him ſee he would not find in his marriage thoſe comforts he fancied to have reaſon to expect. Howſoever all this might have been, or which way ſoever we explain her proceedings, there is not, in my opinion, any juſtifying either her ſigning the articles, or her ſubſequent retractation.

The Papiſts expoſe themſelves to Elizabeth's ſeverity. Camden.

Whatever her Majeſty's intention might be in this negociation, it certainly was very detrimental to the Engliſh Catholics, who, entertaining great hopes from this marriage, were too haſty to diſcover them. When it was publicly known that the articles were ſigned, England was ſuddenly overrun with Romiſh prieſts, Jeſuits, and other Papiſts, who hoped to be ſecure there under the duke of Anjou's protection. Among theſe, ſome were ſo ſtupid as openly to vent the moſt extravagant doctrines concerning the Pope's power, a crime then unpardonable, becauſe it tended to deprive the Queen of her royalty, and raiſe a rebellion. It is therefore no wonder that the furious zeal and imprudence of ſome of the Catholics drew on the whole body ſeverities to which Elizabeth would not have been eaſily led, had they been contented with living quietly and exerciſing their religion in private, without attacking the government. What did them ſtill more injury was, that ſome of them owned they were come into England with power to abſolve every one in particular from the oath of allegiance, from which Pius V's bull had abſolved the whole nation in general.

Statutes againſt Papiſts.

The parliament, meeting early in 1582, while the duke of Anjou was ſtill in England (3), paſſed certain very rigid laws againſt the Catholics, wherein all thoſe are declared guilty of high-treaſon, "who "ſhall indeavor to diſſuade her Majeſty's ſubjects "from their allegiance to her, and from the reli-"gion eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, or ſhall recon-"cile them to the church of Rome, as alſo thoſe "who ſhall be thus reconciled. Thoſe alſo are "fined in two hundred marks, and one year's im-"priſonment, who ſhall ſay maſs, and they who "ſhall be knowingly preſent at maſs are fined in a "hundred marks, with impriſonment alſo for a "year. Moreover, they who abſented themſelves "from their pariſh-churches on the days appointed "for divine ſervice, are fined in twenty pounds "for each month's abſenſe." It muſt be obſerved, that hitherto only one ſhilling, to the uſe of the poor, had been exacted for abſenſe on Sundays and Holy-days. This ſhews, that before the ſtatutes againſt Papiſts were not over and above ſevere, neither were they, it is certain, rigorouſly executed: but the indiſcrete zeal of thoſe who would not be ſatisfied with this lenity, occaſioned all the Catholics to be deprived of thoſe advantages.

The duke of Anjou, and thoſe who had attended him into England, had occular demonſtration of the conſtraint they ſhould live under if the marriage was accompliſhed. To all appearance, the proceedings of the Queen and parliament againſt Papiſts, did not a little contribute to comfort him, and perhaps put him out of conceit with a country ſo oppoſite to France: nay, it is not unlikely, all this was done in his ſight with that very view. He departed in February, having received from the Queen many tokens of eſteem and affection, the moſt ſubſtantial whereof was a good ſum of money (4) to aſſiſt him in maintaining war in the Netherlands. Her Majeſty, having accompanied him to Canterbury, ordered diverſe of the Engliſh nobility to wait on him as far as Antwerp, where he ſoon after received the ducal crown of Brabant. By all theſe tokens of amity and eſteem, and by her extraordinary civilities, Elizabeth was willing, in ſome meaſure, to repair the mortifications ſhe made him undergo during his abode in England. It is abundantly probable that his ſtay there was not to his advantage, and ſerved only to diſcover the mediocrity of his genius and other qualities.

Elizabeth's ſtate of uncertainty,

Elizabeth was too clear-ſighted not to perceive that her conduct in the negociation of her marriage could not but diſguſt the King of France; and therefore readily comprehended that, even had there been no other reaſon but this alone, ſhe could not greatly depend on his friendſhip. On the other hand, ſhe was not ignorant how angry the King of Spain was, that intire bodies of Engliſh ſerved the Netherlandiſh ſtates, commanded by general Norris. Tho' theſe troops went under the denomination of volunteers, or men who had no owners, ſerving at their own charge, it might nevertheleſs well be preſumed, that they were not there in ſuch numbers without their Sovereign's either tacit or expreſs conſent: beſide, it was ſcarcely poſſible for Elizabeth to conceal the ſupplies of money ſhe had given Prince Caſimir and the duke of Anjou, towards maintaining their armies. Philip II was the moſt potent Prince in Europe, and his late acquiſition of Portugal had rendered him ſtill more formidable, particularly to the Engliſh. He was ſupported by the Pope, and had but too much influence in the King of France's council. But Elizabeth had no friend on whom ſhe could rely. The duke of Guiſe was actually laboring to alienate from her the King of Scotland. The Iriſh wanted only a favorable opportunity to revolt, and the Engliſh Catholics were inceſſantly excited to rebellion by the Pontif's emiſſaries. To theſe may be added a great number of Proteſtants, the Scotiſh Queen's partiſans, who only waited ſome good occaſion to expreſs the affection they bore her. Elizabeth's miniſters could not, without dread, reflect on all thoſe circumſtances: they were in continual apprehenſion that ſome terrible ſtorm was going to fall on England. To this fear was owing, firſt the league defenſive with France, and then the project of her Majeſty's marriage with the duke of Anjou, the miniſters judging it in a manner impoſſible ſhe ſhould ſupport herſelf without ſome powerful alliance.

She relies on her peoples affection;

Mean while, whether Elizabeth thought herſelf able to prevent or repel the danger, ſhe took but few precautions, relying wholly on the affection of her own ſubjects: this was her beſt, or rather her only refuge; and therefore to attempt corrupting them, or removing the love and eſteem they had for her, was wounding her in a very ſenſible part. To this muſt be aſcribed her tender expreſſions whenever ſhe had occaſion of ſpeaking to the people. It muſt notwithſtanding be acknowledged that ſhe won her ſubjects love not only by words and other external demonſtrations, but chiefly by very ſubſtantial deeds. Let any one peruſe the whole Hiſtory of England, and he will find no reign wherein juſtice was adminiſtered ſo impartially, or the Engliſh injoyed their privileges more peaceably, or were freer from wars abroad and at home, or from extraordinary taxes and impoſitions; in a word, wherein the kingdom was more flouriſhing. Queen Elizabeth ran not into any unneceſſary expenſes, and her treaſury being regularly managed, the ſubjects had no cauſe to murmur, ſince whatever they gave was imployed for their own benefit.

and wins it by laudable methods.

ELIZAB. AN' 1582.

But it was not at home only that Elizabeth labored for the felicity of her people; her care extended likewiſe abroad. This year ſhe ſent embaſſadors to Frederic II, King of Denmark, under color of carrying him the order of the garter: but the chief motive of this embaſſy, was to induce that Prince to deſiſt from certain duties paid by Engliſh traders in paſſing the Sound, wherein however ſhe could not poſſibly ſucceed. Frederic thankfully received the collar of that order, but refuſed to take the uſual oath, becauſe he had before refuſed doing it when admited into St. Michael's order by the King of France.

She ſends St. George's order to the King of Denmark. Camden.

Tho' Henry III had no reaſon to be greatly ſatisfied with Elizabeth, he however gave her notice that the duke of Guiſe was forming ſome project in favor of the Scotiſh Queen, and was to imbark in Normandy certain forces, deſtined either for England or Scotland, tho' he pretended ſending them to Flanders. For this reaſon ſhe recalled ſir Walter Mildmay, diſpatched to treat with Queen Mary, or at leaſt under that pretenſe.

Henry III warns Elizabeth of the duke of Guiſe's deſigns. Camden. Strype's Ann. Vol. III. p. 98.

As there was no likelihood that the duke of Guiſe would invade England directly, but, on the contrary, all things looked as if he deſigned to execute ſome ſcheme in Scotland, Elizabeth turned her thoughts wholly to that kingdom's affairs. They were then in a violent convulſion. Some perſons of great diſtinction, among whom were the earls of Mar, Lindſay and Goury, highly indignant at beholding their native land ſubject to the domination of a minor, ſcarce fifteen years old, and a couple of heedleſs unexperienced youths, who had nothing leſs in view than the kingdom's welfare, combined to ſeize the King's perſon and remove his two favorites. To that end, taking their opportunity while they were both abſent from court, and the King intent on hunting near Athol, they ſent and invited him by the earl of Goury to paſs a few days at his houſe at Huntingtoun, and when he came there, ſecured his perſon. This was named the Ruthven-Conſpiracy, becauſe Ruthven was the ſur-name of earl Goury's family: for the ſame reaſon, the conſpirators were ſtiled, the Ruthven Lords. The earl of Arran, one of young James's favorites, aſſembled ſome people, and attempted to free his maſter, but was repulſed and forced to retreat to Ruthven caſtle, where the earl of Goury received him and ſaved his life; but kept him priſoner. The duke of Lenox, hearing what had paſſed, ſpeedily retired to Dunbarton, of which he was governor, and the King was carried to Sterling, free in appearance, but in reality a priſoner.

She attends the affairs of Scotland. Melvil. Camden. Strype, Vol. III. The Ruthven conſpiracy in Scotland. Melvil, p. 129, 132. Camden. Spotſwood.

On this news Elizabeth, who probably was not ignorant of the conſpirators deſign, ordered Henry Carey immediately to depart for Scotland, and offer the young King her ſervice. But James, terrified by thoſe who had him in their power, anſwered, that all was done by his own conſent, and he was very well pleaſed with the lords who were about him. Melvil however affirms, that the King found means to tell Carey privately the contrary to what he had ſaid in public. The King of France ſent likewiſe into Scotland La Mothe Fenelon, to indeavor ſupporting the favorites, knowing thoſe who had ſeized the King were all friends to England: this envoy had alſo orders to acquaint King James, that the Queen his mother, who had hitherto refuſed to own him for King, agreed to make him her aſſociate in the royalty.

The calendar reformed.

This year, Pope Gregory XIII published his bull for reforming the calendar, and ordered ten days of this very year to be cut off at once. As England and the other Protestant states refused complying with this ordinance, as flowing from the Papal authority, thenceforwards commenced a difference of ten days in the dates, the one counting it the first day of the month, when it was the tenth with the others. This difference still subsists in some places, and particularly in England *, where the ancient manner of reckoning is yet used, adding however the new stile.

Elizabeth feigns a desire to release the Queen of Scots. Camden.

Camden pretends, that Elizabeth was deeply moved with Mary's letter, and that compassion for the afflicted Queen induced her to consult her council on what terms she should be released. We shall presently be certified that this step she took was very far from demonstrating any real inclination to set her at liberty: it is abundantly more probable that she sought only to amuse her, and, by giving her hope of deliverance, had no other view than to put a stop to the machinations incessantly hatching in her favor, and free herself from the sollicitations wherewith she was perpetually importuned. However this be, some time after the receit of her letter, she sent to her Robert Beal (2), one of the clerks of her council, with certain articles founded on Mary's offer of associating her son in the government. Consequently they supposed a previous agreement between them; but never had there been a more improper juncture to negociate this agreement, since King James was captive in the hands of Queen Elizabeth's partisans. Here follow the articles, with some remarks, which will serve to manifest Elizabeth's aim in feigning a desire to release her prisoner:

Conditions proposed. Camden. Spotswood.

I. The Queen of Scots and the King her son should promise to attempt nothing prejudicial to England.

"It is easy to perceive, that this article is ex"pressed in such general terms as required a large "explanation.

II. She should disclaim, as unjust, whatever was done by Francis II, her first consort, and ratify the treaty of Edinburg.

"The former part of this article was very ge"neral, and liable to abundance of cavils. As to "the latter part, it must be observed, that Mary
"could not ratify the treaty of Edinburg but with
"the restriction she had offered: so, in proposing
"to her the ratification of that treaty, simply and "absolutely, a snare was laid for her, or else she "was put under a necessity of rejecting this ar"ticle.

III. She should discover, disavow and censure all such conspiracies against Queen Elizabeth as were come to her knowledge.

"This was accusing her of being concerned in "these conspiracies, and making her own it, which "was very hard measure for Mary. She could "have done no more, had she been fully con"vinced of Elizabeth's sincerity, of which there "is not much probability.

IV. She should contrive nothing against the government of England, ecclesiastical or civil.

"Mary was a Catholic, and the laws of "England excluded the Catholics from all "posts: so, if she agreed to this article, with"out farther explanation, it might have been in"fered, that she excluded herself from succeeding "Elizabeth.

ELIZAB. AN' 1582.

V. She should claim no right to the crown of England during Queen Elizabeth's life, and, after Elizabeth's decease, should refer her title to the parliament's judgment.

"This was actually spreading a net to intrap
"Mary, in making her acknowledge her title to "be dubious, tho' she did maintain, and had al-
"ways maintained, that it was inconteſtable.

VI. She should swear to these articles, to the end there might be no room for the objection taken from her not being at liberty.

VII. The King her son should ratify them by oath and writing.

"To inable the King of Scotland to ratify these "articles, it was necessary first that he should au-
"thentically agree, that he was King only as asso"ciated by the Queen his mother, which was not
"then in his power, as being actually prisoner to "the Ruthven lords, who no way owned Queen
"Mary's authority.

VIII. For the performance of this article Queen Mary should give hostages to the Queen of England.

"This article was also liable to many diffi"culties, concerning the number and quality of
"the hostages."

It is therefore evident that Elizabeth proposed these articles to Mary merely to amuse her and the world, at a time when it was not possible even to enter into treaty on this subject; beside their being almost all insnaring and liable to discussions which the court of England might have prolonged as they pleased. Camden says, the Scots of the English party were utterly averse to this agreement, affirming it was owing to the French court's cabals. True it is, had the conditions proposed been advantageous to Mary, very possibly Elizabeth would have set the Scots to oppose the treaty: but concluded this was not at all necessary, since she had taken sufficient care to prevent Mary's accepting them. p. 491.

Affairs of Scotland. Melvil, p. 132. Spotswood.

I must now return to what passed in Scotland this year. Were any one confined to what Camden says, the idea to be thence formed would be very imperfect. This is one of those passages wherein that historian has thought fit to be extremely succinct, lest he should wound the reputation of King James, in whose behalf he compiled his annals of Queen Elizabeth: but, fortunately, we have Melvil's memoirs, which give us a fuller information.

Lenox, seeing his young master in the Ruthven lords hands, and his own small hope of being able to form a party strong enough to free him, withdrew into France, where he soon after died.

Mean while, the lords of Ruthven, whose sole aim had been to remove from the King his two favorites, finding one was in prison and the other in France, thought proper to convene the states, where King James was present. He declared, whatever they had done was with his consent, and to his satisfaction. He wrote the like to the general assembly of the kirk, whereupon the states and the kirk did, by authentic acts, approve whatever had been transacted. This done, the King was no longer watched, but left intirely at liberty. Spotswood.

Soon after, King James assembled the nobility at St. Andrew's, before whom he declared that, tho' he had been detained against his will, he was however sensible all was done for his service: that he intended not to call any person to account, but would speedily publish a general act of oblivion. To Melvil. p. 136.

evidence his forgeting what had occurred, he viſited the earl of Goury, who caſting himſelf at his feet, craved pardon, which he very readily obtained.

All being thus quiet, James appointed twelve counſellors to aſſiſt him in governing the ſtate. But, very ſoon after, his affection for the earl of Arran reviving, he wiſhed to ſee him; and as all his counſellors were unanimouſly againſt it, he proteſted he would again diſmiſs him in twenty-four hours; but was not ſo good as his word, for he retained him ever after. In a ſhort ſpace, the favorite had over him ſuch influence, that he would not ſuffer any but him to interfere in public affairs: whereupon the council of twelve being no longer conſulted, broke up of themſelves. Arran no ſooner found himſelf abſolutely reſtored than he ſuggeſted to his royal maſter, that he had made a falſe ſtep, in not chaſtiſing the inſolence of thoſe Ruthven lords, and finally perſuaded him to alter his reſolution. So, inſtead of the promiſed amneſty, he iſſued a proclamation, commanding the accomplices of the Ruthvan conſpiracy to come and implore pardon for their crime. Every one plainly ſaw the difference between this proclamation, and the agreed on act of oblivion. James being free had declared, that they who had detained him intended no ill, and for that reaſon he had promiſed them a pardon: but, by the proclamation, he conſidered them as criminals, and obliged them to ſubmit to his mercy, at a time when he ſuffered himſelf to be governed by one of thoſe very favorites againſt whom they had formed their combination. This ſufficed to induce thoſe lords to retire, ſome to their own homes, and others into England, to wait for another opportunity to ruin their enemy (1).

Elizabeth, being informed of the Scotiſh King's procedure, and the danger of Arran's utterly ruining the Engliſh party, wrote to King James, repreſenting the conſequences, and mixed in her letter ſome reproaches for breach of promiſe. She moreover told him, ſhe intended to ſend ſecretary Walſingham to diſcourſe him from herſelf. James returned a reſolute anſwer, and vindicated himſelf for not performing his promiſe, ſince it was extorted from him when a captive. This excuſe might have ſerved, with reſpect to what he ſaid to the ſtates; but it was inſufficient, ſince he repeated the ſame to the nobility when at full liberty: however, he promiſed the Queen to proceed no farther 'till Walſingham's arrival. Mean while, the favorite made the earl of Goury undergo ſo many mortifications, that he at length forced him to quit the court.

Walſingham, being arrived, imparted to King James, in two private audiences, the Queen's advice concerning the management of his affairs: but as this advice tended to the earl of Arran's ruin, the embaſſador brought back no very ſatisfactory anſwer (2).

Affairs of France. Mezerai. Thuanus.

In France, Henry III deported himſelf ſo unaccountably that he daily incurred the contempt of his ſubjects. In public, he affected a great vehemency of devotion, while in private he plunged himſelf into luxuries the moſt criminal. Philip II, taking advantage of Henry's indolence with regard to his affairs of greateſt importance, left no means uneſſayed to create him troubles which ſhould prevent his undertaking to protect the Netherlanders, who ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to put themſelves under France's domination. He firſt tried to perſuade the King of Navarre to take the field, promiſing to aid and protect the Hugonots. This failing, he applied to the duke of Guiſe, who accepted the ſuccors offered by Philip, to revenge the mortifications he daily received from Henry's minions.

An' 1584. Affairs of Scotland. Melvil. p. 150.

When Queen Elizabeth's advice to the King of Scotland had on him a good effect, or Melvil's remonſtrances, as himſelf hints in his memoirs, made ſome impreſſion on his mind, he ſeemed reſolved to put a ſtop to all proſecutions againſt the Ruthven lords. To that purpoſe, he aſſembled the nobility at Edinburg, there, with the advice of his grandees, to terminate this affair by publiſhing a general amneſty, as was his original deſign: but this project was, malgre the King himſelf, defeated by the earl of Arran, a perſon of a bold and daring ſpirit. On the grandees arrival at Edinburg, he diſcourſed each apart, intimating, that the King's intention was only to get his conduct with regard to the lords of Ruthven approved, after which he would pardon them, on their acknowledging they owed that favor to his clemency. Thoſe peers, finding the point was only to ſave his Majeſty's honor, and imagining no detriment would thereby accrue to the fugitives, promiſed the favorite to do as the King deſired. So, when James aſked their advice in this matter, they anſwered, it was their opinion he acted with extraordinary lenity, in opening the fugitives a way to obtain their pardon. This done, the earl of Arran told him, if, after this declaration, he publiſhed the act of oblivion, without the fugitives owning themſelves guilty, he would diſoblige his nobility by neglecting their advice, and extremely injure his own dignity. Thus the fugitives reaped not any advantage, tho' the aſſembly was convened purely in their behalf.

The grandees declaration drove the lords of Ruthven to deſpair. They were conſtrained to implore pardon for what the King had approved, as done for his ſervice: nay, they could not be aſſured of obtaining this promiſed grace ſince, as the King had once departed from his word, they could not repoſe in him any farther confidence. The earl of Arran, having gained his point, became haughtier and more inſolent, and ſo violently perſecuted all his adverſaries that he finally induced them to form a new conſpiracy againſt him (3). Tho' the earl of Goury had ſpared this favorite's life, and had procured the King's pardon very particularly, yet was he never ſuffered to be at reſt 'till he had forced him to aſk leave to quit the realm. He was now at Dundee, in order to retire into England, when he had notice that the earls of Mar, Angus, and Glames, who were fled into Ireland, had in hand ſome project againſt the favorite.

This news induced him to ſtay in Scotland, and at laſt he himſelf entered into the conſpiracy, without however moving from Dundee. The confederates had ſo well laid their meaſures that, arriving unexpectedly in Scotland, they inſtantly poſſeſſed themſelves of Sterling.

Melvil. p. 155, 156. Camden. Spotſwood. April 16.

Mean while the court, having before received ſome confuſed intelligence of this conſpiracy, and knowing the earl of Goury was concerned, ordered him to be arreſted, which was done accordingly, juſt as the conſpirators became maſters of Sterling. This quite diſheartened them. As Goury was King James's near relative, they fancied he had deſignedly ſuffered himſelf to be apprehended, and, believing themſelves betrayed, they abandoned their enterpriſe and fled the kingdom. It coſt the earl his life, being conveyed to Edinburg, and there beheaded (1). Thus the earl of Arran, in ſpite of his enemies, ſtill maintained his poſt. He was extremely odious to the whole nation, being not only abominably wicked and atheiſtical, but moſt inſatiably ravenous. There was alſo another particular whereat the Scots were not a little concerned and diſturbed; viz. James had, for ſome time, held private intelligence with the Queen his mother, which bred a fear that he would ingage in deſigns deſtructive to the ſtate and religion. He had ſecretly accepted the aſſociation ſhe offered him, and it was ſeen that none but the Queen's known friends had acceſs to him: nay, it was whiſpered that he intended to turn Papiſt, and began to liſten to the French court's, or rather the duke of Guiſe's propoſitions.

Elizabeth ſends Daviſon into Scotland to gain the earl of Arran. Melvil. p. 157.

All this was but too ſufficient to give Elizabeth great uneaſineſs. She feared the Scotiſh King would be perſuaded to take a French wife, and ſuch a marriage produce ill effects for England. Wherefore to prevent, if poſſible, the miſchiefs which might happen from that quarter, ſhe ſent Daviſon into Scotland, under color of excuſing her protecting the Scotiſh fugitives, notwithſtanding James had demanded them by virtue of the treaty of alliance concluded between the two kingdoms: but Daviſon's main errand was to attempt gaining Arran to his royal miſtreſs's intereſt. This method was better and ſpeedier than to ſupport the Scotiſh male-contents, who were always to be ſupplied with money, without being certain of the ſucceſs of their undertakings: beſide, the Queen thereby ran the hazard of intirely loſing King James. That Prince wanted not ſenſe, but, as he was young, unexperienced, and too much ſwayed by his favorites, it was to be feared that, on the account of other peoples concerns, he would be drawn into projects detrimental to both kingdoms. Daviſon's ſucceſs in his negociation was complete, with reſpect to the earl of Arran, and, by means eaſily gueſſed at, prevailed on him to be guided by her Majeſty. Before his return to England, it was agreed, that lord Hunſdon for England, and the earl of Arran for Scotland, ſhould meet on the borders, and make a regulation proper to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms. Under this pretenſe, theſe two peers conſered, and before they parted made a private treaty, whereby the earl of Arran ingaged to keep King James three years unmarried. Elizabeth pretended, ſhe deſigned to give him a Princeſs of the Engliſh blood-royal who was not yet marriageable. This was at leaſt the pretext wherewith the treaty was colored.

ELIZAB. AN' 1584.

While all this was in agitation, Gray, a noble young Scot, inſinuated himſelf ſo far into King James's favor, that the earl of Arran, growing jealous, found means to procure his removal, by geting him ſent embaſſador to Elizabeth. Gray was no ſooner in England, but the Queen won him by her careſſes and bounties. This embaſſador thenceforwards feigned to be ſtrongly attached to Queen Mary's intereſt, and by that means drew from her ſecrets which Elizabeth knew how to improve. The earl of Arran, having ſome intelligence of this intrigue, notified it to King James, in order to ruin his ſaid rival; but as, very ſeemingly, he could bring no proof of what he advanced, Gray, being returned to Scotland, was very well received by the King, and in his turn ſpared no pains to ruin the favorite.

Elizabeth diſcovers Mary's ſecrets by Gray, the Scotiſh embaſſador. Melvil. p. 158.

While this was tranſacted in Scotland, ſchemes were projecting in England in the royal captive's favor: but certain intercepted letters, to Queen Mary from Francis Throckmorton (2), affording ſome inſight into the conſpiracy, Throckmorton was arreſted. Immediately Thomas lord Paget and Charles Arundel fled to France, and gave out, the Catholics were ſo violently perſecuted in England, that it was not poſſible for them to ſtay there without manifeſt danger: that forged letters from the Queen of Scots were left in their houſes, to force either their bringing them to the ſecretary of ſtate, or making themſelves guilty by concealment. Elizabeth undoubtedly had ſpies to watch the motions of the Papiſts, having but too much reaſon to ſuſpect their fidelity (3): nay, it is very poſſible that, among theſe ſpies, there were ſome who, to improve their ſervices, laid ſnares for thoſe people. Such as undertake that imploy, of what religion ſoever they be, are not uſually the honeſteſt men: but the Engliſh Papiſts behavior having made theſe precautions neceſſary, the knowledge of what paſſed among them was of the utmoſt conſequence to Queen Elizabeth. Diverſe books, as well printed as in manuſcript, were handed about, wherein the Queen was moſt inſufferably calumniated and defamed. She was charged with having put to death many Catholics without cauſe, having firſt racked them to extort their acknowledgment of crimes whereof they were innocent. Her maids of honor were exhorted to ſerve her in the ſame manner as Judith did Holofernes, and by ſo noble a deed to render themſelves worthy of holy mother church's applauſe throughout all future ages (4). Theſe books, with what had been diſcovered after Throckmorton's arreſt, occaſioned many to judge that ſome grand combination was ready to break out.

However, the Queen, willing to take from her enemies all occaſion of ſlandering her in other countries, prohibited torturing any perſon whatever, and was ſatisfied with tranſporting from her dominions ſeventy prieſts who were in priſon, and of whom ſome were under ſentence of death: among theſe were certain Jeſuits, who afterwards proved very ungrateful for this favor. Perhaps indeed, on this occaſion, ſhe acted not ſo much from a motive of clemency, as to ſeparate what her enemies were conſtantly for uniting and confounding, viz. religion and crimes againſt the ſtate, under pretenſe that the majority of conſpirators were Papiſts.

The Spaniſh embaſſador found to be in the plot. Camden. Hollingſh. p. 1371, &c.

Before Throckmorton was apprehended, he ſent a cabinet full of papers to Mendoza, the Spaniſh embaſſador, whereof the court had notice (1). He denied all at his firſt examination: but at the ſecond confeſſed, "that, going ſome few years ſince to "the Spaw, he confered ſeveral times with Jeney "and ſir Francis Ingleſield, two Engliſh fugitives, "how England might be invaded (2): that after "his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, "told him, the Catholic Princes had formed a de"ſign to free the Queen of Scots, and to imploy "the duke of Guiſe for that purpoſe: that nothing "was wanting, but to know what ſuccors might "be depended on from the Engliſh Catholics: that, "in order to take their meaſures the better, Charles "Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was "ſent into the county of Suſſex, where the duke of "Guiſe intended to land: that he (Throckmorton) "imparted the project to the Spaniſh embaſſador, "who had been already informed of it, and ſhewed "him the ports where it would be propereſt to "land: that he moreover acquainted the ſame em"baſſador with the names of the great men to "whom he might freely open his mind, becauſe, as "he was a public perſon, he would not be ſo nar"rowly watched: finally, that he confered with "him how men might be privately raiſed in Eng"land, to have them ready when the foreign troops "ſhould arrive."

He is ſent for by the council. Camden.

On theſe depoſitions, the Spaniſh embaſſador was cited before the council, where he was told what was alledged againſt him by Throckmorton. As he was undoubtedly conſcious of his not being ſufficiently innocent to clear himſelf from theſe accuſations, he, by way of recrimination, took it into his head to charge the Queen with detaining the Spaniards money ſhe had ſeized, and with aſſiſting the duke of Anjou. Then, he fell foul of the miniſters, ſaying, That, by their ill counſels, they inceſſantly labored to ſow diſcord between the Queen and his Catholic Majeſty. A few days after, Elizabeth ordered him to depart the kingdom, which he readily obeyed, deeming himſelf very happy in coming off ſo eaſily. However, when he was got into France, he loudly complained, as if in England the law of nations had been violated in his perſon. Mean while, the Queen diſpatched Wade (3) to Spain, to inform King Philip of what had paſſed, and to tell him ſhe was ready to receive from him another embaſſador. But the Catholic King denied audience to this envoy, who alſo in his turn refuſed imparting to the prime miniſter the contents of his embaſſy.

Elizab. An' 1584.

When Throckmorton was brought upon his trial, he denied what he had confeſſed at his examination, affirming, he had purpoſely invented it to avoid torture: but after his condemnation, on the evidence of his own letters to the Queen of Scots, and papers found in his coffers, he owned all, and even made a more circumſtantial declaration than before; and yet when he came to the gallows, he again denied all he had confeſſed.

Throckmorton executed. July 10. Stow. Camden.

Elizabeth, as ſhe could not doubt her adverſaries were inceſſantly projecting how to deprive her of the crown, and ſet it on the Scotiſh Queen's head, lived in a perpetual uneaſineſs, and under the apprehenſion that ſome one of their ſchemes would finally ſucceed: wherefore, in order to dive deeper into the deſigns of her enemies, ſhe ſeemed inclinable to reſume the negociation commenced with Queen Mary. To this end, ſhe ſent Wade, at his return from Spain, to acquaint her, ſhe was ready to renew the treaty which had been interrupted, and would for that purpoſe very ſpeedily diſpatch to her ſir Walter Mildmay; but withal ſhe let her know, that ſhe inſiſted on two conditions, namely, that ſhe ſhould prevail with the King, her ſon, to grant the pardon promiſed the Ruthven lords, and put a ſtop to the plots of the biſhop of Glaſgow, her embaſſador in France.

Elizabeth renews the negociation with the Queen of Scots, and ſends Wade to her. Camden.

At this time happened the ſurpriſe of Sterling, the impriſonment of earl Goury, and the conſpirators flight into England. Hereupon Elizabeth ſent Beal, to requeſt Queen Mary to intercede with the King her ſon for the fugitives, and inform her of the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, as ſhe had promiſed Wade. Mary anſwered, ſhe had promiſed nothing, but on condition ſhe ſhould be releaſed: that ſhe would readily intercede for the Scotiſh fugitives, provided any advantage would thence accrue either to herſelf or the King her ſon, and that thoſe criminals would confeſs their fault. She did not deny, ſhe had deſired the duke of Guiſe to uſe his indeavors to free her; but ſaid, ſhe knew nothing of his deſigns, nor, if ſhe did, would ſhe diſcover them, except ſhe was aſſured of her deliverance. She beſought Elizabeth to uſe her with more humanity, and deſired the treaty might be concluded with her before the Scots were treated with. Adding finally, that as the King of France had owned and received her embaſſador jointly with her ſon's, as Princes aſſociated, Elizabeth would be pleaſed to get this aſſociation publiſhed in Scotland.

and then Beal. Camden.

Mary's anſwer.

Elizabeth took care not to ſerve her in what ſhe deſired, her aim being only to draw from her a ſollicitation in behalf of the Scotiſh fugitives, and ſome light into the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, on the uncertain hope of the accommodation wherewith ſhe flattered her: but finding ſhe could not any how prevail, ſhe relinquiſhed the negociation as uſeleſs. However, perceiving by Mary's anſwer, that the King of Scotland had accepted the aſſociation, ſhe was afraid ſome dangerous plot was hatching in that kingdom. This was what chiefly induced her to reſolve on gaining the earl of Arran at any rate, wherein ſhe ſucceeded, as has been obſerved.

The negociation broken off.

Not long after, Elizabeth alſo diſcovered that her enemies ceaſed not their practiſes. A certain Scotiſh Jeſuit, named Creighton, paſſing by ſea to Scotland, being attacked by pirates, tore ſome papers he had about him, and threw them over-board: but, by a very extraordinary accident, the wind prevented the ſcattered papers from touching the water, and blew them back into the ſhip, ſome one of whoſe equipage was at the pains of picking them up. Theſe ſcraps being given to Wade, he paſted them together on another paper with no ſmall labor and patience, and by that means a plot was diſcovered, framed by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the duke of Guiſe, to invade England. Whereupon, by the earl of Leiceſter's means, a general aſſociation of men of all degrees and conditions was formed in England, who bound themſelves by oath to proſecute even to death whoſoever ſhould make any attempt againſt her Majeſty Queen Elizabeth.

A general aſſociation in Queen Elizabeth's favor. Camden.

Mary ſends propoſals to Elizabeth. Camden.

The Scotiſh Queen readily perceived that the plots of her friends were diſcovered, ſince the aſſociation was a clear evidence that Elizabeth thought herſelf in danger. As ſhe was afraid ſhe could not avoid the effects of this aſſociation, in caſe it came to be known that ſhe was concerned in theſe conſpiracies, ſhe uſed freſh indeavors to free herſelf from captivity. To that purpoſe ſhe ſent Naue, her ſecretary, to Elizabeth with theſe propoſals:

That if ſhe might be releaſed, ſhe offered to enter into a cloſer amity with the Queen of England: to renounce the title of Queen of England, and never lay claim to the crown of that kingdom ſo long as Elizabeth was living: to ſign the aſſociation: to make a league defenſive with England (ſo far as might ſtand with the alliance between France and Scotland) provided that nothing was done in England to her diſadvantage, before ſhe herſelf, or the King her ſon, was heard in the parliament: to ſtay in England 'till hoſtages were given: to make no change in the religion eſtabliſhed in Scotland, on condition that whatever had been inacted to her diſgrace ſhould be repealed: to recommend to her ſon ſuch counſellors as were inclined to preſerve a good underſtanding with England: to procure a pardon for the fugitives, provided they would own themſelves guilty: to treat of no match for the King her ſon without Elizabeth's knowledge. She required, on her part, that the treaty ſhould be made with her and the King her ſon jointly, and promiſed to have it ratified by the duke of Guiſe. Moreover, ſhe deſired matters might be ſpeedily concluded, for fear ſome accident ſhould obſtruct the treaty. Finally, ſhe beſought Queen Elizabeth to give her ſome token of her eſteem, by granting her a little more liberty.

Remark on this ſubject.

Had Mary made theſe offers at any other time, Elizabeth would poſſibly have liſtened to them: but, in the preſent juncture, they only ſerved to increaſe her ſuſpicions, ſince it was evident they purely aroſe from a dread inſtilled into the priſoner, by the aſſociation and diſcovery of theſe conſpiracies.

P. 499.

Camden pretends, contrary to all appearance, that Elizabeth, being ſatisfied with theſe propoſals, was on the point of giving Mary her liberty, had ſhe not been prevented by the clamors of the Scots. Hence he takes occaſion to make a long invective againſt the Preſbyterians and their preachers, and to accuſe them of inſolence, contempt of the King's perſon, and rebellion againſt the laws. Here alſo he ſpeaks of the ſuppreſſion of Buchanan's writings, a topic quite foreign to the purpoſe. Finally, he would have Preſbytery to be conſidered as the ſole cauſe of the obſtacles to Mary's deliverance, ſpite of Elizabeth's good intentions towards her. This is no wonder, it being the modiſh ſtile in England during the reign of James I, to whom court was made by exclaiming againſt the Puritans. I however acknowledge it not to be abſolutely improbable that, on this occaſion, Elizabeth even ſet the Scots on forming the obſtacles mentioned here by Camden: but it is very unlikely that, at a time when ſhe ſaw her enemies in league againſt her to place Mary, tho' a priſoner, on the Engliſh throne, ſhe ſhould really intend to releaſe her, and ſo inable her the better to execute her deſigns. To take Elizabeth's diſſimulation for her real intention was a mere artifice of Camden, thereby to inſinuate that ſhe deemed Mary innocent of the machinations which were perpetually framing: but he contradicts himſelf by ſaying, a little after, that Mary, loſing all hope of agreement, finally liſtened to dangerous counſels, and wrote to the Pope, and King of Spain, ſolliciting them "to haſten what they had in hand "with all ſpeed, let what would happen to her." It is therefore evident that ſhe was conſcious of ſome project already on foot, and had given ear to thoſe pernicious counſels before the time mentioned by Camden. But the Queen of England, better informed than Mary imagined, knowing what meaſures were taken to carry her off, removed this dangerous priſoner from the earl of Shrewſbury, and commited her to the cuſtody of ſir Drue Drury, a man of vigilance, if ever any was ſuch (1). Camden ſays that Leiceſter, at once deſirous of freeing Elizabeth from thoſe anxieties which the Scotiſh Queen created her, bribed certain ruffians to aſſaſſinate the priſoner; but as none durſt give them orders for leave to approach her, Drury's watchfulneſs obſtructed their geting acceſs to her. If this denotes the earl of Leiceſter's villany, and perhaps, in Camden's intention, that of Elizabeth herſelf, it likewiſe manifeſts how dangerous a perſon the Queen of Scots was deemed, ſince it was thought Elizabeth's life could not be ſafe but by her death: it is not therefore likely that Elizabeth ſhould then even dream of ſeting her at liberty. The ſame author ſays, that, intirely to alienate Queen Elizabeth's affection from the Queen of Scots, it was whiſpered in her ears, that a reſolution was taken to deprive her of the crown, and ſet it on Mary's head: that a council had been held, wherein cardinal Allen for the Engliſh eccleſiaſtics, Inglefield for the laity, and the biſhop of Roſs for the Scotiſh Queen, all three impowered by the Pope and King of Spain, had agreed that Elizabeth ſhould be aſſaſſinated, King James depoſed, and Mary given in marriage to ſome Engliſh Catholic nobleman: that this nobleman ſhould be elected King of England, and the crown ſettled on his heirs. He adds, Walſingham diligently inquired who this Engliſh nobleman might be, and that the ſuſpicion fell on Henry Howard, brother to the late duke of Norfolk (2).

In this diſtreſs, the ſtates, finding it utterly impoſſible to ſupport themſelves with their own forces, debated whether they ſhould put themſelves under the protection of France or England, and finally reſolved for France: but Henry III was then involved in troubles which admited not his accepting their offer; ſo, finding no incouragement from that quarter, they were forced to apply to the Queen of England. We ſhall ſee next year the ſucceſs of this negociation.

Affairs of France. Mezerai. Thuanus. Hollingſh. P. Daniel.

The commotions wherewith France had been ſo long agitated, and which ſeemed to be ſomewhat appeaſed, were renewed by the duke of Anjou's death, occurring in June. As King Henry had no iſſue, and was preſumed incapable of having any, the duke of Guiſe projected to ſeize the throne, as deſcended from Charles the Great: this at leaſt is what diverſe have charged him with, not without great probability. But as Henry of Bourbon, King of Navarre, was become firſt Prince of the blood, ſince the duke of Anjou's demiſe, a pretenſe was to be found to exclude him from the throne, otherwiſe it would not be poſſible for the duke of Guiſe to execute his project. It was not difficult to find a pretext, ſince the King of Navarre profeſſed the Reformed religion: ſo Guiſe, covering his ambition with the cloke of religion, pretended to have no other view but to maintain the Catholic creed, which would be in the utmoſt peril if a Hugonot aſcended the throne. The King, who knew his deſign, did all he poſſibly could to perſuade the King of Navarre to change his religion, and Guiſe, perceiving indeavors were uſed to break his meaſures, renewed the league firſt at Paris, and then in the provinces: by this means he could have an army ready on the firſt occaſion; the people being ſo ſtupidly infatuated as to imagine he only aimed at preſerving of the Chatholic religion. Mean while the duke of Guiſe, having notice that the King deſigned to arreſt him, withdrew to his government of Champagne, where on the laſt day of December he ſigned a private league with the King of Spain, who, under a religious pretext, ſought only to foment the troubles in France: but as Guiſe would not have it thought that he aſpired to the crown, the treaty ran, that the cardinal of Bourbon ſhould be raiſed to the throne, on Henry III's deceaſe, and, to that end, the King of Spain ſhould find fifty thouſand crowns monthly. Thus, by means of the duke of Guiſe, Philip II kindled in France a flame which long devoured that kingdom, and hindered the French from thinking on acquiſitions in the Netherlands (1).

An' 1585. Parry's conſpiracy. Camden.

In the begining of 1585, Elizabeth diſcovered a conſpiracy, whereof William Parry was the author. He was a gentleman of Wales, member of the houſe of commons, and had ſignaliſed his zeal for the Catholic religion in oppoſing alone a bill prefered in the lower houſe againſt the Jeſuits. He ſpake on that occaſion with ſo much paſſion and vehemency, that he was commited to cuſtody (2), but was, in a few days, re-admited into the houſe. Scarcely had he regained liberty, when Edmund Nevil *, who claimed the inheritance of the earl of Weſtmoreland, lately deceaſed in the Netherlands, accuſed him of conſpiring againſt the Queen; whereupon he was ſent to the Tower. He owned, "he "had a deſign to kill the Queen, and was perſuaded "to it by Morgan, a Popiſh refugee in France; "that he held intelligence with Jeſuits, the Pope's "nuncios and cardinals (3); that the better to de"ceive the Queen, and procure free acceſs to her "perſon, he returned from France into England, "and diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to her; that "afterwards, repenting of his wicked intention, "he laid aſide his dagger every time he waited "on her, leſt he ſhould be tempted to commit the "murder; but, at length, cardinal Allen's book, "wherein he maintained it to be not only lawful, "but honorable to kill Princes excommunicated, "falling into his hands, he read it, and felt himſelf "ſtrongly incouraged to purſue his firſt deſign; "that Nevil, his accuſer, coming to dine with him "propoſed to attempt ſomething for the Scotiſh "Queen's deliverance, to which he anſwered, he "had a greater deſign in his thoughts; that a few "days after, Nevil coming to ſee him, they re"ſolved to kill the Queen, as ſhe rode abroad to "take the air, and on the Bible ſwore ſecreſy; but "that, in the interim, Nevil, hearing the news of "the earl of Weſtmoreland's death, accuſed him, March 2. "in hopes of procuring the earl's inheritance, to "which he laid claim." Upon this confeſſion, he was condemned and executed.

This conſpiracy occaſioned the parliament to take extraordinary care of the Queen's and kingdom's welfare. The general aſſociation was admited, approved, and confirmed by unanimous conſent. It was likewiſe inacted, that at leaſt "twenty-four commiſſioners, choſen and appointed "by the Queen, ſhould make inquiſition concern"ing thoſe who ſhould excite rebellions in the "kingdom, attempt againſt the Queen's life, or "claim any right to the crown of England. "That the perſon for whom, or by whom any "attempt ſhould be made, ſhould be utterly in"capable of ſucceeding to the crown, deprived "for ever of all right and title to it, and proſe"cuted to death, if declared guilty by the ſaid "twenty-four commiſſioners."

The parliament confirms the aſſociation. Act againſt Queen Mary.

It was impoſſible not to perceive that they here aimed directly at the Queen of Scots, for whoſe ſake all theſe combinations were forming; wherefore, very probably, from this time her death began to be determined; the two Queens being no longer able to ſubſiſt together; at leaſt the council of England were of this opinion. Mary doubted not that the law was inacted againſt her. Perhaps ſhe would have prevented the fatal effects of it, could ſhe have reſolved to renounce all correſpondence in the kingdom, and in foreign countries: but ſhe had not the prudence to take this wiſe courſe, or poſſibly to avoid the ſnares laid for her, nor was quick-ſighted enough to perceive ſhe only ſerved for a blind to her pretended friends to execute other projects.

The parliament was not contented with this ſevere ſtatute for her Majeſty's preſervation. It was farther inacted, "That all Popiſh prieſts ſhould "depart the realm within forty days: that thoſe "who ſhould afterwards return, ſhould be guilty "of high-treaſon: that to receive or harbor them "ſhould be felony." It was declared alſo, "That "thoſe who were educated in foreign ſeminaries,

This is the moſt rigorous act againſt the Catholics during Queen Elizabeth's reign: but they could blame only themſelves, or rather the indiſcrete zeal of ſome among them, who never ceaſed ploting againſt her, and laboring to ſet the Scotiſh Queen on the throne of England. Even this ſtatute ſufficed not to ſtop them, 'till they finally carried their zeal to ſuch a height, that the deſtruction of one of the Queens became abſolutely neceſſary for the other's preſervation.

The earl of Arundel apprehended. April 25. Camden. Stow. p. 703.

Philip earl of Arundel, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Norfolk, had, thro' the Queen's grace and favor, been reſtored in blood (1) and to his father's eſtate, three years before: but he afterwards turned Papiſt; and being twice cited before the council to anſwer to certain accuſations entered againſt him, was confined to his houſe. Six months after he was releaſed, and came to the houſe of peers, but withdrew the very firſt day, to avoid being preſent at the ſermon. As he was vehemently bigoted to the religion he had imbraced, he reſolved to quit the kingdom to injoy its free exerciſe, and before his departure wrote a letter to the Queen, which was not to be delivered 'till after his departure. This letter abounded with complaints that his innocence was oppreſſed. He ſaid; "that, to avoid the misfortune befallen his "grandfather and father, and to ſerve God with "freedom, according to his conſcience, he had re-"ſolved to quit the kingdom, but not his allegiance "to his Sovereign." But his own ſervants betraying him, he was, when juſt ready to imbark, apprehended and ſent to the Tower.

Elizabeth menaced from diverſe quarters. Camden.

The calm Elizabeth had for ſome years injoyed, began to be converted into ſtorms, which threatened her from all quarters. To three principal cauſes this change muſt be aſcribed. The firſt was the duke of Guiſe's power, which was little inferior to that of the French King himſelf. A ſecond cauſe may be imputed to the flouriſhing condition of Philip II, who, after acquiring the crown of Portugal, was on the point of reducing to his obedience the revolted Netherland provinces. The third was the hopes wherewith Elizabeth's enemies flattered themſelves of gaining the Scotiſh King, and making uſe of him to invade England. I mention not the court of Rome, or the Engliſh Papiſts, who conſtantly remained in the ſame diſpoſition, ſo there was not in that reſpect any novelty. The Queen of Scots was ever the ſtumbling-block. It was ſhe who gave birth to all the machinations. Her deliverance from captivity was deſired, in order to ſet on her head the crowns of England and Scotland, and by her means reſtore Popery in both kingdoms. Such were the projects of Elizabeth's adverſaries. She could not thereof be ignorant, ſince they had purſued them from the very begining of her reign; as, on her part, ſhe had made it her whole buſineſs to break their meaſures: but ſome advantages which ſhe had hitherto injoyed began to fail her. Theſe were firſt, the jealouſy between the crowns of France and Spain, which had reſtrained both from attacking her openly. Secondly, the French Hugonots had been able to ſupport themſelves, and diſable that court from making any attempt upon England. Thirdly, while the Netherland confederates affairs were proſperous, they had ſo imployed the Spaniſh forces, that it was not poſſible for Philip to think ſeriouſly of foreign enterpriſes. But, at the time I am ſpeaking of, the ſcene was quite changed. France was in ſuch a ſituation as left Elizabeth no room any longer to build her ſafety on the jealouſy between the French and Spaniſh crowns, that foundation becoming too feeble. The duke of Guiſe, her mortal enemy, was more powerful in France even than the King himſelf, and was moreover ſupported by the Spaniard. In all probability, the Hugonots would be utterly cruſhed, and the Netherlands ſoon brought under the Spaniſh yoke, which once effected, England would indubitably be invaded. Elizabeth was therefore to think betimes of preventing the impending danger, or reſolve to ſuſtain alone the efforts of her enemies. Prudence required that ſhe ſhould previouſly attempt averting thoſe attacks which were preparing againſt her, without however neglecting the means of withſtanding them, if ſhe ſhould be forced to it. The ſcheme ſhe laid was this, as in the ſequel will plainly appear. Firſt, ſhe reſolved to make alliances, if poſſible, with the two Northern crowns and the German Proteſtants, even were it only to excite jealouſies in her enemies. Secondly, to ſend the confederate Netherlanders a powerful ſuccor, to keep the King of Spain imployed in thoſe provinces. Thirdly, to aſſiſt the French Hugonots, to obſtruct their being too eaſily oppreſſed, being very ſenſible the duke of Guiſe would be unable to attempt her while the civil wars found him imployment in France. Laſtly, ſhe thought there was no better way to break her enemies meaſures, than indeavoring, if poſſible, to have the Scotiſh King in her power, or, if that failed, exciting in Scotland diſturbances which ſhould prevent that young Prince's framing projects detrimental to England. It is likewiſe extremely probable that this was the very time when Mary's death was determined, since her life was the foundation of all the plots against Elizabeth, both at home and abroad; at least, if it was not then fully resolved on, very seemingly Elizabeth and her council were determined not to spare that Queen when the necessity of affairs required her being sacrificed to the public safety. This I acknowledge is barely a conjecture; but it is grounded on the then situation of Elizabeth's affairs.

Elizabeth sends Bodley into Germany. Camden.

To execute the first part of her scheme, she sent sir Thomas Bodley into Germany and Denmark, to indeavor persuading the Protestant Powers to make a league defensive with England (1). Among other instructions, he had orders to acquaint the King of Denmark, that the duke of Lorrain, when he courted Queen Elizabeth, pretended a right to the crown of Denmark, as grandson of Christiern II, by his daughter. I know not the success of Bodley's negociations; but as Elizabeth was extremely frugal of her treasure, she possibly used not the propereſt means to gain the German Princes to her interest. As for the second and third articles of Elizabeth's scheme, relating to France and the Netherlands, they shall presently be touched on. With regard to the fourth, concerning Scotland, we find it explained in Melvil's memoirs, if we may however give intire credit to this writer, who seems not a little prejudiced against Elizabeth.

She attempts to frustrate King James's project of marriage. Melvil, p. 158, 161.

The King of Scotland, being determined on marrying, cast his eyes on the eldest daughter of his Danish Majesty, who having thereof some notice, concluded on sending to Scotland an embassy under color of treating a firm alliance between the two kingdoms, and withal to give King James opportunity to propose his marriage. Melvil pretends that Elizabeth, having intelligence of the project, resolved to use her indeavors to render it abortive (2). Not that this match was any way unsuitable for the King of Scotland, but it imported Elizabeth that he should not marry at all, except he would take some English lady of her chusing, or rather, she wished to have him in her power before he married. She therefore wrote to him, "That, in order to "preserve a constant good understanding between "him and herself, she intended to send a person "who should reside at his court in quality of her "embassador, not to trouble his Majesty with "business, but entertain him with pleasant dis-"courses, and bear him company in his recreations: Camden. Spotswood. "that she had chosen for that purpose Edward "Wotton, a man of wit and a great traveller, "imagining he would be very proper to divert "him agreably, and hoped he would take great Melvil, p. 159. "delight in his conversation." Melvil, who was ordered to receive this agent, remembered to have seen him formerly at Paris, at his uncle Dr. Wotton's, the English embassador; and that, young as he was, he had over-reached that stanch old states-man constable Montmorency (3). Of this he warned King James, who regarded it not: on the contrary, this embassador partook of all his pleasures, and became a sort of favorite. p. 161.

Affairs of Scotland. p. 162, &c.

The Danish embassy being arrived in Scotland, Wotton, and some of James's ministers, procured those Danes to receive so many mortifications, that they were on the point of returning in very great discontent. But Melvil, informing them how matters stood, persuaded them to have patience; and indeed James, being afterwards undeceived of p. 165, 166. some notions instilled into him against the King of Denmark, sent them back better satisfied. He soon after dispatched away to the said Prince, Peter Young *, his almoner, to thank him for his embassy, and to acquaint him, that he would very speedily send him proper embassadors. The real motive of Young's voyage was to see the King of Denmark's two daughters, and inform his royal master of their qualifications.

* Our author misnames him Patric.

During this interim, the earl of Arran's credit sensibly decreased, by the address of Gray his rival, who was a greater proficient at managing King James than himself. Moreover, Wotton contributed, to the utmost of his ability, towards ruining that favorite; for, beside Elizabeth's having no farther need of him since she had won Gray, he was a man on whom she could not much rely. Also a certain occurrence, on the borders, proved extremely prejudicial to Arran. Thomas Carr, laird of Fernihurst, who had married his niece, being in conference with sir Francis Russel (4), the earl of Bedford's son, on affairs relating to both kingdoms, one of the English was taken in the very act of pilfering; and this occasioned between the two convoys a scuffle (5), wherein Russel lost his life. The English embassador was very clamorous on the matter, pretending the earl of Arran had excited his nephew to commence this quarrel purely to create a rupture between the two kingdoms. On his complaints, the earl of Arran was confined to his own house, and Fernihurst sent to prison, where he soon after died.

July 16.

Elizabeth, being informed of this fact, demanded a solemn reparation. James did not refuse it: but pretended he could not come to any decision 'till he had proofs. This was no easy matter, by reason of the custom, elsewhere mentioned, which allowed not the evidence of the English against the Scots, or of the Scots against the English, concerning what passed on the borders. This difficulty causing the affair to be prolonged, and the earl of Arran having his liberty, Elizabeth took occasion to permit the Scotish exiles, who had taken sanctuary in England, to return home. Wotton being informed of the Queen's design, labored to corrupt several Scotish courtiers, and gain them to Elizabeth's interest. If Melvil is to be credited, the King's greatest confidents were of this number. Wherefore Wotton, finding himself so well supported, formed the project of surprising the King in Sterling Park and carrying him into England: but, being disappointed, he determined on forcing the castle guards, and had already prepared all things necessary to execute his design, when James, having thereof some notice, broke his measures by a sudden departure from Sterling. Then Wotton, finding himself discovered, privately retired without taking leave. This was the person whom Elizabeth sent King James, to entertain and divert him!

But all the danger was not over. James was surrounded by such as corresponded with the fugitives, and hindered him from providing for his safety. The fugitive lords were now entered Scotland, where they had drawn together three thousand men, and were marching directly to Sterling, whither the King was returned, without the least precaution taken at court to obstruct their progress. This negligence, owing to such traitors as James had about him, afforded the male-contents opportunity to present themselves at the gates of Sterling; whereupon his Majeſty, being thus unexpectedly ſurpriſed, was forced to put himſelf into their hands: but the earl of Arran luckily found leiſure to eſcape. The male-contents having the King in their power, treated him with ſuch reſpect and ſubmiſſion, that they finally perſuaded him they were not his enemies, as he had been made believe. He acknowledged having been miſled by Arran's pernicious counſels, and conſented that the exiles ſhould be reſtored to their eſtates. By this revolution, Elizabeth had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the Scotiſh King guided by counſellors from whom ſhe had nothing to apprehend, whereas before ſhe was under a perpetual dread with reſpect to the affairs of that kingdom. Soon after, colonel Stuart, going to Copenhagen, began there a treaty concerning King James's marriage with one of the Daniſh Princeſſes.

Treaty about James's marriage. Melvil. p. 171.

Mean while, the united provinces affairs were in a ſituation ſo dangerous, that the ſtates could no longer hope to make head againſt the Catholic King, if they were not effectually aſſiſted. Henry III having refuſed the ſovereignty offered him by the ſtates, they applied to Elizabeth, who alſo refuſed it, for fear of ingaging in a work too imbaraſſing. She well comprehended that the war, which ſhe muſt neceſſarily carry on againſt Spain for the preſervation of this Sovereignty, would involve her in exceſſive expenſes, which ſhe ſhould not be at liberty to leſſen as ſhe pleaſed. She choſe rather, in purſuance of her ſcheme, to give the ſtates a powerful aid, and the King of Spain a diverſion, becauſe this aid might be increaſed or diminiſhed anſwerably to the ſituation of her affairs. She made therefore a treaty with them, promiſing to find them five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, under command of an Engliſh general. It was agreed, ſhe ſhould pay theſe troops during the war, on condition of being reimburſed when the war was ended, in the following payments; the firſt year of the peace, all the monies advanced in the firſt year of the war, and the reſt in four years: that, for ſecurity of payment, Fluſhing and Rammekins in Zealand, and the Briel in Holland, ſhould be delivered into her hands: that the governors ſhe placed there (1), ſhould exerciſe no authority over the inhabitants: that all the ſums being reimburſed, theſe places ſhould be reſtored, not to the King of Spain, but to the ſtates: that the Engliſh general, and two others of her nomination, ſhould have a place in the council of ſtate, and no peace or truce be made without mutual conſent: that if the Queen ſhould put to ſea a fleet, the ſtates ſhould therewith join a like number of ſhips, under command of the Engliſh admiral: laſtly, that the ports ſhould be open and free to both nations (2).

Elizabeth's treaty with the ſtates. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 793, &c. Camden. Speed. p. 855.

This treaty being concluded, Elizabeth appointed for general of her auxiliary forces the earl of Leiceſter, for whom ſhe had ever a great affection; but he arrived not in Flanders 'till towards the end of this year. Some time after, ſhe publiſhed a manifeſto, wherein, as a reaſon for her aiding the confederate provinces, ſhe alledges, that the alliance between the Kings of England and the Netherland Princes was not ſo much between their perſons, as between their reſpective ſtates: whence ſhe infered, that, without breach of this alliance, ſhe might aſſiſt the inhabitants of thoſe provinces laboring under the Spaniards oppreſſion.

The earl of Leiceſter made general of the Engliſh troops. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 799. Elizabeth's manifeſto. Stow. Comp. Hiſt. Vol. II. p. 654.

However, as ſhe judged this reaſon would not be ſatisfactory to his Catholic Majeſty, and that undoubtedly he would conſider this extraordinary aid given his rebellious ſubjects as a declaration of war, ſhe reſolved on being beforehand. To that purpoſe, ſhe equiped a fleet of twenty-one warlike ſhips, whereon were imbarked two thouſand three hundred ſoldiers, beſide mariners, to carry war into America, where the Spaniards little expected any ſuch attack. The fleet was commanded by the earl of Carliſle, who had under him the famous ſir Francis Drake (3). The Engliſh immediately took St. Jago, one of the Cape Verd iſlands. They then ſailed to St. Domingo, or Hiſpaniola, and poſſeſſed themſelves of its capital. Having paſſed there all January of the year 1586, they departed and took Carthagena. Then they burned the towns of St. Antonio, and St. Helena in Florida. A furious tempeſt diſperſing the fleet, as they were going upon new exploits, they joined not again 'till their arrival in England (4), where they brought a booty valued at ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling; but ſeven hundred Engliſh periſhed in this expedition.

Davis's ſtreight in the north. Camden.

Before I leave the year 1585, it will be neceſſary to touch on the tranſactions of France. After Guiſe had concluded his treaty with the King of Spain, he tried all ways to corrupt the French, and gain them to his party. His aim was to ſeize the crown, either before or after Henry III's death. He could not expect that the King, who mortally hated him, would countenance his deſign; and, on the other hand, he had no manner of color to aſpire to the crown, except his pretended deſcent from the houſe of Charles the Great: and, even in that caſe, the duke of Lorrain, head of that houſe, would have preceded him. To aſſert therefore ſo extraordinary a title, the peoples affection and a religious zeal were to ſupply all defects, otherwiſe there was not the leaſt appearance that, in cold blood, the French ſhould fill their vacant throne with a foreign Prince, in prejudice of the King of Navarre, and Prince of Condé, both who profeſſed the reformation, having publicly abjured Popery. Mean while, as the duke of Guiſe thought not proper to divulge his real deſigns, he publiſhed a manifeſto in cardinal De Bourbon's name, wherein he pretended to demonſtrate, that the Gallic crown, on King Henry's demiſe, rightfully appertained to the ſaid cardinal: not that he was in the leaſt diſpoſed to place him on the throne; but it was ſufficient if he could previouſly ſet aſide the King of Navarre. That done, under color of preventing the crown being poſſeſſed by a Heretic, he ſeized diverſe places, pretending however, it was for the King's ſervice, and public benefit.

ſome time, accuſtomed himſelf, made him loſe the eſteem of moſt of his ſubjects. The intrigues of Guiſe, who repreſented him as a favorer of heretics, becauſe he ſupported the Bourbon title, helped alſo to alienate from him his peoples hearts. Laſtly, the court of Rome, with both regular and ſecular eccleſiaſtics, were for the duke of Guiſe, and favored him to the very extent of their ability: inſomuch that Henry III, unable to reſiſt, was forced to abandon the King of Navarre, publiſh a ſevere edict againſt the Hugonots, and join with the duke to work their extirpation: nay, he had the mortification to be obliged to give him the command of his army.

Elizabeth aids the Hugonots. Camden. Thuanus.

The King of Navarre and the Hugonots, finding themſelves thus attacked, aſſembled all their forces to defend themſelves: but theſe forces were ſo inconſiderable, in compariſon of their adverſaries, that there was no likelihood of their making any long reſiſtance. The Prince of Condé, attempting to relieve the caſtle of Angers, then beſieged, was ſuddenly ſurrounded by enemies, and forced to ſteal away from his army and paſs over to England. Elizabeth gave him a moſt courteous reception, and, as ſhe knew the Hugonots adverſaries were alſo hers, promiſed him aſſiſtance (1). It was not without reaſon that ſhe intereſted herſelf in the Hugonots affairs, ſince the league was not limited to their deſtruction only, but aimed at the ruin of the Proteſtant religion throughout Europe, and in England particularly; whereof this very year had produced one moſt convincing proof. Gregory XIII dying in April, Sixtus V, his ſucceſſor, inſtantly fulminated holy mother church's cenſures againſt the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé, ſtiling them not only heretics and relapſes, but alſo a ſpurious generation. Hence might readily be comprehended how far this Pontif countenanced Guiſe's deſigns, and the Queen of England might infer what great reaſon ſhe had for apprehenſion ſhould this duke one day aſcend the Gallic throne, being ſupported by Rome and the Spaniard. On this account it was, ſhe ſupplied the Prince of Condé with fifty thouſand crowns, to aſſiſt him in maintaining the war, and lent him ten ſhips, with which he raiſed the blocade of Rochelle.

Elizabeth diſlikes the authority given by the ſtates to Leiceſter. Grotius. Camden. Strada. Stow. p. 712. Hollingſh. p. 1420.

The earl of Leiceſter, arriving in Holland early in 1586, was received as a guardian angel. The ſtates, under color of expreſſing their grateful acknowledgment to Elizabeth, declared him governor and captain-general of Holland, Zealand, and the united provinces, and inveſted him with a power almoſt abſolute (2). Very ſeemingly, their aim was to ingage her Majeſty farther than ſhe intended. She had refuſed the offered Sovereignty, and it was deſigned to give her at leaſt a ſhadow of it, whether ſhe would or no, by honoring her general with what in ſome meaſure favored of ſovereign authority: but Elizabeth knew better than to be inſnared by this artifice. She ſharply complained to the ſtates of this ſort of deceit, and gave withal the earl of Leiceſter a ſevere reprimand for accepting thoſe honors without having firſt conſulted her. She told him, he had acted directly contrary to her intention, ſince ſhe had publicly declared in her manifeſto, that ſhe was ready to relieve her diſtreſſed neighbors, but never thought of aſſuming over them any prerogative (3). The ſtates excuſed themſelves, by ſaying, That the neceſſity of their affairs had obliged them to confer ſuch authority on the earl of Leiceſter, that he might be the better able to heal their diviſions, which put them in continual danger of periſhing: that they could not revoke the authority granted to her general without great inconveniences, and had not however diveſted themſelves of the ſupreme power. The earl of Leiceſter appeaſed her Majeſty by his ſubmiſſions. In fine, ſhe conſented the patent ſhould ſubſiſt; but intimated to the ſtates, they vainly hoped to induce her to accept the Sovereignty of their country, and that her intention was to keep within the bounds ſhe had preſcribed to herſelf, that is, not to be obliged to aſſiſt them any farther than her affairs would permit.

The earl of Leiceſter, a perſon exceſſively proud and ambitious, was no ſooner clothed with this exorbitant power, than he began ſecretly to form projects deſtructive to the liberties of the country he came to defend: at leaſt, this is what was laid to his charge by all the Dutch hiſtorians. They pretend, his deſign was to render himſelf Sovereign or Perpetual Dictator of the provinces with whoſe government he had been intruſted: and the methods he uſed to effect it were ſuch as cauſed in that country a general diſcontent. In ſhort, after the campain, wherein he performed no great exploits, he returned to England, to take proper meaſures to facilitate the execution of his projects, and, ſeemingly, to perſuade the Queen to ſupport him (4).

While France and the Netherlands were in commotion, Elizabeth wiſely provided for her own and her peoples ſecurity. This ſhe did not only by aſſiſting the Hugonots and the confederate provinces, but alſo by preventing the dangers which might come from Scotland, in caſe the King of Spain and duke of Guiſe ſhould ever be in a condition to invade her (5). The preſent juncture was perfectly favorable. The King of Scotland had none about him but perſons well-affected to the Reformed religion, and the intereſt of England: wherefore this opportunity, of ſtrictly uniting the two kingdoms, was not to be neglected; this union being of the greateſt conſequence to Elizabeth. Accordingly, ſhe diſpatched Randolph to King James, to repreſent to him, that the Reformation's adverſaries, openly combining for its deſtruction, it was the intereſt of the Proteſtant ſtates to unite alſo for their common defenſe: that England and Scotland were the bulwarks of the true belief, and the union of their forces the only poſſible means to preſerve it: that therefore, ſhe thought it their common intereſt to join in a league, for the defenſe of their religion, againſt all who ſhould attempt to ſubvert it, at leaſt in England and Scotland. The better to perſuade James to comply with the Queen's deſires, Randolph told him that, as his revenues were greatly diminiſhed, by reaſon of the troubles which had ſo long afflicted his realm, her Majeſty was willing to allow him a penſion, to aſſiſt him in ſupporting his dignity (6). the propoſitions made him, but with the proviſo that nothing ſhould be done in England in prejudice to his right to the crown of that kingdom, and this article, with that of the penſion, be inſerted in the treaty. Randolph replied, he believed that would not be poſſible. Touching the penſion he ſaid, if it was mentioned in the treaty, it would ſeem as if her Majeſty was become tributary to Scotland, to which ſhe would never conſent. As to the ſucceſſion article, the Queen could not ſettle it by public treaty, without her parliament's concurrence, and the diſcuſſion of that affair might too long retard the treaty, and perhaps give birth to great difficulties, becauſe of his mother Queen Mary's religion: but he queſtioned not his royal miſtreſs would be very willing to gratify him in thoſe two particulars, by means of two ſecret articles. James being ſatisfied with this expedient, Deſneval, the French embaſſador, did all he poſſibly could to diſſuade him from this league. He told him, that Elizabeth's aim in this negociation was only to ſecure herſelf from the attacks of thoſe who were combined for his royal mother's deliverance. That it was ſtrange he ſhould think of uniting with a Queen, who held in durance his mother, againſt thoſe who were laboring to free her from captivity: adding, that the King his maſter could not but conſider this league as a very expreſs violation of the ancient alliance between France and Scotland. James anſwered, that the Queen his mother's misfortunes proceeded wholly from thoſe who profeſſed themſelves her friends, yet, under color of ſerving her, only aimed at executing their own projects: that, as to the alliance between France and Scotland, he did not ſee wherein he ſhould violate it, ſince France pretended it not to be violated when that court, without giving him the leaſt notice, concluded a league defenſive with England.

King James's anſwer.

James being determined on complying with what Queen Elizabeth deſired, the plenipotentiaries of both kingdoms met at Berwick, and ſigned a treaty of alliance and ſtricter amity between the two crowns.

Treaty of league between Elizabeth and James Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 803. Camden.

The motive of this treaty was that, whereas the Potentates, who ſtiled themſelves Catholics, were entered into leagues for extirpating the Proteſtant religion, not only in their own dominions, but alſo in foreign countries, it was neceſſary, the Proteſtants ſhould unite for its defenſe: that therefore the Queen of England and King of Scotland did agree on the following articles:

I. By this treaty, they ſhould be obliged to defend the evangelical religion againſt all thoſe who ſhall attack it in either kingdom.

II. This league ſhall be offenſive and defenſive againſt thoſe who ſhall hinder the free exerciſe of the ſaid religion in either of the two kingdoms, all other treaties and alliances to the contrary notwithſtanding.

III. If one of the two parties be invaded, the other ſhall not, directly or indirectly, aſſiſt the invader, notwithſtanding any alliance or treaty formerly entered into.

IV. If England be invaded in any parts remote from Scotland, the King of Scotland ſhall find the Queen of England two thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot, at the Queen's charges from the day of their entering England; and, in the like caſe, her Majeſty ſhall ſend the King of Scotland ſix thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe.

V. If England be invaded in any place within ſixty miles of Scotland, the Scotiſh King ſhall draw together all his forces, and join the ſame with her Majeſty's, in order to purſue the invaders for thirty days ſucceſſively, or, if neceſſity requires, for ſo long time as the vaſſals of Scotland are bound to furniſh the King with troops for the kingdom's defenſe.

VI. If Ireland be invaded, the Scotiſh King ſhall hinder the inhabitants of the county of Argyle from entering that iſland in a hoſtile manner.

VII. Their ſaid Majeſties ſhall mutually deliver all rebels, who ſhall have made any traiterous attempts againſt either of the realms, or at leaſt they ſhall compel them to quit their reſpective dominions.

VIII. Within ſix months, commiſſioners ſhall be ſent to compound and adjuſt all differences which have occurred on the borders between the two nations.

IX. Neither of the two Princes ſhall make any treaty to the prejudice of any articles of this preſent league, without the other party's conſent.

X. This treaty ſhall be ratified on both ſides by letters-patent.

XI. This preſent league ſhall not in any reſpect derogate from former treaties between the two realms, or from thoſe before made by the ſaid two crowns with any Princes or ſtates; what relates to religion only excepted: as to the article touching religion, it is agreed, this alliance and league, offenſive and defenſive, ſhall remain firm and inviolate.

XII. This treaty ſhall be confirmed by the ſtates of Scotland, as ſoon as the King ſhall attain to the age of twenty-five years; and, in like manner, her Majeſty ſhall get it approved by the parliaments of England and Ireland.

Soon after this league was concluded, a conſpiracy was diſcovered in England which coſt Queen Mary her life. As this is one of the moſt important events of Elizabeth's reign, it will be neceſſary to be very circumſtantial in our narrative: but it is greatly to be lamented the particulars muſt unavoidably be drawn from the annals of Elizabeth, compiled by Camden, a writer much to be ſuſpected in whatever relates to the Queen of Scots. In all the precedent reigns, there is no remarkable event but what is traced, and in ſome meaſure cleared by Rymer, in his collection of public acts: but with reſpect to this, all the acts relating to Queen Mary are utterly deſtroyed (1). On the other hand, James I, ſon of Mary, ſucceeding Elizabeth, not one Engliſh writer durſt, during his reign, exhibit the truth of what paſſed in the former, while its memory was yet freſh. Camden was the only perſon who undertook to publiſh the annals of Queen Elizabeth's reign, not ſo much to make known as to diſguiſe the events, as far as they concerned Mary, and to give to whatever ſullied that Queen's reputation, when living, a certain air of innocence. This evidently appears in his account of King Henry Stuart's murder, which has given occaſion to preſume, he has been no more faithful in what he ſays of Mary's trial and death. He however affirms, that he has followed the memoirs of Edward Barker (2) the Queen's principal regiſter; of Thomas Wheeler, public-notary and cryer of the court of Canterbury, and other perſons of credit whom he names not. I know not whether the memoirs he ſpeaks of were ever publiſhed, or are yet extant. Howſoever it be, the following account is, for want of a leſs partial hiſtorian, extracted from Camden's annals.

William Gifford, divinity doctor in the ſeminary at Rheims; Gilbert Gifford (1) and Hodgeſon, Engliſh prieſts, had inſtilled into one John Savage, their countryman, that it would be a meritorious act to kill Elizabeth, and had made him ſwear to do it, during the Eaſter-holy-days this year, 1586 (2). At the ſame time, a certain Engliſh prieſt of that ſeminary, named Ballard, who had been in England, notwithſtanding the prohibition, returned into France, where he had diverſe conferences, with Mendoza and lord Paget, how England might be invaded (3). As the chief end of this conſpiracy was to reſtore Popery in England, the point was not only to deſtroy Queen Elizabeth, but forces alſo were to be ready to free Queen Mary, and place her on the throne of England. Theſe two projects could not be ſeparated. Ballard was accompanied by one Maud, whom he took to be one of his beſt friends, but was in reality a ſpy ſet to work by ſecretary Walſingham.

Camden. Hollingſh.

About Whitſuntide, Ballard was ſent back into England by the conſpirators, to gain proper perſons to facilitate the execution of their project. They told him, he would at London meet with a young gentleman, named Anthony Babington, in whom he might confide. This Babington, who was a zealous Romaniſt, having been lately in France, was gained there by the biſhop of Glaſgow, Queen Mary's embaſſador, and by Morgan, one of the fugitives from England. He was ſo ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in the Scotiſh Queen's favor, that he was judged a perſon qualified for any enterpriſe, and for that reaſon, unknown to himſelf, had been recommended to Mary: wherefore, on his return to England, ſhe wrote to him, and from that time he was imployed to convey to her the letters which came from France, 'till ſhe was commited to the cuſtody of ſir Amias Powlet, and ſir Drue Drury. Then Babington, dreading the vigilance of theſe new keepers, would have nothing more to do with any letters, either to or from her ſaid Majeſty.

Ballard, when he came to England, met Babington, and imparted to him the deſign to invade England, free Queen Mary and advance her to the Engliſh throne. Babington replied, he greatly doubted the poſſibility of executing this project while Queen Elizabeth lived. Whereupon Ballard alſo imparted to him Savage's vow, to which Babington anſwered, it was too hazardous to commit the execution of ſuch a deſign to a ſingle perſon; that there ſhould be ſix at leaſt, and Savage, not to break his vow, might be one of the number (4). Then they confered together how a foreign army might be brought into the kingdom, otherwiſe they judged Elizabeth's death would produce no effect.

Mary's letter to Babington. Camden. * In cypher.

Some few days after, Babington received, by a hand unknown, a letter * from the Scotiſh Queen, blaming him for his ſilence, and deſiring him to ſend her the pacquet of letters from Morgan, brought over by the French embaſſador's ſecretary. This Babington anſwered, and after excuſing his ſilence by reaſon of his fear of Powlet's and Drury's extraordinary vigilance, communicated to her the ſcheme he had formed with Ballard. In a ſecond letter from Mary, of the twenty-ſeventh of July, ſhe highly commended his zeal for the Catholic religion, but adviſed him to attempt nothing 'till he was ſure of foreign aſſiſtance. She withal preſcribed diverſe methods to execute the project, as to ſend privately for the earl of Weſtmoreland, and lord Paget (5). She marked out the way for her deliverance (6), and charged him to promiſe, in her name, a good reward to the ſix aſſaſſines.

Five others ingage to kill the Queen. Camden.

Mean while, Babington had gained ſome other perſons, among whom was Walſingham's ſpy, Polly, by whoſe means that ſecretary was daily informed of what paſſed among the conſpirators. He from him learned, that the ſix who had ingaged to aſſaſſinate the Queen, were, Savage, Tilney, Charnock, Abington, Tichbourn, and Barnwel, and that they were all ſix drawn in one picture, with Babington in the midſt, and a certain motto obſcurely ſignifying their deſign (7): nay, he found means to ſhew this picture to the Queen, who knew only Barnwel * (8). She retained however the idea of their faces ſo well, that walking abroad a little after, and ſeeing one of them, ſhe looked ſtedfaſtly on him, and then, turning to the captain of her guard, ſaid, "Am "not I fairly guarded, not having in my company "a man who wears a ſword?"

* Our author here calls him Maxwell.

Babington was ſo impatient to ſee the foreign ſuccors ready to depart for England, that he gave money to Ballard, who had undertaken to go into France and haſten them. But as it was not eaſy to procure paſſes, Babington found means to be introduced to ſecretary Walſingham, who, being no ſtranger to what he was about, received him very civilly, and expreſſed for him a great value. Incouraged by this kind reception, he deſired a paſs for himſelf, and another for Ballard under a counterfeit name, and affirmed that, by means of his friends at Paris, he ſhould diſcover many ſecrets concerning the Queen of Scots. Walſingham commended his zeal, and promiſed him a good reward if he did the Queen any conſiderable ſervice. He alſo gave him hopes of the paſſes he deſired.

Gifford diſcovers all to Walſingham. Camden.

Polly was the only perſon from whom Walſingham learned the ſecrets of this conſpiracy. Gilbert Gifford, who had been imployed to corrupt Savage, being ſent into England to confirm this reſolution, ſerved at the ſame time to convey letters to the Queen of Scots, and return her anſwers. To make trial of his fidelity, he was at firſt intruſted with ſeveral blank papers, made up like letters; and, as it was known by the anſwers that they were delivered, he was imployed without ſcruple. Some time after, Gifford, whether ſtruck with remorſe, or allured with the hope of reward, came to Walſingham, and informed him of all he knew. The ſecretary received him very kindly, and promiſed to uſe his intereſt for him with her Majeſty, and procure him a good reward. Then inſtructing him who makes uſe of him to deliver Mary's letters, and bring back her anſwers.

how to behave, he ſent him to the place where the Scotiſh Queen was confined, with a letter to ſir Amias Powlet, deſiring him to connive at the bearer's corrupting one of his ſervants to deliver letters to the Queen of Scots, and bring back her anſwers. But Powlet would not ſuffer any of his domeſtics to be concerned in ſuch intrigues. He only hinted at a certain brewer, whom he thought fit for the purpoſe, and who indeed ſuffered himſelf to be gained. By this means, Gifford conveyed to the captive Queen letters, whereof Walſingham had taken copies, and received her anſwers, which were ſerved in the ſame manner. At length, when the court was ſufficiently inſtructed, Ballard was apprehended, under color that, being a Popiſh prieſt, he had entered the kingdom without a licenſe. At this news, Babington was in the utmoſt conſternation: he however recovered from his fright, as it did not appear that Ballard was arreſted for the conſpiracy, and nothing was ſaid at court intimating a diſcovery of the plot. He reſolved therefore to attempt ſaving Ballard, and to that end repreſented to Walſingham, that he would be of great ſervice to him in France, to diſcover the Scotiſh Queen's ſecret practiſes, and ſollicited his liberty. Walſingham laid the blame of Ballard's being arreſted on the watchfulneſs of ſuch ſpies as were imployed to diſcover Romiſh prieſts and Jeſuits. He promiſed to labor procuring his releaſe, and fed him with hopes that the paſſes would very ſpeedily be ready. Mean while, he ſo managed that Babington was narrowly watched. In ſhort, Babington, and all the other conſpirators were ſeized at the ſame time, and, being ſeverally examined, impeached each other, and diſcovered the whole conſpiracy.

The conſpirators arreſted. July. Camden. Stow. Hollingſh.

There is, as I have obſerved, abundance of probability that Queen Elizabeth's council had reſolved on the Queen of Scots death, the very firſt plauſible pretenſe. Her life put Elizabeth's in perpetual danger, and of this there was but too much reaſon to be convinced, by the late diſcoveries: ſo this opportunity was imbraced. Great care was at firſt taken to prevent her being informed of the apprehending thoſe traitors, and now ſir Thomas Gorges, one of the Queen's officers, acquainted her with it juſt as ſhe had taken horſe to be preſent at a hunting match. She would have returned to her apartment, but was not permited (1) 'till all her papers were ſeized and ſent to court. Naue and Curle, her French and Scotiſh ſecretaries, were then alſo ſeized, and, without being ſuffered to ſpeak with her, conducted to London. But to have ſtill more convincing proofs againſt her, a method was uſed, which ſucceeded according to expectation. Gifford having revealed, that he had delivered to the French embaſſador ſeveral papers of moment concerning Queen Mary, a falſe action, no way relating to the conſpiracy, was brought againſt him, for which he was baniſhed the realm. Before his departure, he waited on the embaſſador, and acquainting him with the ſentence paſſed upon him, left a paper cut after a certain manner, and charged him to deliver the Queen of Scots papers to him only who ſhould produce the counter-part, Which counter-part he gave to Walſingham, who by that means got what papers of hers the embaſſador had in his poſſeſſion (2).

Mary's papers all ſeized, with her two ſecretaries. Camden.

Artifice to get Mary's papers from the French embaſſador.

The court being thus ſufficiently informed of all the circumſtances of this conſpiracy, fourteen of the traitors were arraigned, received ſentence of death, and confeſſed all. Care was taken, before their execution, to record all their confeſſions. Naue and Curle, Mary's ſecretaries, being examined, confeſſed they had writ in cypher the letters found in the Queen their miſtreſs's cabinet (3), or by Gifford's means intercepted. Camden inſinuates here, that Curle was bribed by Walſingham with the promiſe of a reward, which he afterwards refuſed to perform. However this be, ſir Edward Wotton was ſent to the court of France, with authentic copies, atteſted by ſeveral peers, of Queen Mary's letters, that he might ſhew them to the King. Probably, theſe letters diſcovered how far the Scotiſh Queen was concerned in this conſpiracy, as alſo her correſpondence with the King of Spain and Guiſe.

Fourteen traitors executed. Camden. Stow. p. 518.

The reſolution being finally taken of trying and condemning Queen Mary (4), as the main ſourſe of all thoſe dangers to which Elizabeth was continually expoſed, it was debated, on what ſtatute ſhe ſhould be proceeded againſt: but there was only one could ſerve for that purpoſe, namely, the act paſſed laſt year, which concerned her in particular. It was a caſe ſo uncommon, to try a foreign Queen, who came not armed into the kingdom, but to ſeek refuge as a ſupplicant, that it would have been in vain to ſearch the ancient ſtatutes for any inſtance to ſerve as a ground-work to ſuch a procedure. This gives occaſion to preſume that the year preceding, when this act was made, Queen Mary's death was already determined, and this ſtatute was to ſerve for foundation to her ſentence: yet ſome pretend that the intent of this act was only to keep her in awe, and let her ſee what ſhe was to expect if ſhe perſevered in her practiſes, and that it was her own fault if ſhe made not good uſe of this warning. Wherefore, in virtue of this act, Elizabeth, by letters patent under the great ſeal, appointed forty-two commiſſioners, with whom ſhe joined five judges of the realm, to try Queen Mary. A few days before, certain lords, as well privy-counſellors as others, fell on their knees, and beſought her to take pity on herſelf, the whole nation, and all their poſterity, by puniſhing the Queen of Scots. It muſt be obſerved that, throughout this whole affair, Elizabeth always pretended to act with reluctance, and from the neceſſity ſhe was under of ſaving her people, whom ſhe beheld in the utmoſt danger; ſo, the proceeding of theſe lords agreed with her deſigns. The Queen's commiſſion ran thus, viz.

It muſt be obſerved that, among the commiſſioners were the lord treaſurer Burleigh, and ſecretary Walſingham, both Elizabeth's moſt truſty miniſters, the Queen of Scots known enemies, and probably authors and promoters of the reſolution to bring her to a trial. As it was hard to believe, that Elizabeth had taken ſuch a reſolution without imparting it to her miniſters and council, and without her council's approbation, it ſhould ſeem ſhe ought not to have appointed her miniſters and privy counſellors for Mary's judges. But on the other hand, as ſhe was willing to be ſure of the trial's ſucceeding, ſhe doubtleſs deſired that perſons of ſuch weight as miniſters and privy counſellors ſhould be ready to turn the ſcale, in caſe of oppoſition from the other judges.

Her anſwer. Camden. State-Trials.

Elizab. An' 1586.

On the morrow, the commiſſioners ſent her a copy of her anſwer, and after it was read to her, ſhe ſaid; " it was rightly taken, but ſhe had forgot " one very material particular, viz. that it was " ſaid in Elizabeth's letters, ſhe was ſubject to the " laws of England, becauſe ſhe had long lived " under their protection; but all the world knew, " ſhe came into England to crave the aſſiſtance of " the Queen her ſiſter, and had been ever ſince " detained in priſon; and therefore had not injoyed " the protection of the laws, nay, had not been " able to underſtand what manner of laws they " were."

She refuſes to anſwer.

To be brief; ſhe for two whole days diſputed the authority of the judges, and would not own that, in any caſe, Elizabeth had over her other juriſdiction than what was forcibly uſurped: nay, ſhe perſiſted in it, after ſhe was menaced with being ſentenced for non-appearance, as a perſon abſent: but Hatton, one of the commiſſioners, finally made a ſpeech which ſhook her reſolution. He told her, " that he was indeed accuſed, but not condemned: " that if ſhe were innocent, ſhe injured her repu- " tation extremely in avoiding a trial: that the " Queen would be very glad nothing could be " proved againſt her, as he himſelf heard her ſay " when he took leave of her (2).

Hatton perſuades her to plead. Camden.

Had Mary been provided with council, ſhe would doubtleſs have been told that Hatton's harangue tended only to inſnare her, and ingage her to plead, that ſhe might be condemned by a peremptory ſentence. If ſhe had perſiſted in her refuſal, Elizabeth would have been perhaps not a little puzzled. Tho' ſhe was reſolved to put her to death, ſhe however wiſhed the public was convinced of the juſtice of it, in order to avoid part of the blame of a procedure ſo rigid: but a ſentence given on non-appearance would not have produced this effect, ſince it could not be denied, that the refuſing to plead was grounded on very good reaſons. Mary however ſtood out 'till the fourteenth of October, when, ſending for ſome of the commiſſioners, ſhe told them, Hatton's arguments had convinced her of the neceſſity of manifeſting her innocence: adding, that ſhe therefore conſented to anſwer before them, provided her proteſtation was admited; to which the commiſſioners agreed; but without approving the reaſons whereon it was grounded.

Continuation of Mary's trial. Camden.

Immediately after, thirty-ſix of the judges met in the caſtle-hall, whither Queen Mary likewiſe repaired (3). Being ſeated, the chancellor turning to Mary, ſaid, " She was accuſed of conſpiring the " deſtruction of her Majeſty, the realm of England, " and the Proteſtant religion, and they were com- " miſſioned to examine the truth of this accuſation, " and to hear her anſwer." The chancellor having finiſhed his diſcourſe, Mary roſe up and ſaid, " That ſhe came into England to crave the aid " which had been promiſed her: that ſhe was a

(1) M. Rapin again miſtakes, in ſaying the commiſſion was ſent her.

(2) To this Mary replied, that ſhe refuſed not to anſwer in full parliament, provided ſhe might be declared the next in ſucceſſion; yea, before the Queen and her council, ſo as her proteſtation was admited, and ſhe was acknowledged the next of kin to Queen Elizabeth; but to the judgment of her adverſaries ſhe would never ſubmit. Camden, p. 521.

(3) At the upper end of the room was placed a chair of ſtate for the Queen of England, under a canopy of ſtate. Overagainſt it, below, at ſome diſtance, near the beam which ran acroſs the room, ſtood a chair for the Queen of Scots. By the walls on both ſides were placed benches, on which ſat the commiſſioners, Ibid. p. 522.——Thuanus obſerves, that ſome of theſe Commiſſioners were Papiſts, l. 86.

" Queen,

ELIZAB. AN' 1586.

" Queen, and no ſubject of Elizabeth, and if ſhe " appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her " honor and reputation." The chancellor would not own that any aid had been promiſed her. As to the proteſtation, he anſwered, " it was in vain, " ſince the law whereon the accuſation was grounded, " allowed of no diſtinction in the perſons of the " tranſgreſſors, and therefore it was not to be ad- " mited." The court ordered however that the proteſtation ſhould be recorded, with the chancellor's anſwer.

This done, the attorney-general read to her aloud the act of parliament *(1), and, after making recital of Babington's plot, concluded, that Mary had violated the ſtatute, becauſe ſhe knew of the conſpiracy, and even marked out the manner and means to effect it. She anſwered, " ſhe knew not Ba- " bington, nor ever received from, or wrote to " him any letters. She never ploted the Queen's " deſtruction, and to prove any ſuch matter, letters " under her own hand ought to be produced, which " was impoſſible. She knew not Ballard, nor ever " heard of him, and in ſhort, being a priſoner, ſhe " could not hinder the plots of others."

* As alſo the commiſſion.

Hereupon the copies of Babington's letters to her were read, containing all the circumſtances of the conſpiracy (2). It ſhould ſeem, ſince her papers were ſeized, Babington's original letters might have been produced: but as ſhe had probably burned them, the judges could ſhew only the copies which Walſingham took when poſſeſſed of the originals. Mary's reply to this was, " That Babington might " poſſibly write theſe letters; and therefore the " point was not to know, whether he wrote them " or not, but whether ſhe received them." To prove this, they read to her Babington's confeſſion before his execution, wherein he ſaid, he ſent diverſe letters to the Queen of Scots, and had from her received ſeveral. After that, were read the copies of certain letters, in cypher, from Mary to Babington, which he had received, where mention was made of the earls of Arundel and Northumberland. Then cryed out the Queen, weeping, " Alas! what has the noble houſe of the Howards " indured for my ſake!" She added, " that Ba- " bington might write what he pleaſed: that as for " her own letters in cypher, which were produced, " ſhe knew nothing of them, and it was very eaſy " for her enemies to get her cyphers, and write " forged letters in her name: that in a word, the " letters were not her hand-writing; and beſide, it " was not likely that, to execute the deſign ſhe was " charged with, ſhe ſhould imploy the earl of Arun- " del, who was priſoner in the Tower, or the earl " of Northumberland, who was very young, and " to her utterly unknown."

There were alſo read Savage's and Ballard's confeſſions, which ran, That Babington communicated to them ſeveral letters, which he had received from the Queen of Scots. To this ſhe anſwered, with a proteſtation, that Babington never received any from her.

Before I proceed, I ſhall here make two or three brief remarks. Firſt; it is ſurpriſing that Babington, Savage, and Ballard ſhould be executed before the Queen of Scots trial, ſince their teſtimony was uſed againſt her. Secondly; hitherto the whole evidence conſiſted only in Babington's confeſſion, that he had received letters from the Queen of Scots: but as he was dead, it could not be proved that thoſe were the ſame letters which had been produced and read, which moreover were only copies of letters decyphered. My third remark is, that tho' Mary proteſted, ſhe never received any letters from Babington, nor wrote any to him, Camden muſt have been ſatisfied of the contrary, ſince, in his account of the conſpiracy, he ſpeaks of a correſpondence by letters between Mary and Babington as a thing certain. This is farther confirmed by a little book, intitled, The Hiſtory of the Martyrdom of the Queen of Scots, printed at Paris in 1589, where the author, tho' a zealous ſtickler for this Queen, does not deny that ſhe held a correſpondence with Babington (3).

ELIZAB. AN' 1586.

Jebb's Col. Vol. II. p. 282, 285,

After this were produced ſeveral letters, in cypher, from the Queen of Scots, wherein ſhe approved of the conſpiracy. Theſe were probably the letters which Walſingham intercepted by Gifford's means, or thoſe he artfully got from the French embaſſador. Mary replied, ſhe wrote not thoſe letters, and probably they were forged by her alphabet of cyphers in France, and flatly charged the forgery upon Walſingham, who ſo cleared himſelf as ſhe ſeemed ſatisfied with his anſwer. But, to prove them hers, they produced the confeſſions of Naue and Curle, her ſecretaries, who owned they wrote them by her order.

This is what paſſed in the firſt ſeſſion, the fourteenth of October. In the afternoon were read the copies of ſome letters, received by Mary, concerning the conference, at Paris, between Ballard, Paget, and Mendoza, for invading England, and it was proved, by the teſtimony of her ſecretary Curle, that ſhe had received them. She anſwered, this proved not her intention to kill the Queen. It is here proper to obſerve that ſhe was accuſed of three crimes, viz. of conſpiring the Queen's death; of procuring England to be invaded; and of a project to extirpate the Proteſtant religion. She conſidered the firſt as the principal, to which ſhe was ready to anſwer, well knowing ſhe could not, without great injuſtice, be condemned for the other two. In anſwer to the proof taken from the teſtimony of her ſecretaries, ſhe ſaid, " She believed " Curle, the Scot, to be a very honeſt man *, " but had not the ſame opinion of Naue, the " Frenchman, who might poſſibly have been cor- " rupted: beſide, he ſo abuſed Curle's eaſineſs, " that he made him write what he pleaſed: that, " in ſhort, her ſecretaries might inſert in her let- " ters what ſhe never dictated; and therefore, ſhe " ought to be convicted by her own hand-writing, " and not by that of her ſecretaries, who would " aſſuredly clear her if they were preſent."

* But no competent witneſs.

It cannot be denied that this proceeding was very irregular; firſt, becauſe three men, on whoſe evidence it was pretended to convict this Queen, had been executed: ſecondly, as her ſecretaries, who were alive, were never confronted with her, tho' their teſtimony was uſed. This was the more ſtrange, as by the act of parliament paſſed in the thirteenth year of this very reign, it was expreſly ordained, that the witneſſes ſhould be brought face to face with the parties accuſed.

It was, undoubtedly, on this account that the lord treaſurer Burleigh, perceiving the imbaraſſment occaſioned by Mary's anſwer, grounded on the Engliſh laws, thought proper to proceed to other matters. He therefore charged her with having intentions to ſend the King her ſon into Spain, and reſign to Philip II her right to the kingdom of England. One might readily comprehend, that the firſt of theſe accuſations was very foreign to the purpoſe, ſince the affairs of Scotland were not in diſpute: accordingly ſhe made no anſwer to it. As to the ſecond, ſhe only ſaid, "That, by her birth, ſhe was preſumptive heir "to Queen Elizabeth, and it was lawful to con-"vey her right to whom ſhe pleaſed; but that all "this amounted not to any proof of her having "conſented to the project of killing the Queen."

It being objected to her, that ſhe had ſent her alphabet of cyphers to certain Papiſts, as Curle had teſtified, ſhe denied it not, and briefly replied, "It was not unlawful to hold correſpondence, and "negociate her concerns with men of her religion." But theſe objections ſerved only to divert them from the main point, ſince nothing of all this was contained in the accuſation. At laſt, ſhe was again urged with the teſtimonies of her ſecretaries, to which ſhe made the ſame anſwer as before, proteſting ſhe knew neither Babington nor Ballard. "But, ſaid the lord treaſurer, you very well know "Morgan, who ſent Parry over to kill the Queen, "and have aſſigned him a penſion." To this ſhe anſwered, "She was ignorant of what Morgan "had done, but knew that he had loſt all for her "ſake, and ſhe might as well give him a penſion, "as Elizabeth give one to Gray, and the King "himſelf."

Then they proceeded to the other two articles of the impeachment, concerning the invaſion of England, and extirpation of the Proteſtant religion; and to prove that Mary was concerned in theſe conſpiracies, they read the letters which ſhe wrote to Mendoza, Inglefield, and lord Paget. She anſwered, "that theſe matters proved not her having "any hand in the conſpiracy againſt the Queen's "life: that ſhe had nothing to ſay to the reſt, and "had often declared to the Queen herſelf, ſhe "would try all means to procure her own liberty." Thus paſſed the ſecond ſeſſion.

Next day, the court being met, Mary repeated her proteſtation againſt the authority of her judges, and required it to be recorded, and a copy delivered to her. She complained, "That all her offers for "accommodation were rejected (1), and herſelf "moſt unworthily treated, by their thus publicly "reading all her letters, containing many parti-"culars no way relating to the impeachment." To this the lord treaſurer replied, "That he was go-"ing to anſwer her in a double capacity, as com-"miſſioner, and as privy-counſellor. As com-"miſſioner, he told her, her proteſtation was re-"corded, and a copy thereof ſhould be delivered "her. As to their authority, it was grounded "on the power confered on them by letters "patent under the Queen's own hand, and the "great ſeal. That for the peruſing her letters, "which ſhe complained of, it was neceſſary to "read them whole and intire, becauſe they con-"tained matters which, by their circumſtances, "were ſo interwoven, that there was no ſeparat-"ing them." Here ſhe interrupted him, and ſaid, "Tho' the circumſtances were proved, it would "ſignify nothing, if the principal fact was not: "that her integrity depended not on the credit of "her ſecretaries, ſince they might very poſſibly "be corrupted: that theſe letters, having no ſu-"perſcription, might be directed to others, and "many things inſerted without her knowledge; "but if ſhe had her papers, ſhe could the more "eaſily vindicate herſelf." The lord treaſurer anſwered, "Nothing ſhould be objected but what "paſſed ſince the nineteenth of June laſt, con-"cerning which her memory could furniſh her "with what ſhe thought requiſite for her defenſe: "that her papers would be of no ſervice to her, "ſince Babington, and her ſecretaries, without "being tortured, had owned theſe letters came "from her: that it was left to the commiſſioners "to judge, whether more credit was to be given "to her bare negation, than to their affirmation." He added, as a privy-counſellor, "that it was "true, ſhe had made diverſe eſſays to procure her "liberty, and if they proved fruitleſs, it was ow-"ing to herſelf and the Scots: that the peers of "Scotland had refuſed to give the King in ho-"ſtage, and when the firſt treaty was held con-"cerning her releaſe, Morgan her vaſſal ſent Parry "into England to kill the Queen." Mary eaſily perceived the venom of theſe words, whereby, under color of juſtifying the council, the lord treaſurer would have inſinuated to the other commiſſioners, that ſhe was concerned in Parry's treaſons. Wherefore, upon hearing him ſay this, "Ah! (ſaid "ſhe) you are my adverſary. Yes (ſaid he) I am "adverſary to all Queen Elizabeth's enemies."

Now were read again her letters to Paget, wherein ſhe told him, there was no other way for the King of Spain to reduce the rebellious Netherlanders, but by ſeting a Catholic on the throne of England. There was likewiſe read the copy of cardinal Allen's letter to her, wherein he ſtiled her his "moſt dread Sovereign Lady," and told her, the buſineſs was recommended to the Prince of Parma's care. She anſwered, ſtill adhering to the firſt article of the impeachment, "That Babing-"ton, and her ſecretaries, had accuſed her to ſave "themſelves: that ſhe had never heard of the ſix "murderers, and all the reſt was of no ſervice to "prove the principal crime ſhe was accuſed of: "that ſhe held Allen for a reverend prelate, and "acknowledged the Pope for the true head of the "church; neither could ſhe hinder foreigners from "giving her what titles they pleaſed: that, as for "her ſecretaries, ſhe was willing to add to what "ſhe had already ſaid of them, that they deſerved "no credit, for as they had ſworn ſecreſy to her, "they could be deemed no other than perjured "wretches, when they gave in their evidence "againſt her: that Naue had often writ otherwiſe "than he dictated, and Curle whatever Naue bid "him: that they had poſſibly confeſſed ſeveral "falſhoods to ſave their lives, imagining, that "her royalty would ſcreen her from puniſhment: "that ſhe had never heard of any ſuch man as "Ballard, but of one Hallard, who had offered "her his ſervice, which however ſhe refuſed, be-"cauſe ſhe knew him to be one of Walſingham's "ſpies." Mary had great advantage given her in not confronting the witneſſes, tho' it be a neceſſary formality in criminal trials.

Laſtly, were read ſome particular paſſages out of Mary's letters to Mendoza, wherein mention was made of her deſign to convey to the Spaniard her right to the crown of England. To this ſhe anſwered, "That being cloſe priſoner, and in a de-"clining condition, it ſeemed good to her friends, "that the ſucceſſion to the crown of England

When ſhe had done ſpeaking, the lord treaſurer aſked her if ſhe had any more to ſay in her defenſe? To which ſhe replied, " That ſhe required to be heard in full " parliament, or before the Queen and council." Then the court adjourned, 'till the twenty-fifth of October, to the Star-chamber at Weſtminſter.

Remark on Camden's recital.

This is Camden's account of the Queen of Scots trial at Fotheringhay. As there are no better memoirs, we are in a manner forced to ſuppoſe what he ſays to be true. There is however but too much cauſe to ſuſpect, he has curtailed or altered in ſeveral places, what he pretends to take from the regiſter's memoirs. For inſtance, it may eaſily be remarked in this narrative, that whatever is objected to the Queen of Scots, is indeterminate and general, without deſcending to particulars. Of all the letters read for her conviction, he cites not one extract ; ſo that ſhe ſeems to have been accuſed of holding a correſpondence by letters with Babington, and others of Elizabeth's enemies, rather than of ingaging in a ſettled plot to kill the Queen, tho' this was the principal point. In a word, this hiſtoſtorian's partiality for the Queen of Scots, on other occaſions, gives reaſon to think, he did not forget himſelf in this capital article, but uſed all his art to render doubtful the fact ſhe was accuſed of. However, as this is only a conjecture, I pretend not to inſiſt upon it (1). I ſhall content my ſelf, in order to clear this affair, with making ſome obſervations on this famous trial.

Reflections on the trial.

It is ſcarce to be doubted, that Mary's death was determined when Elizabeth, and her council, reſolved to have her tried by commiſſioners: but it muſt not be imagined, their intention was to puniſh her for attempting the life of Elizabeth. Had that been all, they would never have proceeded to the laſt extremities, but would, doubtleſs, have been ſatisfied with puting it out of her power to contrive any ſuch plots for the future, which would have been eaſy, by confining her more cloſely. But it was not ſo eaſy to hinder the Pope, the King of Spain, the houſe of Guiſe, the Engliſh Catholics, the Iriſh and the Scotiſh male-contents, from conſidering her as a Princeſs to whom of right belonged the two crowns of England and Scotland, and from uſing their continual indeavors to reſtore her to the throne of Scotland, and place her on that of England, even before Elizabeth's deceaſe. Tho' ſhe had been ſo cloſely confined that ſhe could not have been perſonally concerned in theſe machinations, it would not have prevented her partiſans from acting in her favor: nothing therefore but her death could break their meaſures, and put a period to the plots which were daily framing on her account : ſo, it might be truly ſaid, that as Elizabeth's death was Mary's life, ſo Mary's death alone could preſerve Elizabeth, and with her, liberty and the Proteſtant religion in England ; but as there was little probability Mary, who was the younger, ſhould quit firſt this world by a natural death, recourſe muſt be had to violence, that both Queen and realm might be freed from the impending danger. The part Mary bore in Babington's conſpiracy, and which was ſeemingly much greater than what Camden intimates, was not therefore the real cauſe of her condemnation, but only the pretenſe uſed to be rid of a Queen on whoſe life Elizabeth's adverſaries grounded all their hopes. It was therefore Mary's own friends who occaſioned her misfortune, by ſerving her over zealouſly, or rather by making her their inſtrument to execute their grand projects againſt the reformation. The Pope flattered himſelf with reſtoring, by her means, Papiſm in England ; and the Engliſh Papiſts looked on her as the only perſon who could free them from the inſupportable yoke of a Heretical government. Philip II ſaw no other means to ſubdue the Netherlanders. Laſtly, the houſe of Guiſe, whoſe ambitious projects are ſufficiently known, thought to find in her a moſt infallible means to cruſh the Hugonots of France, who ſupported the lawful heir in his title to that crown. Mary herſelf gave too much countenance to all theſe plots. She was ſo imprudent as, tho' a priſoner, inceſſantly to confound two things which could well be diſtingniſhed and ſeparated ; I mean, her liberty, and her title to the crown of England. She thereby gave Elizabeth occaſion to confound them alſo, and to effect her ruin, in order to preſerve her own life and crown.

ELIZAB. AN' 1586.

Theſe were the real motives of Mary's condemnation. If we conſider them politically, they may be ſaid to be good and neceſſary ; but it very frequently happens that policy is repugnant to juſtice and equity. On this condemnation it is that Elizabeth's enemies have triumphed, and indeed, it is a very proper ſubject for rhethoric. But if it is conſidered who were the loudeſt exclaimers againſt Elizabeth, they will be found to be the very perſons who would have murdered her, to ſet Mary on the throne of England. Had they ſucceeded in their deſign, would their deed have been juſter, or more agreeable to the precepts of Chriſtianity ? Doubtleſs it would, was the cauſe to be tried by the principles of the adverſaries to Elizabeth and her belief. But if it was allowed by the laws of religion, juſtice and equity, to deprive Elizabeth of life, in order to place Mary in the throne, and reſtore Popery in England, was it leſs allowable for the Engliſh to cut off Mary's head, in order to preſerve their Queen and religion from deſtruction, wherewith they were perpetually menaced ? Let us rather pronounce theſe maxims to be equally blameable and repugnant to goſpel rules, to whatever party they are applied.

Having ſeen the real motives of Queen Mary's condemnation, there is no great cauſe to wonder at the irregularities to be obſerved in her trial. The point was not ſo much to puniſh her for her ſhare in the conſpiracy, as to ſatisfy the public ſhe was concerned in it, that her condemnation might be thought the leſs ſtrange, or rather abſolutely neceſſary for England's ſafety. The Queen and council believed they had ſufficient evidence of Mary's being acquainted with the conſpiracy, having thereto conſented and even promoted its execution to the utmoſt of her power. This ſufficed for their deſign. They knew the people would eaſily excuſe ſome irregularities in a matter wherein their own preſervation was concerned.

Since therefore Mary's condemnation cannot be otherwiſe conſidered than as the pure effect of Elizabeth's policy, it is quite to no purpoſe that ſome ſtart, concerning her trial, the ſubſequent queries, viz. 1. What authority had Elizabeth over her ? 2. Whether Mary could be conſidered as ſubject to the laws of England, under color of her having reſided there eighteen years, being all the while a priſoner ? 3. Whether it could be ſaid, ſhe had injoyed, during that time, the protection of the laws,

Elizab. An' 1586.

laws, and be thence infered, that ſhe ought to be liable to them? 4. Whether, even on ſuch a ſuppoſition, ſhe had injoyed in her trial the benefit of the laws of England? 5. Whether ſhe were tried by her peers, according to the conſtant and immutable privilege of the Engliſh? 6. Who could be her peers? 7. Whether Elizabeth's commiſſion was according to law? 8. Whether the formalities, requiſite in a trial of this nature, were obſerved? 9. Whether ſhe can be ſaid to be legally convicted, by the teſtimony of perſons not then living, and whom it lay in Elizabeth's breaſt to keep alive and confront? 10. Whether the evidence of her ſecretaries, who were ſtill alive, could be deemed valid, without being confronted, contrary to expreſs acts of parliament? 11. Whether a captive Queen's conſent to the invaſion of a kingdom, where ſhe is unjuſtly detained, is a crime worthy of death? 12. Whether the letters in cypher, writ by her ſecretaries, were a ſufficient proof that the whole contents were dictated by her? 13. Laſtly, ſuppoſing ſhe had given a full and intire conſent to the plot, whether the manner of her being detained in England, her long confinement, the loſs of her kingdom procured partly by Elizabeth's ſecret practiſes, did not merit that her crime ſhould be reckoned of a different nature from that of a ſubject who conſpires againſt his Sovereign? I think it not poſſible to vindicate Elizabeth on each of theſe queries. We muſt therefore keep to the neceſſity ſhe was under of deſtroying Mary to ſave herſelf, and juſtify her by the natural law of ſelf-preſervation, the only one can be alledged in her juſtification (1).

Sentence pronounced againſt Mary.

The commiſſioners being aſſembled (2) in the Star-chamber, at Weſtminſter, the twenty-fifth of October, ſent for Naue and Curle, who confirmed upon oath their former evidence; after which ſentence was pronounced. It ran in general, that Mary had violated the act paſſed the preceding year. This is all was divulged. It is not known, whether the commiſſioners expreſly ſentenced to death this royal priſoner, or whether, after their judgment of the fact, they refered it to the laws and Queen Elizabeth to decide what puniſhment the offenſe merited. What follows is all was afterwards publiſhed by Elizabeth's order. "That "ſince the firſt day of June, in the twenty-ſeventh "year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, diverſe "matters have been compaſſed and imagined with- "in this realm of England, by Anthony Babing- "ton and others, with the privity of the ſaid "Mary, tending to the hurt, death and deſtruc- "tion of our ſaid lady the Queen. And alſo, "that ſince the foreſaid day, the ſaid Mary pre- "tending a title to the crown of this realm, di- "verſe matters tending to the deſtruction of the "royal perſon of our Sovereign lady the Queen, "contrary to the tenor of the ſtatute in the com- "miſſion aforeſaid ſpecified."

It is eaſy, by this very extract, to perceive that the ſentence muſt have been longer and fuller, as may be judged by theſe words, "the ſaid Mary," which imply her being mentioned before: but Elizabeth thought not proper to publiſh more of it. The author of a book intitled, "The Hiſtory of "the Martyrdom of Mary Stuart," ſays, ſuch great care was taken to conceal this ſentence, that he could not poſſibly ever recover a copy of it, notwithſtanding all his diligence. "Without "doubt (continues he) there were myſteries in it "which were not to be divulged."

Declaration of the judges in the King of Scotland's favor. Camden.

The ſame day ſentence was pronounced, the judges declared, it did nothing derogate from the King of Scotland, that is, his title to the crown of England did ſtill remain intire. But was it their buſineſs to give ſuch a determination concerning the ſucceſſion, when they were not impowered by their commiſſion? It is viſible, they acted by direction from Elizabeth, who by this means ſtrove to pacify the King of Scotland: otherwiſe, the judges would not have preſumed to make ſuch a declaration which was beyond the extent of their power.

The parliament confirms the ſentence, and petition the Queen to put it in execution. Novemb. 12. Camden. D'ewes. p. 380.

The parliament, meeting four days after, on the twenty-ninth of October, approved and confirmed the ſentence given againſt the Queen of Scots: but whether this was without a perfect information of the caſe, or after a diligent inquiry, it is hard to know, tho' afterwards Elizabeth pretended it was not 'till after a ſerious and deliberate examination. Howſoever it be, the parliament, having confirmed the ſentence, addreſſed Elizabeth with beſeeching her to order its being put in execution. This addreſs contained reaſons taken not from the atrocity of Mary's crime, but the danger to which the Queen and realm would be expoſed if the Queen of Scots was ſuffered to live (3). Elizabeth, to this petition returned a reply, the intent whereof was to intimate to the parliament her being exceſſively troubled and irreſolute. She aimed to inſinuate, that ſhe was inclined to mercy, but that the great affection ſhe bore her people extremely imbaraſſed her. It was eaſy from this ſpeech to conclude that ſhe deſired to be preſſed, leſt ſhe ſhould ſeem to act from a motive of revenge. Here follows the anſwer, which perfectly manifeſts Queen Elizabeth's character.

Elizabeth's anſwer. State-Trials, Vol. I. p. 149. Hollingth. p. 1582.

Remark on the Queen's ſpeech.

It is not very difficult to perceive in this ſpeech, notwithſtanding her affected obſcurity, the double view Elizabeth propoſed to herſelf. One was, to make the public believe, ſhe could not, without extreme concern, reſolve to execute Queen Mary. The other, to inſinuate to the parliament, that there was a neceſſity of diſpatching the Scotiſh Queen, or reſolving to loſe the beſt of Queens, who was very ready to lay down her life for the good of her ſubjects. She chiefly inſiſted on her tenderneſs for her people, that they might fear to be deprived of ſo gracious a Sovereign, and earneſtly require the death of her adverſary. But leſt the parliament's affection for her ſhould not be ſtrong enough, ſhe took care to hint, more than once, that their own ſafety depended on her preſervation. She ſaid, if her own welfare only lay at ſtake, ſhe would readily ſhew mercy, ſhe not being over fond of life; but that it was the nation's danger which alone gave her uneaſineſs. Was not this ſaying in very plain terms, that the Queen of Scot's death was neceſſary for the nation's ſafety? She would have it believed, ſhe was inclined to ſpare Mary, but alledged not one tittle in her behalf. On the contrary, ſhe made uſe of the arguments of ſex and conſanguinity to agravate her crime, and clearly ſet forth the reaſons which might determine her to conſent ſhe ſhould die. She magnified the care ſhe had taken not to ſuffer her dignity to be debaſed, by trying her like a common perſon. But what favor was it to nominate as her judges (among whom were her moſt inveterate enemies) perſons who had before voted againſt her in the council, and had been for bringing her to a trial? Hatton, one of the judges, drew her into a ſnare, by perſuading her to plead, and the lord treaſurer acted in ſome meaſure the accuſer's part.

Digges's embaſ.

On the other hand we ſee, in ſeveral of Walſingham's letters, ſent from France when he was embaſſador, that it was his opinion, Elizabeth could never be ſafe while Mary lived. Was it not a great favor to give her ſuch judges? Finally, with what deſign was it Queen Elizabeth told her parliament, that ſhe knew for certain ſome had bound themſelves by oath to kill her within a month? Was it not to incite the two houſes to avert this calamity, by a ſpeedy execution of the ſentence paſſed againſt Mary? All this demonſtrates that her aim was to ingage the parliament to preſs her on that head, that ſhe might in ſome meaſure be juſtified to the world, by aſcribing the execution of this ſentence to the inſtances made by her parliament. But the ſequel will render it ſtill more manifeſt.

On the twelfth day after, Elizabeth ſent the lord chancellor to the upper houſe, and Puckering (1) to the lower, to deſire them to find ſome expedient, whereby the Scotiſh Queen's life might be ſaved, and her own ſafety provided for. The two houſes, after a ſerious debate, anſwered, that her ſafety could not poſſibly be ſecured ſo long as the Queen of Scots lived: that only four methods that way tending could be deviſed, which were all inſufficient. The firſt was, that the Queen of Scots ſhould ſeriouſly repent: but ſuch a repentance was not to be expected, ſince ſhe would not ſo much as acknowledge her guilt. The ſecond, that ſhe ſhould be more cloſely guarded, and bound to her good demeanor by bond and oath. The third, that ſhe ſhould give hoſtages: but theſe ways were wholly inſignificant, ſince if Queen Elizabeth was once deprived of life, all theſe precautions would vaniſh. The fourth, that ſhe ſhould depart the kingdom: but this was the moſt dangerous: for if, while a priſoner, ſhe excited ſo many in her favor, what would ſhe do if at liberty? In ſhort, both houſes in their anſwer repreſented to the Queen, that if it were injuſtice to deny execution of the law to the meaneſt of her ſubjects, how much more to the whole body of the people, unanimouſly and with one voice ſuing for it? They who have the leaſt knowledge what influence the court party uſually have on the two houſes, will very eaſily judge, that the parliament would never have thus expreſſed themſelves, had they not known it pleaſing to her Majeſty. But to give the reader a clearer inſight into Elizabeth's character, it will be neceſſary to inſert her anſwer, as a full evidence, not of her pretended imbaraſs and uncertainty, but of her conſummate diſſimulation, on this head.

Elizabeth deſires the two houſes to deviſe ſome expedient. They find none, and inſiſt on their demand.

Elizabeth's ſpeech to the parliament. Hollingſh. p. 1585. State-Trials.

"FULL grievous is the way, whoſe going on and end yield nothing but cumber for the hire of a laborious journey. I have this day been in greater conflict with myſelf than ever in all my life, whether I ſhould ſpeak, or hold my peace. If I ſpeak, and not complain, I ſhall diſſemble; and if I ſhould be ſilent, your labor taken were all in vain. If I ſhould complain, it might ſeem ſtrange and rare. Yet I confeſs, that my moſt hearty deſire was, that ſome other means might have been deviſed to work your ſecurity, and my ſafety, than this which is now propounded. So I cannot but complain, tho' not of you, yet unto you, that I perceive by your petitions, that my ſafety dependeth wholly upon the death of another. If there be any who think I have prolonged the time on purpoſe to make a counterfeit ſhew of clemency, they do me the moſt undeſerved wrong, as he knoweth who is the ſearcher of the moſt ſecret thoughts of all hearts. Or if there be any who is perſuaded, that the commiſſioners durſt not pronounce other ſentence, as fearing thereby to diſpleaſe me, or to ſeem to fail of their care for my ſafety, they do but heap upon me moſt injurious conceits. For either thoſe whom I have put in truſt have failed of their duties, or elſe they ſignified unto the commiſſioners, in my name, that my will and pleaſure was, that every one ſhould deal freely, according to his conſcience; and what they would not openly declare, that they ſhould reveal unto me in private. It was of my moſt favorable mind towards her, that I deſired ſome other means might be found out to prevent this miſchief. But ſince now it is reſolved, that my ſurety is moſt deſperate without her death, I have a moſt inward feeling of ſorrow, that I, who have in my time pardoned ſo many rebels, winked at ſo many treaſons, or neglected them with ſilence, muſt now ſeem to ſhew cruelty upon ſo great a Princeſs. ELIZAB. AN' 1586.

"I have, ſince I came to the crown of this realm, ſeen many defamatory books and pamphlets againſt me, accuſing me to be a tyrant. Well fare the writers hearts; I believe their meaning was to tell me news; and news indeed it was to me, to be branded with the note of tyranny: I would it were as great news to hear of their impiety. But what will they not write now, when they ſhall hear that I have given conſent, that the executioner's hands ſhould be imbrued in the blood of my neareſt kinſwoman? But ſo far am I from cruelty, that, to ſave my own life, I would not offer her violence; neither have I been ſo careful how to preſerve my own life, as how to preſerve both; which that it is now impoſſible I grieve exceedingly. I am not ſo void of judgment, as not to ſee my own perils before my eyes; nor ſo mad as to ſharpen a ſword to cut my own throat; nor ſo careleſs, as not to provide for the ſafety of my own life. But this I conſider with myſelf, that many a man would put his own life in danger, to ſave a Princeſs's life: I do not ſay ſo will I; yet have I many times thought upon it.

"But ſeeing ſo many have both written and ſpoken againſt me, give me leave, I pray you, to ſay ſomewhat in my own defenſe, that you may ſee what manner of woman I am, for whoſe ſafety you have paſſed ſuch careful thoughts: wherein as I do with moſt thankful heart conſider your vigilant care; ſo am I ſure I ſhall never require it, had I as many lives as you all.

"When firſt I took the ſcepter, I was not unmindful of God the giver, and therefore began my reign with his ſervice, and the religion I have been both born in, bred in, and I truſt ſhall die in. And tho' I was not ignorant how many perils I ſhould be ſet withal at home for altering religion, and how many great Princes abroad, of a contrary profeſſion, would attempt all hoſtility againſt me: yet was I no whit diſmayed, knowing that God, whom only I reſpected, would defend both me and my cauſe. Hence it is, that ſo many treacheries and conſpiracies have been attempted againſt me, that I rather marvel that I am, than muſe that I ſhould now be alive at this day, were it not that God's holy hand hath protected me, even beyond all expectation. Then, to the end I might make the better progreſs in the art of ſwaying the ſcepter, I entered into long and ſerious cogitations, what things were worthy and fiting for Kings to do; and I found it moſt neceſſary that they ſhould be abundantly furniſhed with thoſe ſpecial virtues, juſtice, temperance, prudence, and magnanimity. As for the two latter, I will not boaſt my ſelf, my ſex doth not permit it: but for the two former, I dare ſay (and that without oſtentation) I never made a difference of perſons, where right was one. I never prefered, for favor, whom I thought not fit, for worth: I never bent my ear to credit a tale when firſt told; nor was ſo raſh to corrupt my judgment with prejudice, before I heard the cauſe. I will not ſay but many reports might haply have brought me into much favor of the one ſide or the other; for we Princes cannot hear all ourſelves: yet this I dare ſay boldly, my judgment ever went with the truth, according to my underſtanding; and as full well Alci-

" And therefore, as touching your counſels and " conſultations, I acknowledge them to be ſo care- " ful, provident, and profitable, for the preſerva- " tion of my life, and to proceed from minds ſo " ſincere, and to me moſt devoted, that I ſhall in- " deavor myſelf, all I can, to give you cauſe to " think your pains not ill beſtowed, and ſtrive to " make myſelf worthy of ſuch ſubjects.

" And now for your petition, I pray you for " this preſent to content yourſelves with an anſwer " without anſwer. Your judgment I condemn not, " neither do I miſtake your reaſons; but pray to " accept my thankfulneſs, excuſe my doubtfulneſs, " and take in good part my anſwer, anſwer-leſs. " If I ſhould ſay, I would not do what you re- " queſt, I might ſay perhaps more than I think; " and if I ſhould ſay I would do it, I might plunge " into peril myſelf, whom you labor to preſerve; " which in your wiſdoms and diſcretions you would " not that I ſhould, if you conſider the circum- " ſtances of place, time, and the manners and " conditions of men."

This harangue, of a like ſtamp and ſpirit with the preceding one, was not (as ſhe herſelf acknowledges) her Majeſty's anſwer to the petition of both houſes, but a bare intimation to the Engliſh, how imprudent it would be to hazard the life of ſo good a Queen, in order to ſave Mary's. She would be thought in a great perplexity, and yet gave to underſtand ſhe was fully determined. And indeed, ſince ſhe prefered her ſubjects good to all other conſiderations, and Mary's death was neceſſary to them, what could be the occaſion of her doubts? In comparing the reaſons which inclined her to mercy, with thoſe which concerned her own ſafety, there needed no very deep penetration, to diſcover which ſide ſhe would turn to, howſoever irreſolute ſhe ſeemed. So, in this, as in the former ſpeech, her ſole aim was to make the public believe, ſhe yielded with reluctancy to the ſollicitations of her parliament, tho' ſhe took care not to object any ſtrong reaſons to theſe ſollicitations. But her actions were ſtill plainer indications, than her ſpeeches, of what paſſed in her thoughts.

The parliament prorogued. D'ewes. p. 382.

Immediately after this anſwer-leſs anſwer, the parliament was prorogued (1), doubtleſs, for fear, her feigned perplexities ſhould be taken literally, and ſome expedient found to ſave the Queen of Scots. After what had paſſed, Elizabeth no longer needed a parliament, and in executing the ſentence could ſay, ſhe only yielded to the two houſes preſſing inſtances. It will perhaps be thought ſtrange, that I am thus peremptory in a buſineſs ſo hard to be known as Elizabeth's inmoſt thoughts: but, in my opinion, very evident proofs may be drawn, both from her actions and words, that throughout this whole affair ſhe acted with conſummate diſſimulation.

Mary is informed of her ſentence. Camden.

A few days after the parliament's prorogation, lord Buckhurſt and Beale were ſent to the Queen of Scots. They had orders to notify, that her judges had condemned her to die, that the parliament had confirmed the ſentence, and required its being put in execution, believing, if ſhe remained alive, England's eſtabliſhed religion could not ſubſiſt. She received theſe tidings with great reſolution, and even ſeemed to triumph, that religion was the cauſe of her death (2). Then ſhe ſaid, with ſome emotion, " It is no wonder if the Engliſh, who have " often put their own Sovereigns to death, ſhould " treat in the ſame manner a Princeſs ſprung from " the blood of their Kings."

She ſhews great firmneſs of mind.

The French embaſſador ſollicits in her favor.

L'Aubeſpine, the French embaſſador, who was intirely devoted to the houſe of Guiſe, did, by his earneſt ſollicitation, ſtop for ſome days publication of the ſentence: but it was at length proclaimed all over London, by expreſs order from her Majeſty, who forgot not declaring to her people, that her conſent was extorted by the parliament's urgent intreaties. In this proclamation, Elizabeth ſaid, that, being informed of the Queen of Scots deviſes, the lords of her council, with many others, earneſtly required that the priſoner might be brought to juſtice, and tried in the moſt honorable manner: that, upon theſe inſtances, ſhe granted a commiſſion to forty-two lords, thirty-ſix of whom met at Fotheringay, and after a very ſtrict examination, gave ſentence to this effect: " That Mary had " violated the laſt year's ſtatute:" that the parliament, having examined the ſentence, and the proofs whereon it was founded, demanded execution, notwithſtanding her repeated inſtances, that ſome other expedient might be deviſed: that therefore, moved with her own and the nation's welfare, ſhe had ordered the ſentence to be notified to her good ſubjects.

Mary writes to Elizabeth. Camden. Martyre de Marie.

Mary, when ſhe had notice of this publication, plainly perceived no mercy was to be expected. She wrote a long letter to Elizabeth, intreating certain favors concerning her death, burial, and ſervants (3): but it is uncertain whether this letter was ever delivered.

The King of Scotland intercedes for his mother. Melvil. p. 173. Camden. Spotſwood.

The King of Scotland wrote alſo to Queen Elizabeth, and ſent Patric Gray and Robert Melvil, to implore mercy for the Queen his mother; but in vain: nay, it is affirmed, that Gray, who had been many years attached to Elizabeth's intereſt, after having publicly ſollicited her to favor Mary, adviſed her in private to make her away, ſaying, " A dead woman bites not."

The King of France ſends De Bellievre into England. Thuanus. Camden.

Henry III likewiſe diſpatched over to England preſident De Bellievre, to intreat Elizabeth in behalf of the condemned Queen. This embaſſador diſcharged his commiſſion like one ardently deſirous to ſucceed. He preſented a long memorial, which was publiſhed, containing the ſtrongeſt reaſons he could deviſe, to perſuade Elizabeth to ſpare the unfortunate Queen; to each article of which memorial Elizabeth anſwered on its margin. The ſubſtance of the anſwers was, " That matters were " reduced to ſuch a point, that one or other of the " two Queens muſt periſh, and Elizabeth flattered " herſelf that the King of France had her intereſt " no leſs at heart than Mary's." But, if Du Maurier is to be credited, in his preface to his father's memoirs, the embaſſador acted the counterfeit, and impoſed on the world and Mary's friends. He affirms to have heard his father ſay, that Bellievre, tho' he feigned to have inſtructions to the

An' 1587. The French embaſſador's conſpiracy againſt Queen Elizabeth. Camden.

While all were waiting the reſult of this extraordinary ſentence, the court diſcovered that L'Aubeſpine, the French embaſſador, had bribed two ruffians (2) to aſſaſſinate Queen Elizabeth. One of theſe aſſaſſines repenting, and informing the miniſtry of this villanous deſign, the embaſſador was ſent for to the lord treaſurer's houſe, where the council was aſſembled, and the two witneſſes confronted with him. If Camden is to be credited, he made but a lame defenſe, contenting himſelf with pleading the privilege of embaſſadors, who are accountable only to their own maſters. The lord treaſurer, without allowing or diſputing this privilege, gravely reproved him, and adviſed him to beware for the future how he provoked a Queen who was already but too deeply injured, and had it in her power to be revenged. It muſt be noted, that the French tranſlator of Camden's annals, thought fit to paſs over in ſilence this whole conſpiracy.

The people call aloud for Mary's execution. Camden. Le Laboureur.

The juncture was not any way proper to inquire farther into the circumſtances of this conſpiracy, which, to all appearance, was intirely owing to the embaſſador's furious zeal for the houſe of Lorrain: nay, who knows whether it were not a ſnare laid for him, to render him, very contrary to his intention, inſtrumental in haſtening the Queen of Scots execution? When this affair became public, nothing was every where to be heard but, "The Queen "cannot be ſafe while Mary is living." This was preciſely what the court wiſhed, that the people, being ſatisfied of the neceſſity of executing this ſentence, might be leſs attentive to the irregularities. Camden ſays, Elizabeth was ſtill in ſuſpenſe and diſtracted in her thoughts, not being able to reſolve on puting to death a Queen her near relation, over whom ſhe had no juriſdiction. He adds, means were however found to determine her, by ſpreading a report, That England was going to be invaded: that the Spaniſh fleet was already arrived at Milford-haven: that the duke of Guiſe was landed in Suſſex with an army: that the Queen of Scots was eſcaped from priſon, and was raiſing troops in the north: that ſeveral plots were on foot to murder Queen Elizabeth, and fire the city of London; nay, that her Majeſty was dead. By theſe artifices (adds that hiſtorian) Elizabeth was prevailed on to ſign a warrant for Queen Mary's execution. As for myſelf, who verily believe her deſtruction was reſolved even before her trial, I rather think all theſe reports were ſpread by the court's emiſſaries, to terrify the people, and ſhew them the neceſſity of Mary's death. There is not the leaſt probability, that the Queen and her miniſters ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be deceived by ſuch reports, the falſhood whereof they might ſo eaſily diſcover: but Camden's drift is to inſinuate, that Elizabeth was convinced of Mary's innocence, and therefore her mind was in ſuch agitation.

Elizabeth's exceſſive diſſimulation.

We are now at the laſt act of the tragedy, for ſo it may well be termed, with reſpect to the Queen of Scots, tho' with regard to Elizabeth it was a real comedy, or at leaſt a continued ſcene of diſſimulation ſo artfully acted, that one can ſcarcely conceive how it could be carried farther. Before Elizabeth ordered the commiſſion for Mary's trial to be drawn, diverſe peers, as I obſerved, caſt themſelves at her feet, and intreated her to take pity of them and their poſterity, and by Mary's death to provide for the ſecurity of church and ſtate. Afterwards, when ſentence was paſſed, ſhe waited 'till ſhe was by the parliament twice ſollicited, with the ſharp reproach, that ſhe denied her people juſtice. To carry on the farce, ſome formalities were likewiſe to be acted, after publication of the ſentence, before the warrant was ſigned for execution. All this was done: but ſomewhat was yet behind. Elizabeth undertook to make the public believe execution was done againſt her will, and without her knowledge; and this was the method ſhe uſed to accompliſh it.

She inſnares Daviſon her ſecretary. Camden.

Daviſon, without knowing how or which way, was her inſtrument to act this ſort of comedy. A little before Queen Mary's trial, he was made ſecretary of ſtate, and very ſeemingly was put into that office purpoſely to be inſnared, and made accountable for Mary's death. All the aboveſaid rumors being ſpread, and Elizabeth, feigning to be thereat terrified, delivered to Daviſon a writing, ſigned with her own hand, and ſealed with her ſignet, commanding him to draw a warrant under the great ſeal for the Queen of Scots execution, but injoined him withal to keep the warrant by him (3), without imparting it to any (4). The lord chancellor muſt however have been informed of it, except ſhe had taken from him the great ſeal and given it to Daviſon; whereof inſtances might be produced. Howſoever it be, on the morrow, by Killegrew ſhe ordered Daviſon not to draw the warrant *. Daviſon repaired thereupon to the Queen, and told her, it was drawn and under ſeal already; at which ſhe was very angry, and blamed him for being ſo haſty. The warrant was dated the firſt of February, and directed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Derby, Kent, and Cumberland †, to ſee the Queen of Scots executed. Mean while, tho' Elizabeth ſeemed diſpleaſed with her ſecretary for making too much haſte, ſhe left the warrant in his hands, without telling him how he was to diſpoſe of it. This extremely puzzled him, ſince, by her contrary proceedings with reſpect to the warrant, ſhe had not diſcloſed to him her intention. In this uncertainty, he imparted the tranſaction to a privy-counſellor, who was of opinion that the other counſellors ſhould be informed, that nothing might be done raſhly; thus Daviſon fell into the ſnare. The council being met on this occaſion, it was unanimouſly reſolved to execute the warrant, tho' nothing was eaſier than to acquaint her Majeſty with their imbaraſment. To that end, the warrant was given to Beale, who took care to inform thoſe lords to whom it was addreſſed, and departed for Fotheringhay with two executioners. Certainly, it is very difficult for any to believe, that twenty privy-counſellors (among whom were the Queen's miniſters, and her particular confidents) would have undertaken to order the warrant to be executed, unknown to her, had they not been perſuaded it was agreeably to her deſire; eſpecially as Daviſon had communicated to them the ſecret, purely on account of his uncertainty concerning her Majeſty's intention.

ELIZAB. AN' 1587.

After Beal's departure, the Queen told Daviſon ſhe had changed her mind. This ought to have amazed the council, who had ordered execution by their own authority, and yet no care was taken to recall Beal, tho' there paſſed ſeven days between his departure and Mary's execution: but what ſeems ſtill more ſurpriſing is that, during theſe ſeven days, tho' the Queen had declared her mind was altered, not one of her counſellors or miniſters thought of informing her of what was tranſacting. This is a clear evidence, that it was very well known, ſhe did not deſire to be informed.

Queen Mary beheaded. Camden. ‖ Not four, as in the French.

Howſoever this be, the five ‖ earls, appointed to ſee execution done, arriving at Fotheringhay, admoniſhed the Queen of Scots to prepare for death (1), and on the morrow, being the eighth of February, they ſaw her head taken off. I ſhall not here relate all the circumſtances of this tragedy. It ſuffices briefly to obſerve, that ſhe died with great reſolution, and immoveably attached to her religion. The earl of Kent telling her, "that her life would "be the death of the Proteſtant religion in Eng-"land," ſhe rejoiced, and ſaid, "She was con-"demned as guilty of ploting againſt the Queen "of England's life, and yet the earl of Kent had "juſt told her, ſhe was to die for her religion, "wherein ſhe gloried." If Camden may be credited, ſhe proteſted ſhe knew nothing of Babington's practiſes, and that her ſecretaries were ſuborned to witneſs againſt her.

Elizabeth expreſſes great grief at it. Camden.

The news of Mary's execution being brought to Elizabeth, ſhe appeared greatly diſpleaſed. Sighs, tears, wailings and lamentations, were the ſigns ſhe gave of her grief, which ſeemed immoderate. She drove the privy counſellors from her preſenſe, and commanded them to be examined in the ſtar-chamber, and Daviſon to be tried for his diſobedience. A few days after, ſhe, by Robert Carey, ſent to the King of Scotland the following letter.

Daviſon tried. State-Trials. Vol. VII.

While Carey was on the road, Daviſon was cited into the ſtar-chamber, to anſwer to the accuſation of contempt and diſobedience entered againſt him. The accuſation ran, "That he had contemned the "Queen's orders, broke his oath of allegiance, and "neglected his duty: that the Queen, never intend-"ing (for reaſons beſt known to herſelf) that the "Queen of Scots, tho' condemned, ſhould have "been put to death, had however, for preventing "dangers, commanded a warrant for her execu-"tion to be drawn, and commited it to his truſt "and ſecreſy; but that he, forgeting his duty, "had acquainted the council therewith, and put the "warrant in execution, without her Majeſty's "knowledge."

ELIZAB. AN' 1587.

His accuſation and reply.

Daviſon anſwered, "That he was extremely "ſorry to find himſelf accuſed of contempt to the "Queen, who had loaded him with favors: that "he choſe rather to confeſs himſelf guilty of the "crimes he was charged with, than conteſt with "her Majeſty, ſince he could not vindicate himſelf "without failing in the reſpect and duty he owed "her. He however proteſted, he had offended "wholly out of ignorance, being perſuaded he had "done nothing contrary to the Queen's will and "pleaſure. He affirmed, that when the Queen "blamed him for making ſuch haſte to get the "warrant ready, ſhe gave ſome intimation, but "no expreſs command, that he ſhould keep it by "him, neither did he believe himſelf guilty of "breach of truſt, by communicating it only to the "council. As to his being accuſed of not recalling "the warrant, after ſhe had told him ſhe had "changed her mind, he proteſted, it was the "opinion of the whole council, that it ſhould "inſtantly be put in execution, leſt, by a too long "delay, the Queen or ſtate might receive ſome "detriment."

When he had done ſpeaking, the Queen's council preſſed him with his own confeſſion, and with what the lord treaſurer had teſtified, that, doubting whether the Queen had abſolutely conſented to have execution done, Daviſon affirmed it was her intention. Then Daviſon, with tears in his eyes, intreated them not to urge him any farther, but conſider that it was not his place to conteſt with the Queen: adding, that he appealed in this affair to her Majeſty's conſcience, and intirely ſubmited to the cenſure of his judges. Then were made ſeveral ſpeeches, ſome tending to agravate his offenſe, and others to ſhew he had only acted imprudently. In a word, he was ſentenced to a ten thouſand pounds fine, and impriſonment during the Queen's pleaſure. Lord Lumley, in his ſpeech on this occaſion, was not ſatisfied with cenſuring only Daviſon, but flatly charged the whole council, ſaying; "Never was there ſuch a contempt againſt a Prince "heard or read of, that privy counſellors, in the "Queen's palace, and when they had free acceſs "to her, ſhould attempt ſuch a matter without her "advice or knnowledge;" proteſting, "that if "his own ſon was guilty of the like fault, he "would be the firſt to condemn him." But it was far from Elizabeth's intention to puniſh thoſe counſellors, who very ſeemingly had acted only by her private orders: and therefore, to ſcreen them from theſe and the like reproaches, the lord privy-ſeal told the aſſembly, that tho' her Majeſty, being juſtly offended with her council, had left them to a ſtrict examination, yet now, being ſenſible they had tranſgreſſed merely thro' exceſs of zeal for her and the ſtate, ſhe forgave them. Thus Daviſon was the only ſacrifice, tho' the counſellors were ſtill more guilty than he, even ſuppoſing he had acted contrary to the Queen's intention. Daviſon remained long in priſon, without obtaining any other favor than ſome preſents of money from the Queen, to relieve his neceſſities.

Camden, whoſe aim was not to vindicate Elizabeth in any thing relating to the Queen of Scots, has in his annals inſerted the apology which Daviſon, being in priſon, wrote and ſent to ſecretary Walſingham, and of which, without any remark of his own, he leaves his readers to give their judgment. The apology runs thus.

Daviſon's apology. Camden.

"The Queen, after the French and Scotiſh embaſſadors departure, did of her own accord "command me to deliver her the warrant for executing the ſentence againſt the Queen of Scots. "When I had delivered it, ſhe readily ſigned it "with her own hand: when ſhe had ſo done, "ſhe commanded it to be ſealed with the great ſeal "of England; and in a jeſting manner ſaid, Go "tell this to Walſingham, who is now ſick; tho' "I fear he will die for ſorrow when he hears it. "She added alſo the reaſons of her defering it ſo "long; namely, leſt ſhe might ſeem to have been "violently or maliciouſly drawn thereto, whereas "in the mean time ſhe was not ignorant how "neceſſary it was. Moreover ſhe blamed Powlet "and Drury, that they had not eaſed her of this "care, and wiſhed that Walſingham would feel "their pulſes touching this matter.

"The next day after the warrant was under the "great ſeal, ſhe commanded me, by Killegrew, "that it ſhould be done, and when I had informed "her that it was done already, ſhe found fault "with ſuch great haſte, telling me that, in the "judgment of ſome wiſe men, another courſe might "be taken. I anſwered, that the courſe which was "juſt was always beſt and ſafeſt: but fearing leſt "ſhe would lay the fault upon me, (as ſhe had "laid the puting the duke of Norfolk to death "upon lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with "the whole matter, proteſting that I would not "plunge myſelf any deeper in ſo great a buſineſs. "He preſently imparted it to lord Burleigh, and "lord Burleigh to the reſt of the council; who all "conſented to have the execution haſtened, and "every one of them vowed to bear equal ſhare in "the blame, and ſent Beal away with the warrant "and letters. The third day after when, by a "dream which ſhe told of the Queen of Scots "death, I perceived that ſhe wavered in her reſolution, I aſked her, whether ſhe had changed "her mind? She anſwered, no; but another courſe "(ſaid ſhe) might have been deviſed: and withal "ſhe aſked me, whether I had received any anſwer "from Powlet? Whoſe letter when I had ſhewed "her, wherein he flatly refuſed to undertake that "which ſtood not with honor and juſtice; ſhe "waxing angry, accuſed him and others (who had "bound themſelves by the Aſſociation) of perjury "and breach of their vow, as thoſe who had promiſed great matters for their Prince's ſafety, "but would perform nothing. Yet there are (ſaid "ſhe) who will do it for my ſake. But I ſhewed "her how diſhonorable and unjuſt a thing this "would be; and withal into how great danger "ſhe would bring Powlet and Drury by it: for if "ſhe approved the fact, ſhe would draw upon "herſelf both danger and diſhonor, not without "cenſure of injuſtice; and if ſhe diſallowed it, "ſhe would utterly undo men of great deſert, and "their whole poſterity. And afterwards ſhe gave "me a light check the ſame day that the Queen of "Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe was not yet put "to death."

If this apology be genuine, a more convincing proof of Elizabeth's diſſimulation cannot be deſired. The point was not Mary's death, for that was fully determined; but the manner. In this writing it appears, that Elizabeth would have been glad the Scotiſh Queen's two keepers had diſpatched her, that ſhe might have been able to clear herſelf, which ſhe would not have failed doing with both their lives. There remains but one ſcruple, which is, that we have this from Camden only, whoſe teſtimony cannot be reckoned very authentic.

The King of Scotland, having received news of his mother's tragical end, expreſſed thereat a very lively reſentment. His firſt emotions prompted him to vengeance. The ſtates of Scotland, then aſſembled, promiſed him their aſſiſtance; and even ſome of thoſe about his perſon perſuaded him to join with the Pope, France and Spain, to revenge this grievous inſult. Others counſeled him not to break with England, for fear of hazarding, on the uncertain chance of war, his undoubted title to the crown of that kingdom; eſpecially as the Engliſh only wanted perhaps a pretenſe to hinder a Scotiſh Prince from aſcending the throne of England, which he therefore ought to take care not to furniſh them with. Some were of opinion, he ſhould declare openly for neither of the two religions, but keep himſelf always ready to improve the events time ſhould produce. Carey arriving ſoon after, the King refuſed him audience, and it was not without great difficulty that he was perſuaded to receive Elizabeth's letter. We find however, in Melvil's memoirs, that ſome of the Scotiſh court peers had writ to England, that whenever Queen Mary ſhould be put to death, the King her ſon would not very highly reſent it; and accordingly, Melvil affirms, he quickly forgot it. When Elizabeth heard that King James's grief began to abate, ſhe cauſed ſome of thoſe whom ſhe moſt truſted, to repreſent to him, "That in the preſent ſituation of Scotland, "there was no room to expect that a war with "England could be ſucceſsful: if he pretended to "rely on foreign aid, his mother's ſad experience "might teach him how uncertain that was. The "King of France would be ſo far from countenancing him, that it was his intereſt to hinder "the two kingdoms of Great Britain from being "united under the ſame dominion: nay, he would "to the utmoſt of his power oppoſe the ſucceſs of "his arms, for fear he ſhould afterwards aſſiſt "Guiſe, who aſpired to the Gallic crown. The "King of Spain, in pretending to aid him, would "only ſerve himſelf, on account of his groundleſs "claim to the crown of England, as deſcended "from the houſe of Lancaſter: even the Queen his "mother had made a will, the night before her "death, whereby ſhe excluded him from the ſucceſſion, in caſe he perſevered in the Proteſtant "religion, and nominated for her heir Philip II; "which will was ſent into Spain: he was therefore "to expect no aſſiſtance from Philip, but rather to "conſider him as his capital enemy. In a word, "if he made war upon Elizabeth, and the parliament paſſed a ſtatute againſt him, he ran the "hazard of being for ever excluded from a noble "ſucceſſion, which he could not fail to injoy, provided he would but remain in peace." To all theſe arguments it was alſo added, "That Eliza"beth had for him a ſingular affection, and more"over deemed herſelf bound in honor and duty to "repair the mother's wrongs by leaving her crown "to the ſon, in caſe he gave her no occaſion to do "otherwiſe." Theſe repreſentations had their effect. James ſaw it was his intereſt to keep fair with Elizabeth, and that, added to the ſentence given againſt Daviſon (which was ſent him) ſo ſtifled Elizabeth ſends a fleet againſt the Spaniards. Camden. Burchett. Stow. p. 742. Strype's Ann. Vol. III. p. 451.

Mean while Elizabeth, underſtanding the Spaniard was making great preparations to invade England, ſent Drake with a good fleet upon the coaſt of Spain, with orders to deſtroy whatever Spaniſh ſhips ſhould fall in his way. This admiral's firſt expedition was to the port of Cadiz, where he burned upwards of a hundred veſſels laden with ammunition and proviſions, and a large galeon of the marquis of Santa Cruz, with another of Raguſa, full of rich merchandize. Then returning to Cape St. Vincent, he did great damage to the inhabitants along the coaſt; after which he came to the river Tagus mouth, where he in vain provoked the ſaid marquis by plundering and burning the ſhips he found there. Thence he ſailed to the Azores iſlands, and meeting in the way with a rich carac, named San Felipe, returning from Eaſt India, eaſily took her (2). The proviſions and ſtores the Spaniards loſt at Cadiz, taking that galeon and carac, and the other damages they ſuſtained, obliged Philip to defer 'till next year the expedition he had projected againſt England (3). While Drake was acting againſt Spain in Europe, Cavendiſh was doing the like in America, having entered the South-Sea by the ſtraits of Magellan. He without oppoſition ravaged the Chili and Peru coaſts, doing the Spaniards great damage in thoſe parts.

The ſtates of the United Provinces complain of Leiceſter. Grotius. Strada.

About the cloſe of laſt year, I left the earl of Leiceſter on his return to England, after having ſet on foot his project to become Sovereign of the United Provinces, by fomenting confuſion and diſcord. Before he went, the ſtates began to perceive his deſigns; and the orders he left at his going and which the officers, his creatures, punctually executed, fully confirmed their ſuſpicions. For this reaſon they ſent embaſſadors to Elizabeth to complain of him: but his credit, and Queen Mary's affair which then held the court imployed, hindered the embaſſadors from being ſo ſpeedily diſpatched as they deſired. It even happened in this interval, that Stanley and York, who held of the earl of Leiceſter the governments of Deventer and a fort near Zutphen, delivered theſe two places to the duke of Parma: ſo, the ſtates, no longer confiding in that general, gave the command of their army to count Maurice of Naſſau, ſecond ſon of the late Prince of Orange. They took likewiſe ſome other ſteps which plainly ſhewed that, having diſcovered the earl of Leiceſter's deſigns, they would not admit his puting them in practiſe. The duke of Parma beſieging Sluys in this interim, Leiceſter returned from England to raiſe the ſiege, but had not the good fortune to ſucceed. Finding at length that he was every where diſtruſted, he reſolved forcibly to execute what he had projected. In order thereto, he was for poſſeſſing himſelf, all at once, of ſeveral places in the heart of the country, to keep the reſt in awe: but his ſcheme to ſurpriſe Leyden taking vent very ſeaſonably, all correſpondence between him and the ſtates intirely ceaſed. Queen Elizabeth being thereupon obliged to recall him, lord Willoughby was ſent to ſucceed him, but with no other authority than the command of the Engliſh forces. Then the ſtates appointed count Maurice their captain-general.

Philip II prepares to invade England. Camden.

Mean while Philip II, ever intent on the project of invading England, continued making extraordinary preparations. This ſcheme was formed ever ſince the Queen of Scots had been perſuaded to convey to him her right to England, as being the only means to reſtore there the Catholic religion. According to the received maxim in the Romiſh church, that a Heretic is unworthy and incapable of injoying a crown, King Philip thought he might juſtly claim that of England, as being the neareſt Catholic of the Lancaſtrian line: but to have a clearer inſight into his pretenſions, it is neceſſary the reader turns his eye to that Monarch's genealogy, which ſhews him deſcended from two daughters of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, King Edward III's fourth ſon. On this deſcent, therefore, and the Scotiſh Queen's teſtamentary conveyance, he had projected the conqueſt of England. Elizabeth, not being thereof ignorant, took all poſſible care to be in a defenſible poſture, and both colored their preparations with various pretenſes. To amuſe Elizabeth, Philip propoſed her mediation for a peace between him and the revolted Netherland provinces. Elizabeth perfectly knew Philip's aim, and, to amuſe him in her turn, accepted the mediation, in hopes the negociation would give her more time to be prepared. She propoſed therefore to the ſtates a peace with Spain, intimating, they could not refuſe entering into treaty without incurring the blame of continuing a war thro' obſtinacy: ſhe moreover promiſed them to have their intereſt as much at heart as her own; but the ſtates abſolutely refuſed treating, as having frequently experienced ſuch negociations to be fatal to them. Nevertheleſs, ſhe ſent plenipotentiaries over to Flanders, on the ſuppoſition, as ſhe gave out, that the ſtates would be forced to agree to her deciſions with Spain. Three months paſſed before the place of congreſs ſhould be ſetled. Elizabeth required, as preliminaries, a general pardon for the confederates; that the Netherland towns ſhould injoy all their ancient privileges, and the old alliance between England and Spain be renewed; that ſome good fund be aſſigned her for payment of what was due from the ſtates, and the forces on both ſides be diſmiſſed. As to religion, the Spaniards demanded, that it ſhould be intirely as his Catholic Majeſty thought fit, ſince he hindered not the Queen of England from ſetling it in her dominions as ſhe herſelf pleaſed. Elizabeth inſiſted not very ſtrongly on this article; whether ſhe believed every Sovereign to have a right to impoſe a religion upon his people, or, to amuſe the Spaniard, feigned to relax, that ſhe might not obſtruct a negociation the continuance whereof could not but be to her advantage. Howſoever this was, ſhe went ſo far as to be ſatisfied, that the exerciſe of the Reformed religion ſhould be tolerated two years only in the United Provinces. As for the places in her poſſeſſion, ſhe refuſed not reſtoring them, provided ſhe was reimburſed. On theſe reciprocal demands, the Spaniards took care to delay concluding the preliminaries, imagining that the hope of a ſpeedy accommodation would prevent Elizabeth from preparing againſt their attacks. They refuſed coming to any agreement about religion; and with regard to Elizabeth's charges in ſupporting the confederates, they pretended they were to be balanced by the expenſes to which ſhe had put his Catholic Majeſty. At length the preparations which were making throughout 'The Pope unites with Philip. Camden.

I have already mentioned Philip's pretenſions to England and Ireland. Ferdinand the Catholic, his great grandfather had not ſo plauſible a claim to the kingdoms of Naples and Navarre which he ſeized, and ſtill were parcel of the Spaniſh monarchy. But beſide theſe pretenſions, Philip made uſe of another pretext, very proper to impoſe on mankind, I mean a great fervency of zeal for the reſtoration of Catholiciſm in the three kingdoms of Great Britain. He had thereby wheedled Sixtus V into his project, the execution whereof would be as well glorious as advantageous to both, but whereof Philip was to furniſh the whole expenſe: as for his ſaid Sanctity, he had nothing to contribute but what thoſe Holy Fathers were wont to ſupply on ſuch occaſions, namely, vows, prayers, and curſes. To countenance therefore his Catholic Majeſty's enterpriſe, Sixtus fulminated againſt Elizabeth a bull, abſolving her ſubjects from their oath of allegiance, and beſtowing her realms on him who ſhould be firſt ready to make the ſeizure. This was the King of Spain, who was now in a poſture to imbrace the Pontif's munificent offer.

The Invincible Armada. Camden. Stow. Speed. Strype's An. Vol. III. Appen. N. 51.

He had in Portugal, Naples and Sicily, prepared a mighty Armada, to which, by anticipation, was given the epithet Invincible. It conſiſted of one hundred and fifty great ſhips, whereon were imbarked nineteen thouſand men, and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty cannon (1). It was to be commanded by marquis De Santa Cruz; but that nobleman dying while the fleet was equiping, the duke of Medina-Celi was appointed admiral of this huge Armada. On the other hand, the duke of Parma had cauſed an army thirty thouſand ſtrong (2) to advance towards the Netherland coaſts, and prepared a great number of veſſels to tranſport them, in order to join the Spaniſh fleet, and land in England (3). The ſcheme was, to have ſtationed the Armada at the Thames mouth, to aſſiſt the land army which was to march directly to London.

Elizabeth's preparations. Camden. Stow. p. 749. Fox. Speed. Strype.

Elizabeth, who wanted not good ſpies, having timely intelligence of theſe grand preparatives, provided for the defenſe of her kingdom with great care and diligence. She fited out a conſiderable navy, which however was inferior to that of Spain, both in number and burden of the ſhips, and gave the command to Charles lord Howard of Effingham, a perſon very expert in maritime affairs. He had for vice-admirals, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, three of the beſt ſea-officers then in the univerſe (4). On the other hand, Henry Seymour, the late duke of Somerſet's ſon, lay upon the coaſt of Flanders with forty ſail, Engliſh and Dutch, to hinder the Prince of Parma from joining the Spaniſh fleet. Moreover, Elizabeth had aſhore an army of forty thouſand men, whereof three thouſand, under command of the earl of Leiceſter, were poſted near the Thames mouth. The reſt were near the Queen's perſon, ready to march where it ſhould be judged neceſſary (5). Beſide this, there was in each county a body of militia well armed, under leaders who had orders to join each other as occaſion ſhould require. It is certain, there are no trained-bands in the world more proper for a bold action than thoſe of England: ſo in caſe the Spaniards had landed, they would not have wanted entertainment. The ſea-ports were as well provided and fortified (6) as the time would permit, and ſignals were every where appointed to denote whither the troops were to march. In ſhort, it was reſolved, that if the Spaniards made a deſcent, the country about them ſhould be laid waſte, that they might have nothing to ſubſiſt on but what they brought from on board. This was the courſe Francis I took in Provence againſt Charles V, with a ſucceſs anſwering his expectations. Theſe meaſures being taken, the enemy was expected with uncommon alacrity, tho' it ſhould ſeem that all ſhould, at ſuch a juncture, have been in the utmoſt conſternation.

An' 1588. Elizabeth's imbaraſs.

Mean while Elizabeth was not free from perplexity. The hour ſhe had ever dreaded was finally arrived. Her crown lay at ſtake, and ſhe was to defend it without the aſſiſtance of any ally. This ſhe had conſtantly indeavored to prevent, even from the begining of her reign, by all the artifices her policy could ſuggeſt; by fomenting the troubles of Scotland; by entering into alliance with France; by feigning to marry the duke of Anjou; by aſſiſting the French Hugonots, and the revolted Netherlanders; and, finally, by beheading the Queen of Scots. She had ſucceeded hitherto, and tho' ſurrounded with enemies, had found means to imploy them at home, and prevent them from directly invading England: but the time was now come that her right muſt be expoſed to the chance of war. Tho' ſhe was generally beloved by her ſubjects, ſhe was not ignorant that England abounded with ſuch as were diſaffected, particularly among the Catholics: nay, ſhe had reaſon to fear they correſponded with the King of Spain, and favored his invaſion. On the other hand, ſhe was not eaſy with reſpect to the Iriſh, on account of their religion, and the correſpondents Sixtus and Philip had in that iſland: but ſhe was under a ſtill greater concern with regard to Scotland. She had juſt put King James's mother to death by the hand of the executioner, and if that Prince ſhould be agitated with the thirſt of revenge, he could never have a fairer opportunity, ſince it was in his power to favor the

The Spaniſh book ſoon came into the hands of the lord treaſurer Burleigh, in diverſe places whereof Strype ſaw notes added by that lord ſoon after the defeat. From this book he has inſerted a brief account of the Spaniſh Armada, in his appendix of original papers, Ann. Vol. III. N. 51. The ſum whereof is this, that there were in all 130 ſhips of 57,868 tons, 19,295 ſoldiers, and 8,450 mariners, 2,088 ſlaves, and 2,630 braſs pieces of all ſorts, beſide 20 caravels for the ſervice of the army, and 10 ſalves with ſix oars each. On this emergency the city of London lent the Queen great ſums of money: and being deſired to furniſh five thouſand men, and fifteen ſhips, they granted ten thouſand men, and thirty ſhips. Spaniards,

Eliza b. An' 1588.

Spaniards deſcent in one extremity of the kingdom, by making a diverſion in the other. In a word, if ſhe could not hinder the Spaniards from landing in England, ſhe muſt neceſſarily reſolve to hazard a battle, the country not being proper to prolong the war. All this was more than ſufficient to inſpire her with a juſt dread, which yet ſhe moſt careſully concealed. If ever ſhe diſplayed her ability, it was on this important occaſion. Far from ſhewing the leaſt depreſſion of ſpirits, ſhe incouraged her people by her looks, her reſolution, her affability, which made them think ſhe was concerned only for them, and on her own account regardleſs of the danger. Mean while, ſhe took care of all things with a wonderful prudence, and a preſenſe of mind rarely to be found in the greateſt men, and which gained her univerſal praiſe and admiration. Some counſeled her to cut off the leading Catholics, or at leaſt to ſend them over-ſea: but this ſhe judged would be diſcovering too much fear, beſide the great injuſtice of deſtroying or ruining people on bare ſurmiſes. She contented herſelf with cauſing ſome to be arreſted, and put into cuſtody, telling them, however, it was only by way of precaution, which, inſtead of injuring, would ſcreen them from the violence of their enemies.

Camden.

As for Ireland, ſhe ſent orders to ſir William Fitz-Williams, then lord deputy, diſtinctly pointing out to him what precautions he ſhould uſe to hinder the Iriſh from riſing. But above all things, ſhe took care to careſs the King of Scotland, and put him in hope of ample acknowledgment, if on this occaſion he inviolably adhered to the Proteſtant religion, and the intereſt of Great-Britain. She repreſented to him, that, in reſpect to England, he was to conſider the King of Spain as a dangerous competitor, and that the loſs of one of the Britiſh realms would not fail being attended with the other's ruin. But her uneaſineſs with regard to Scotland was not long-lived, ſince ſhe ſoon had the ſatisfaction to hear that James, knowing perfectly his own intereſt, had no correſpondence with the King of Spain, but even ſtood on his guard for fear of being himſelf invaded.

Expedition of the Spaniſh fleet. Camden. Stow.

The duke of Medina-Celi, with the Invincible Armada, ſet ſail from the river Tagus, on the third of June *, and ſteered his courſe northwards. Within a few days, a ſtorm ariſing ſo diſperſed the ſhips, that they could not re-join 'till they came to Coruna †. This accident occaſioned a report throughout Europe, that the Spaniſh fleet was intirely deſtroyed. Even ſecretary Walſingham thought his intelligence ſo certain, that he wrote to the lord-admiral Howard, to ſend home four of the largeſt ſhips, there being no farther danger this year. But the admiral anſwered, he could not think of parting with the four ſhips, tho' he ſhould be obliged to keep them at his own charge, 'till he had more certain advice. The better to know the truth, the wind turning to the north, he ſailed with his whole fleet towards Spain, with deſign to complete the deſtruction of the enemy's Armada, which was repreſented to him as utterly diſabled: but on approaching the Spaniſh coaſt, he heard the fleet had not ſuffered ſo much damage as was rumored. At the ſame time, the wind changing ſoutherly, he ſailed back to his ſtation at the channel's mouth, for fear with the ſame wind the enemies fleet ſhould advance towards England.

* Camden ſays May 20.
† Corruptly called The Groyne.

It was the twelfth of July before the Spaniards departed from Coruna, and two days after, the duke of Medina-Celi ſent a yatcht to notify it to the duke of Parma, that he might be ready to join him. The nineteenth, the Spaniſh fleet entered the channel, and the twentieth, appeared in ſight of the Engliſh, who let it paſs in order to follow it before the wind. Camden has, in his annals, inſerted a journal of what paſſed in the channel 'till the Spaniards retired northwards. I think it not very neceſſary to copy this journal; which beſide is ſomewhat obſcure, and gives no very perfect idea of the bravery and conduct of the Engliſh. It will ſuffice to ſay, that while the Spaniards were in the channel, the Engliſh kept cloſe to them, and even took ſome of their ſhips. Of this number were a galeon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, which was ſent to Dartmouth, and a large Biſcayner, in which was the Armada's money; but, the ſhip having before taken fire, the Spaniards had removed the treaſure.

Eliza b. An' 1588.

The twenty-third of July, the wind being north, the duke of Medina-Celi ſtood towards the Engliſh fleet. There was that day a ſharp ingagement, wherein the Spaniards, tho' much ſuperior in number, gained no advantage: the unweildineſs of their ſhips, and the agility of the Engliſh, made it eaſy for theſe laſt to ſtand off or on, as they ſaw fit, and ſo to balance their enemies ſuperiority. The trial the Spaniards made on this occaſion of the Engliſh valor and ſkill in ſea-ingagements, doubtleſs began to give them a quite different opinion of their enterpriſe than they had thitherto conceived.

Mean while, the duke of Medina-Celi daily ſent meſſengers to preſs the duke of Parma to put to ſea with his army: but that was not practicable, by reaſon of the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips advantageouſly poſted to obſtruct the junction. It was neceſſary for the Spaniards to approach the coaſt of Flanders, to compel them to retire (1): but the twenty-ſeventh in the evening, they were no farther than off Calais, where they anchored, being ſtill followed by the Engliſh, who lay within ſhot. Here the Engliſh navy was joined by a good number of ſhips, not only of the Queen's, but of diverſe private perſons, who had fited out ſeveral at their own expenſe (2). The fleet then conſiſted of a hundred and forty warlike ſhips, ſmall indeed in compariſon of the Spaniſh, yet having over them the advantage of moving much more readily, and of retiring into the ports of England in caſe of neceſſity. The duke of Parma, who was to ſail from Dunkirk and Newport, was ſtill earneſtly ſollicited by the duke of Medina-Celi to put to ſea, and make a deſcent in England, as it had been reſolved: but, beſide that the ſhips which waited for him were not yet withdrawn, notwithſtanding the neighborhood of the Spaniſh Armada, abundance of his mariners had deſerted, and his ſhips but ſcantily victualed. In a word, he either could not, or would not imbark.

Stow. Camden.

While the Spaniards lay before Calais, the Engliſh admiral ſent * amidſt them eight fire-ſhips. This ſtruck them with ſuch a panic, that inſtantly cuting their cables, they put to ſea to avoid the menaced deſtruction. In this confuſion, the admiral-galeaſs, commanded by Hugo de Moncada, having loſt its rudder, floated about at random 'till the morrow, when the Engliſh took it, after a very ſmart diſpute, wherein Moncada was killed. Tho' the Spaniſh admiral had ordered every ſhip to return to its ſtation as ſoon as the danger was paſſed, and made a ſignal for that purpoſe, yet few offered to obey: inſomuch that the Armada remained diſperſed, ſome of the ſhips being driven away northwards, and others upon the ſhallows of Flanders, where they ran extreme hazards. They had not only to guard againſt the ſands, but alſo againſt the Engliſh, who ſo plied them with their artillery, that ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips were that day diſabled, and the St. Martha galleon * became a prey to the Zealanders. Finally, a N. W. wind driving the fleet upon the Zealand coaſt, where they could ſcarce avoid periſhing, the Engliſh gave over their chace, for fear of being expoſed to a like peril. Happily for the Spaniards, the wind veered about to the S. W. very ſeaſonably, and freed them from this diſtreſs. But now, perceiving the impoſſibility of executing their project, they reſolved to return home, by ſailing round Scotland and Ireland, and the rather as ſome of their ſhips had already ſteered that courſe. The Engliſh admiral, ſeeing them ſtand to the northward, left a ſquadron to guard the coaſt of Flanders, and gave them chace, tho' at ſome diſtance, 'till they had paſſed Edinburg-Frith. The courſe they ſteered gave ſome ſuſpicion, that they were ſure of a retreat in the ports of Scotland. Whereupon the Engliſh embaſſador at King James's court made him large offers, and even certain promiſes, which he had not power to make, and which were never performed (1).

July 30. * The galeons San Felipe and San Matteo.

Mean while, the Spaniards, continuing their courſe, ſuſtained farther damages by contrary winds, which occaſioned their loſing ſeveral ſhips on the coaſts of Scotland and Ireland. Seven hundred ſoldiers and mariners, who had eſcaped to land in the King of Scotland's dominions, were ſent to the duke of Parma, with Elizabeth's conſent: but all thoſe who were wrecked and got aſhore in Ireland were either ſlaughtered or hanged; the lord-deputy, by whoſe orders it was done, fearing they would join with the rebels; at leaſt this was a pretenſe to excuſe his barbarity (2).

Strype's Ann. Vol. III. p. 522.

Philip II received the news of his Armada's bad ſucceſs with moſt heroic conſtancy. He had imployed three whole years in preparing this mighty navy, with incredible expenſe, and when he heard of its defeat, ſo contrary to his hopes, he thanked the Almighty his loſs was no greater (3).

Philip's patience at his misfortune. Camden.

The retreat of this ſo formidable a fleet filled England with exceſſive rejoicing. Elizabeth ordered a ſolemn thankſgiving for this deliverance to be offered in every church in the kingdom, and went herſelf to St. Paul's (4) in great ſolemnity to perform the ſame duty. After that, ſhe confered on the lord-admiral a yearly revenue, in recompenſe of his great ſervice to his country, and beſtowed penſions on the wounded. For the reſt, their rewards conſiſted more in words than in deeds.

He reported, that the King of Scotland had teſtified his ſincere attachment to the intereſt of England and the Proteſtant religion, and told him, "That he looked for no other favor from the Spa-" niards, than what Polyphemus promiſed Ulyſſes, "namely, that he ſhould be the laſt devoured."

September the † fourth, this year, died the earl of Leiceſter, a man little deſerving his greatneſs, if moſt of the hiſtorians are to be credited. His death drew tears from the Queen, who nevertheleſs ordered his goods to be ſold at a public ſale, for payment of the ſums ſhe had lent him.

† Nov. December 14, as in the French. Earl of Leiceſter dies. Camden. Stow. Affairs of the Netherlands. Strada. Camden.

After the Spaniſh fleet had left the coaſt of Flanders, the duke of Parma, ſeeing the enterpriſe blaſted, beſieged Bergen-op-zoom, where both governor and gariſon were Engliſh. This ſiege acquired great reputation to the governor, who, by a gallant defenſe, finally obliged the duke to quit the premiſſes and retire.

The ſame year, ſo memorable for England, was no leſs ſo for France. The duke of Guiſe, grown more powerful than the King, came to Paris in May, and by favor of the people, whoſe idol he was, obliged the King to depart, having firſt ſeen the furious populace chaining up the ſtreets, and preparing to attack his perſon in the Louvre: this is what writers term "The Barricadoes of "Paris." This inſolent action was followed by an agreement, which King Henry was conſtrained to make with the chief leaguers, whereby he put ſeveral places into their hands. But next December, Henry perceiving his ruin inevitable except he got rid of the duke of Guiſe, and his brother the cardinal, cauſed them both to be aſſaſſinated at Blois, where the ſtates of France were aſſembled. Thus he freed himſelf from a preſent danger, but it was only to fall into another; for this action made the league and the city of Paris openly declare againſt him.

Of France. Thuanus. Mezerai.

As for Scotland, during the whole year 1588, it injoyed a perfect tranquillity. So long as James had about him miniſters and counſellors attached to the intereſt of England, his days were generally ſpeaking pacific and eaſy: inſomuch that nothing interrupted his quiet this year, but what related to his marriage, which he could not accompliſh, tho' he wiſhed it moſt paſſionately. Melvil inſinuates, that chancellor Maitland, who then managed that Prince's affairs, was bribed by Elizabeth: that ſhe gave penſions to moſt of the counſellors of Scotland, and that her aim was to prevent James's marrying. He had ſent embaſſadors to Copenhagen, to treat of his marriage with the eldeſt daughter of Frederic II; but by the artifice of his miniſters, the embaſſadors power was ſo limited that it was not poſſible for them to conclude. On the other hand, while this marriage was negociating, one Du Bartas, a French poet, one of the King of Navarre's domeſtics, came to Edinburg, under color of paying his reſpects to the King, who had expreſſed ſome eſteem for his works, and propoſed, as of himſelf, James's marriage with Princeſs Catherine, his royal maſter's ſiſter. He ſaid ſo many fine things of this lady, that King James, by the advice of his council, ſent lord Tungland, Melvil's

The King of Denmark having thereof notice, and withal perceiving the limited power of the Scotiſh embaſſadors, believed he was mocked, and gave his daughter to the duke of Brunſwic. An' 1589. Conſpiracy in Scotland takes vent. Camden. Melvil, p. 175.

Soon after, early in 1589, was diſcovered in Scotland a conſpiracy againſt King James, contrived by the earls of Huntley and Bothwell, ſon of one of King James V's natural ſons (1). Their deſign was to ſeize the King's perſon, and compel him to reſtore Popery in Scotland (2). Some pretend, that they were excited by emiſſaries from Spain. James prevented the execution of this plot by his diligence. He purſued the earl of Huntley, who had taken arms, 'till he finally conſtrained him to yield at diſcretion. As for Bothwell, he withdrew to his own houſe, where he meditated new projects, whereof mention ſhall be made hereafter. I return to the affairs of England.

Trial of the earl of Arundel. April 18. State-Trials. Camden.

Philip Howard earl of Arundel, the late duke of Norfolk's eldeſt ſon, who had been three years priſoner in the Tower, was at length brought to trial before his peers, being accuſed of conſpiring againſt the Queen and ſtate. Camden gives us to underſtand, that the moſt could be proved upon him was his being diſaffected to the government, and over zealouſly attached to Popery. He was however ſentenced to death; but Elizabeth vouchſafed him a pardon.

The Queen ſpares his life.

Elizabeth's tranquillity.

Her ſaid Majeſty now injoyed a tranquillity to which ſhe had been a ſtranger, even from the begining of her reign. The Queen of Scotland was no longer among the living, and the King her ſon, in expectation of one day ſucceeding Elizabeth, ſtifled his reſentment, or rather had utterly forgot his mother's tragical cataſtrophe. The King of Spain was incapacitated from making any freſh attempt upon England, ſince the diſaſtrous ſucceſs of his Invincible Armada. The United Provinces affairs began to be reſtored, thro' the magnanimity and wiſe conduct of count Maurice; and thoſe of France were in ſuch a ſituation that England had nothing to apprehend from that quarter. The duke of Guiſe, Elizabeth's capital enemy, was no more, his ſon in priſon, and the duke of Mayenne wholly intent on revenging the blood of his two brothers. As for Sixtus V, tho' extremely capable of forming grand projects, he could not execute them without the aid of ſome Catholic Potentate; and the King of Spain, on whom alone he could depend, was intirely ingroſſed with meditating how to improve the troubles of France. As for the Engliſh Papiſts, there was no likelihood of their moving at a juncture when they could not expect any foreign aſſiſtance.

She ſends a fleet againſt Spain. Camden. Stow.

In this ſtate of proſperity Elizabeth, having nothing to fear either at home or abroad, was diſpoſed to convince his Catholic Majeſty, that the Engliſh could as well attack as defend. But as ſhe was extremely frugal, and any important enterpriſe againſt Spain could not but be very expenſive, ſhe ſo managed that Drake and Norris took upon them to be at the charge, in hopes of re-imburſing themſelves from the booty they ſhould acquire: ſo all ſhe furniſhed was a few ſhips (3), with permiſſion to raiſe ſoldiers and mariners for the expedition. Drake had already tried the Spaniards in America, and the Channel, and was convinced they were more formidable by fame than in reality. Wherefore, joining with Norris, and ſome other private perſons, they equiped a fleet, and imbarked eleven thouſand ſoldiers, and fifteen hundred mariners. The Hollanders having alſo added ſome ſhips, the fleet conſiſted of eighty ſail (4) of all ſorts. Drake commanded at ſea, and Norris was general of the land-forces. They took with them Don Antonio, who ſtiled himſelf King of Portugal, and hoped, by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, to be put in poſſeſſion of that kingdom, where he pretended to have many friends.

The expedition. Camden. Stow.

They ſailed from Plymouth the eighteenth of April, and ſoon after arrived at Coruna, where landing their troops, they aſſaulted the lower town and carried it by ſtorm. Then they beſieged the upper town: but Norris having advice that count Andrada was approaching with a body of forces, to relieve the place, ſuddenly raiſed the ſiege to march againſt him, but the Spaniſh count thinking proper to retire, he purſued, and overtaking him ſlew three thouſand of his followers. This done, he deſtroyed diverſe villages, and without returning to the ſiege, re-imbarked his troops. The chief deſign of the Engliſh was to exert themſelves principally againſt Portugal.

May 6.

Stow.

While they were bending their courſe towards the coaſts of that kingdom, they met the earl of Eſſex, who joined the fleet with ſome ſhips he had armed at his own charge, and unknown to her Majeſty. Some days after, they arrived at Penicha, a ſmall town of Portugal, which being reduced was reſtored to Don Antonio. Thence Norris marched by land to Liſbon, Drake promiſing to follow with the fleet up the Tagus. The army marched ſixty miles without any oppoſition, and incamping before Liſbon took St. Catherine's ſuburb. But as Drake performed not his promiſe, and the army wanted cannon and ammunition, it was in a council of war reſolved to retire. This reſolution was taken becauſe there was no appearance that the Portugueſes were inclined to revolt, as Don Antonio had expected, and alſo becauſe no tidings came of his boaſted aid from the Emperor of Morocco. The army marching towards the mouth of the Tagus met Drake, who had taken the town of Caſcaes, and excuſed himſelf upon the impoſſibility of performing his promiſes. Some days after, Caſcaes caſtle alſo ſurrendering, it was blown up, and the Engliſh, to make themſelves amends for the charges they had been at in this armament, ſeized ſixty veſſels laden with corn (5) belonging to the Hanſe Towns. Then they went and took Vigo, abandoned by its inhabitants, and firing the town returned to England. This expedition did King Philip ſome damage, but was of no benefit to Elizabeth, and the booty was not ſufficient to defray the expenſe of equiping the ſquadron (6). Beſide this, upwards of ſix thouſand periſhed by ſickneſs. The only advantage reaped by the Engliſh was, that they were more convinced of the weakneſs of the Spaniards at home.

them by Edward III, it was expreſly provided, they ſhould not import any commodities into the dominions of the profeſſed and open enemies of England: ſecondly, a neutrality was to be ſo conducted, that in pleaſuring one of the parties the other ſhould not be prejudiced; and that it was notorious, that either proviſions or ammunitions carried to one of the contending parties were contraband, and conſequently ſeizable: thirdly, they could not juſtly complain of theſe confiſcations, ſince the Queen had warned them not to import any proviſions to Spain and Portugal, except they would hazard their being made prize of by the Engliſh.

Affairs of France. Thuanus. Mezerai. Camden.

All this was not of any great moment: but what paſſed in France this year was abundantly more conſiderable. Henry III's bold ſtroke, in cauſing the duke of Guiſe to quit the world by ſuch violent means, ſerved only to throw him into a greater imbaraſs. His again ſwearing to the league, in preſenſe of the general ſtates, before he diſmiſſed them, imported very little. The leaguers, as they could no longer confide either in his promiſes or oaths, alienated from him, in a manner, the whole kingdom. Hence he found himſelf neceſſitated to call to his aſſiſtance the King of Navarre and the Hugonots, and join them to oppoſe the league. It is very remarkable that this Prince, who had ſworn to extirpate the Hugonots, and ſolemnly declared he would never keep promiſe with them, ſcarce found any other ſubjects but the Hugonots in whom he could confide. The forces brought him by the King of Navarre, and ten thouſand Swiſſers, two thouſand Landſquenets, with ſome horſe, which came in ſeaſon, inabled him to beſiege or block up Paris with thirty-eight thouſand men. But juſt as he ſaw himſelf on the point of forcing the Pariſians to return to their duty, Jacques Clement, a Jacobin monk, gave him a deſperate ſtab in the belly with a dagger, of which he died in two days. Before he expired, he nominated for his ſucceſſor the King of Navarre, head of the Bourbon family, who aſſumed the name of Henry IV.

The league refuſed to acknowledge the new King: nay, he found himſelf deſerted by diverſe grandees of the King's party; and, in order to retain ſome of the Catholic nobility, he was obliged to promiſe them, that he would, in a certain ſpace of time, be inſtructed in the principles of the Romiſh religion; that is, would turn Catholic: for ſuch was the conſtruction laid on thoſe words. Mean while he had neither army nor treaſure, the Swiſſers and Germans who had ſerved Henry III, threatening to leave him, in caſe he diſcharged not their arrears, which demand he was not able to ſatisfy. In this extremity he had recourſe to Elizabeth, who generouſly promiſed him both men and money. In expectation of theſe ſuccors, he ſtood firm againſt the duke of Mayenne, who had forced him into Normandy, and even attacked him at Arques, but without ſucceſs. Henry thought himſelf in ſuch danger, that he would have imbraced the counſel ſome had given him of croſſing over to England, had he not been warmly diſſuaded by marſhal Biron. At length arrived the Engliſh ſupplies, conſiſting of four thouſand men, under conduct of lord Willoughby, and twenty-two thouſand pounds ſterling in gold. With this reinforcement he was able to approach Paris, and reduce one of that capital's ſuburbs: but Mayenne having entered with his army, he was conſtrained to withdraw. Mean while, the duke of Mayenne had cauſed old cardinal de Bourbon to be proclaimed King, and himſelf had aſſumed the title of lieutenant-general of the realm. Henry, quitting the neighborhood of Paris, returned into Normandy, where he reduced to his obedience ſome places, which done he diſmiſſed the Engliſh auxiliaries.

Tho' the King of Denmark had diſpoſed of his eldeſt daughter to the duke of Brunſwic, the King of Scotland perſiſted in his deſign to marry into his family, and demanded his ſecond daughter. Frederic acquieſced, but on condition the ſaid Princeſs ſhould be demanded, by a ſolemn embaſſy, before the firſt of May: but he died in the interval, leaving his crown to a minor. This prevented not James's thinking ſeriouſly of his marriage with Princeſs Ann, the new King's ſiſter: but when he moved in council the Copenhagen embaſſy, he was anſwered, that it would be hazarding a rupture with the Queen of England, if he married without conſulting her. The authors of this advice were well ſatisfied that Elizabeth would raiſe obſtacles to this match. In effect, in her anſwer to the King, ſhe tried to make him ſenſible of ſundry inconveniencies if he eſpouſed the Princeſs of Denmark; and to divert him from it, propoſed to him Princeſs Catherine, ſiſter to the King of Navarre, who had not then acceded to the Gallic crown, promiſing therein to ſerve him to the utmoſt of her ability. Elizabeth's anſwer being laid before the council, all, even to a man, declared againſt the Daniſh match. James was ſo nettled at being thus oppoſed, that, by means of a truſty domeſtic, he got the Edinburgers to take arms, and menace the chancellor and privy-counſellors with being torn piece-meal in caſe his Majeſty's marriage with the Princeſs of Denmark was not accompliſhed. Theſe threats terrifying the council, embaſſadors were inſtantly appointed to negociate this alliance: but withal care was taken to inſert in their inſtructions a clauſe, which put them to a ſtand at the very entrance on their negociation, and obliged them to ſend home lord Dingual, to demand fuller powers, or leave to return. His ſaid lordſhip arriving at court when the chancellor was abſent, the King himſelf drew the power required by his embaſſadors; whereupon the marriage was ſpeedily concluded. Preſently after the new Queen was delivered to the embaſſadors to be conducted into Scotland: but a ſtorm, ariſing while ſhe was at ſea, drove her upon the Norway coaſt, where ſhe was forced to go aſhore for ſhelter. The wind continued ſo long contrary that James, impatient for a ſight of his bride, could not wait 'till it became favorable: ſo, imbarking on a ſmall veſſel, he went to his Queen, and paſſed the whole winter in Norway and Denmark, whence he returned not to Scotland 'till May next year, bringing with him his conſort.

The tranquillity Elizabeth injoyed was liable to be diſturbed only from Spain. France was not in condition to create her any uneaſineſs, and the King of Scotland thought only of living peaceably, in expectation of the noble ſucceſſion he ſhould one day inherit. Philip II was therefore the ſole enemy Elizabeth had to fear: but to ſecure herſelf from all ſurpriſe, ſhe took the juſteſt tho' very expenſive precautions. She had conſtantly a ſtout and well-conditioned navy, ready to put to ſea on the ſhorteſt notice. The fortified towns and maritime ports were alſo in good condition, and this coſt her as much as if ſhe had been in actual war with Spain: but ſhe ſupplied all by her excellent œconomy, expending no money but what was abſolutely neceſſary. This highly diſguſted her ravenous courtiers, who would gladly have had her ſomewhat more liberal: but tho' ſhe knew herſelf taxed with penury, ſhe thought not fit to alter her conduct. She thereby avoided being troubleſome to the parliament, and, when ſhe wanted any extraordinary aid, was ſure to find a ready compliance in the houſe of commons, without murmurings among her people. This advantage vantage ſufficiently balanced the empty pleaſure of being by her courtiers ſtiled a munificent Princeſs: beſide, ſhe was perſuaded that what was in her termed avarice was only prudent œconomy. The truth is, with the uſual crown-revenues ſhe found means to ſupply the expenſes of her houſhold, maintain a fleet, diſcharge public debts, and aſſiſt her neighbors in their diſtreſs, neither of which had ever been done by any of her predeceſſors: on the contrary, moſt of them had, by their miſ-applied liberalities, ruined their ſubjects merely for the ſatisfaction of inriching a ſmall number of their favorites and minions: beſide, Elizabeth had a particular reaſon to ſpare the purſes of her ſubjects, in order to gain their affection, the ſtrongeſt ſupport of her throne; wherefore, one of the chief objects of her care was a due management of the treaſury, with intent to be always able to withſtand the attacks of her enemies, both at home and abroad.

Camden. Naunton, p. 15.

Her inſpection into the cuſtoms, in 1590, notwithſtanding the efforts uſed to divert her from it, occaſioned her raiſing them from fourteen thouſand pounds per annum (at which ſum they were farmed by ſir Thomas Smith) to forty two thouſand, and afterwards to fifty thouſand: but her great œconomy hindered her not from parting with treaſure when requiſite. Tho' in the two preceding years ſhe had lent about two hundred thouſand crowns to the King of France, ſhe ſupplied him with ſixty thouſand more, becauſe ſhe plainly foreſaw of what conſequence that Prince's ruin might be to England. Moreover, the gariſons of the Briel and Fluſhing, beſide the three thouſand men maintained by her in the Netherlands, coſt her annually more than four hundred thouſand florins (1), becauſe ſhe was obliged to advance money 'till the ſtates ſhould be able to repay her. In fine, ſhe paid alſo conſiderable penſions to ſeveral in the court of Scotland, whoſe buſineſs it was to acquaint her with whatever was there tranſacted, and to keep the King well-affected to England, as he had been for ſome time.

Affairs of France. Thuanus. Mezerai.

While Elizabeth injoyed ſome repoſe, France was ſtill agitated with the wars between King and league. In March, Henry IV gained the battle of Yvry againſt the duke of Mayenne, after which he inveſted Paris, and even carried its ſuburbs. This great city was now reduced to extremity, when the duke of Parma arrived from the Netherlands, and forced Henry to raiſe the blocade. This done, he returned without the King's being able to oblige him to fight.

On the other hand, in the duke of Parma's abſenſe, count Maurice, who had already taken Breda by ſurpriſe, made ſome farther progreſs, which helped to put the affairs of the United Provinces in a better ſituation than before.

The duke of Mercœur over-runs Bretagne. Thuanus. Mezerai.

This ſame year, the duke of Mercœur, of the houſe of Lorrain, maſtered Bretagne by the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards, who took Hennebond and Blavet. This perplexed Elizabeth, who was not very fond of having the Spaniards ſo near her, eſpecially as King Philip might claim Bretagne for his daughter the Infanta Iſabella, whoſe mother was King Henry II's daughter.

Walſingham's death. Camden.

Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate, who had long ſerved Queen Elizabeth with great zeal and ability, died this year, and ſo poor that he was buried privately to ſave charges: and he was ſoon followed by Thomas Randolph, of whom frequent mention has been made, and who had been imployed in ſeveral embaſſies, particularly in Scotland.

AN' 1591.

The civil wars of France were then the moſt important affair of Europe. It could no longer be doubted that the Catholic King was meditating either to diſmember that kingdom, or procure it for his daughter Iſabella, grand-daughter to Henry II, notwithſtanding the Salic law. Sixtus V favored this project to the utmoſt of his power, under color of hindering a Heretic from being acknowledged King of France. If this deſign was not executed, it muſt be wholly aſcribed to the duke of Mayenne's jealouſy, who deſigned not to labor for others. Mean while, Henry IV was extremely imbaraſſed. The Hugonots forces alone were not ſufficient to inable him to ſurmount all obſtacles, ſince he had no leſs to do than to conquer the whole kingdom of France, and the Catholic nobles in his army ſerved him with reluctance: nay, they had required him, in return for their ſervice, to be inſtructed, and in ſuch manner that this inſtruction ſhould produce in him what is termed a converſion. In this preſſing neceſſity, he could not be without foreign ſuccors, and theſe ſuccors could be had only from Germany or England. It was viſibly the intereſt of Elizabeth and the Proteſtant Princes to ſupport Henry, to prevent the King of Spain's power from being augmented by the acquiſition of France: nevertheleſs, it was not eaſy to perſuade them, that they ought to imploy their whole ſtrength to maintain a war, whereof Henry only was to reap the benefit. They were very ready to ſupply him with troops, but not to maintain them: it was his buſineſs to find them ſubſiſtence. Elizabeth was very ſenſible of what conſequence the preſervation of France was to her, but expected that the ſuccors ſhe gave the King ſhould be imployed in driving the Spaniards from thoſe maritime provinces of Bretagne, Normandy, and Picardy; for that was what moſt nearly concerned her. It was, on the contrary, Henry's intereſt to expel his enemies from the center of his dominions, before he thought of attacking them on the borders, and the more, as he thereby put Elizabeth under a continual neceſſity of aſſiſting him. However, to receive aid from England, he was to promiſe what Elizabeth required. They agreed therefore upon a treaty, whereby Elizabeth ingaged to ſend three thouſand men into Bretagne and Picardy, to hinder the Spaniards from ſetling in thoſe provinces, on condition ſhe ſhould within a year be re-paid (2) all her charges in raiſing and keeping the troops. Henry conſented to all, not to retard the negociation, tho' he was fully convinced of the impoſſibility to perform his promiſe by the time limited. Preſently after, the three thouſand Engliſh paſſed part into Bretagne, under command of Norris, and part into Picardy under conduct of ſir Roger Williams.

Three thouſand Engliſh ſent to France.

At the ſame time, Henry had negociated, in Germany, a levy of eleven thouſand men, by means of the elector of Brandenburg, and Caſimir Prince Palatine. But this ſupply not ſufficing, he demanded a ſecond from Elizabeth, and to obtain it more eaſily, gave her to underſtand that, with this reinforcement he ſhould be able to undertake the ſiege of Roan. Elizabeth's great deſire to ſee the maritime towns of France out of the leaguers power made her fall into this ſnare. She therefore concluded with Henry a new treaty, whereby ſhe ingaged to ſupply him with four thouſand men more, and pay them two months, imagining that time was ſufficient for the ſiege of Roan. When theſe ſupplies were ready, ſhe gave the command to the earl of Eſſex, a young nobleman, highly in her favor, and for whom it was believed ſhe felt ſomething more than a bare eſteem, tho' ſhe was then fifty-eight years old. Eſſex, greedy of glory, departed England full of hopes to ſignalize himſelf at the ſiege of Roan; but, at his arrival in France, he found the ſiege had not been ſo much as thought on: that the King was imployed before Noyon, and intended to ſend the Engliſh forces into Champagne. Whereupon he returned into England, having firſt given the King his parole of honor, to come and join him as ſoon as the ſiege of Roan ſhould be undertaken. He however left his troops in France, under command of ſir Roger Williams.

Eſſex returns to England. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 140, 146.

Elizabeth was ſenſibly touched to be thus impoſed on. She wrote to Henry that, ſince he had falſified his word, he might for the future proceed without her aſſiſtance, and that ſhe intended to recall all her troops, except he immediately performed his promiſe. Elizabeth's letter imbaraſſed Henry extremely. He had certain advice that the duke of Parma was preparing to return into France, and, in ſuch a juncture, recalling the Engliſh auxiliaries would have been very unſeaſonable: he was therefore obliged, in order to ſatisfy Elizabeth, to cauſe Roan to be inveſted by marſhal De Biron; but he thence took a freſh occaſion to demand of Elizabeth a new ſupply of five thouſand men, on pretenſe, that the troops already ſent were much diminiſhed by ſickneſs and diſſertion. At the ſame time, the earl of Eſſex, knowing Roan was inveſted, went over to the ſiege (1), contrary to the Queen's expreſs orders; ſuppoſing, that ſince he had given the King his parole, nothing could free him from his ingagement. Elizabeth was ſo diſpleaſed with both Henry and Eſſex that ſhe returned a very rough anſwer to the French embaſſador, who preſſed her for the five thouſand men demanded by the King his maſter, and left him no hopes of obtaining them. She likewiſe then diſpatched Leighton, the earl of Eſſex's uncle, with expreſs order to him inſtantly to return, if he would not be abſolutely diſgraced. Mean while Henry, hearing the duke of Parma departed Bruſſels about the cloſe of November, repaired to his army before Roan, to proſecute the ſiege, hoping to reduce it before the duke of Parma's arrival. Soon after, he ſent Du Pleſſis Mornay to Elizabeth, to indeavor obtaining the deſired ſupply.

He ſends Du Pleſſis to England.

Du Pleſſis, accompanied with the embaſſador in ordinary, being admited to audience, and acquainting her Majeſty with his buſineſs, ſhe flatly told him; ſhe would not be the French King's dupe; neither would ſhe for the future concern herſelf with his affairs, nor was he to expect any other aſſiſtance from her than her prayers: that he had demanded a ſpeedy aid for the ſiege of Roan, which ſhe had accordingly ſent him; but inſtead of executing their treaty, he had trifled away his time before Noyon, and ſuffered the Engliſh troops to decay, while he was making war in Champagne: that he had allowed the duke of Parma four months preparation, and then demanded of her a ſpeedy ſupply, which would not have been wanted had affairs been done in time. To this ſhe added great menaces againſt the earl of Eſſex, ſaying, he would have it thought that he ruled in England, but nothing was more falſe, and ſhe would make him the moſt pitiful fellow in the kingdom; that, inſtead of ſending freſh troops into France, ſhe was determined to recall thoſe already there. Then feigning herſelf indiſpoſed, ſhe deſired the embaſſadors to be contented with this ſhort audience, ſcarcely giving Du Pleſſis time to make any reply to her complaints: but he had previouſly taken care and prepared a memorial, which he would have preſented her; but ſhe bid him give it the lord-treaſurer. In ſhort, Du Pleſſis returned, without obtaining any thing, and the earl of Eſſex was forced to go back to England, where he found means to pacify his royal miſtreſs. Mean while, the duke of Parma having entered France, and being joined by the duke of Mayenne, and the young duke of Guiſe who had eſcaped from priſon, raiſed the ſiege of Roan. Henry readily comprehended by Elizabeth's conduct, that ſhe would not ſuffer herſelf to be amuſed by his artifices, and, for fear of loſing ſuch very neceſſary aſſiſtance, labored ſo effectually to be reconciled with her, that ſhe at length ſent him two thouſand freſh men; but it was not 'till after the ſiege was raiſed.

Having continued ſix months in the iſle of Flores, he was himſelf near being ſurpriſed by Alfonſo Baſſano, ſent to convoy home the ſaid Flota with fifty-three ſhips of war. He had the good fortune to eſcape the danger by a timely retreat; but one of his ſhips which was not ſpeedy enough, was taken by the Spaniards, after a ſharp ingagement (2). The Engliſh made themſelves ample amends for this loſs, by ſeveral prizes, and particularly by taking a ſhip richly laden, bound for Weſt-India, whereon, as is reported, they found twenty-two thouſand Pontifical indulgences for the American Spaniards.

The war which was continued in France gave Elizabeth a perpetual uneaſineſs, becauſe the Spaniards had got footing in Bretagne, whence they might readily make ſome attempt upon England. Henry, well knowing how very deſirous ſhe was to diſlodge them from that poſt, demanded a farther aid to carry war into that province. Tho' Elizabeth had experienced that ſhe could not greatly depend on his word, becauſe it was not always in his power to make war where he pleaſed, ſhe however concluded with him a new treaty to this effect: that ſhe ſhould furniſh him with four thouſand men, ſome pieces of ordnance, and a certain quantity of ammunition: that he ſhould add to the Engliſh troops four thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, and this army be imployed to recover Bretagne: that he ſhould within a year repay all her charges: that he ſhould not make peace with the leaguers 'till they promiſed to aſſiſt him in driving from France the Spaniards: that England ſhould be expreſly included in the peace he ſhould make with Spain. Elizabeth performed her ingagement with ſincerity, and ſent four thouſand men over to Bretagne, under command of Norris: but Henry, inſtead of joining his troops with the Engliſh, and carrying the war into Bretagne, ordered them to ſerve in Normandy; he either being moſt preſſed in thoſe parts, or elſe had concluded the treaty merely to amuſe this Princeſs.

Howſoever this be, Elizabeth highly reſented her being thus again deceived. She wrote often to King Henry, complaining of his procedure, but to very little purpoſe. In her firſt emotions, ſhe was for recalling all her troops; but underſtanding that the duke of Parma was preparing to make a third expedition into France, ſhe ſacrificed her reſentment to the intereſts of that kingdom, which in ſome meaſure were alſo hers. In effect, the duke of Parma was on the point of re-entering France; but death, which ſeized him at this very juncture, freed Henry as well as Elizabeth from their diſquiet.

Scotland was then diſturbed by earl Bothwell, who this very year made a freſh attempt to poſſeſs himſelf of the King's perſon. As his deſign took vent before it could be executed, he was forced to ſeek refuge in England. Elizabeth having thereof notice, wrote to King James, that thoſe who had harbored the fugitive ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed: nevertheleſs, when James required his being ſurrendered, purſuant to their treaty, ſhe evaded his demand, being well pleaſed to keep that Prince always in a ſort of uneaſineſs which ſhould oblige him to regard her.

AN' 1593. Statute againſt the Non-Conformiſts. Statut. c. 1. D'ewes. p. 465. Townſhend, p. 31.

The parliament, meeting in February 1593, paſſed a ſtatute which greatly imbaraſſed not only the Papiſts, but even Proteſtants who differed in certain points from the church of England, and were ſtiled Puritans. By this act, ſuch as neglected being preſent at divine ſervice eſtabliſhed by law were liable to certain penalties, and ſo, none could any longer be a Roman Catholic with impunity, nor even a Proteſtant without conforming to the church of England. Thus, in ſome meaſure, were revived King Henry VIII's days, when it was unlawful to deviate, how little ſoever, from the religion of the Sovereign; tho' with this difference, that under Elizabeth the penalty was not death, as in the reign of her father: nevertheleſs there was in this latter ſtatute ſomething more rigid than in thoſe of Henry VIII. That Prince, abſolute as he was, contented himſelf with puniſhing ſuch as by ſome overt act oppoſed the eſtabliſhed religion; but by this ſtatute, the ſubjects were obliged openly to profeſs the religion of the church of England. Elizabeth, inſenſed againſt the Papiſts, who had made frequent attempts upon her crown and even her life, would very gladly have purged them from her dominions. On the other hand, ſhe could not indure the Puritans, regarding them as obſtinate Sectaries, who, for very frivolous cauſes, bred a ſchiſm in the Proteſtant church. While ſhe was in danger from the Queen of Scots, France, and Spain; in a word, while her affairs remained in a ſort of uncertainty, ſhe moleſted not the Puritans, for fear of uniting them in the ſame intereſt with the Romaniſts. But no ſooner was ſhe firmly eſtabliſhed, but ſhe liſtened to the epiſcopal clergy, who repreſented the Puritans as a ſeditious crew, impudently oppoſing the laws, and by their diſobedience ſhook the government to its very foundation. This is not the only time, nor is England the only ſtate, when and where diſobedience in point of religion has been confounded with rebellion againſt the Sovereign. Scarce is there a Chriſtian ſtate, where the predominant ſect will admit of any diviſion, or the leaſt ſwerving from the eſtabliſhed opinions, no, not even in private. Shall I venture to ſay it? The eccleſiaſtics are the main ſupporters of this unaccountable principle of non-toleration, ſo little conformable to Chriſtian charity. The ſeverity which from this time began to be exerciſed in England upon the Non-Conformiſts (2), produced terrible effects in the ſucceeding reigns, and occaſioned troubles and factions which remain to this day, and which perhaps will not in many years be ended.

Unuſual ſubſidy granted to the Queen. D'ewes. Townſhend.

The ſame parliament, taking into conſideration the Queen's great expenſes, both in defending the kingdom againſt the Spaniſh invaſion, and in aſſiſting the French King and United-Provinces, granted her a very extraordinary ſubſidy: but it was in the act inſerted, that ſo large and unuſual a ſupply, granted to a moſt excellent Queen, who made ſuch good uſe of the public money, ſhould not be drawn into a precedent. Her Majeſty, repairing to the houſe to give the royal aſſent to this act, made a elegant ſpeech, wherein ſhe forgot not to extol her love and care of her ſubjects, and her attachment to the Proteſtant religion. She ſpoke in lofty terms of the bravery of the Engliſh, and ſhewed how formidable they were to all the nations of Europe. No Prince ever had a more complete maſtery of the art of gaining ſubjects affection than this Queen, by expreſſing for them a very uncommon tenderneſs and eſteem.

Amidſt all the occaſions Queen Elizabeth had to congratulate herſelf on her good fortune, ſhe ſtill felt ſome uneaſineſs with regard to what paſſed in Scotland. King James began to be ruled by perſons ſuſpected, and ſhe was thence informed, that the Spaniards, backed by the Papiſts, were hatching ſome dangerous conſpiracy (3), and were countenanced by the earls of Huntley, Angus, and Arrol. She farther underſtood, that King James acted not with the vigor neceſſary to prevent their deſigns, and thereby gave cauſe to ſuſpect, he was himſelf ſomewhat inclinable to innovations. Her reliance on that Prince was not intire. Beſide his ſuffering himſelf to be guided by thoſe whom he intruſted with the adminiſtration of his affairs, ſhe apprehended he had been inſpired with a deſire of revenging the Queen his mother's death, and that his proteſtations, of remaining conſtant in his attachment to Elizabeth, were only intended to amuſe

However this be, the ſame Hacket, on July 28, 1591, and alſo Henry Barrow, John Greenwood, Daniel Studley, and two more, were executed April 6, 1593, for writing and publiſhing ſeditious books; as was the next year John Penry, for writing a book intitled, Martin-Mar-Prelate. She moreover wiſhed he would ſhew himſelf ſomewhat ſeverer to thoſe who attempted raiſing diſturbances in Scotland, and would admit to his council only perſons of approved candor and fidelity. James replied, he would do what the Queen deſired, as far as his own intereſt and his country's laws would admit: but he withal told the embaſſador, that, his revenues being extremely diminiſhed, he expected her Majeſty ſhould furniſh him with means to chaſtiſe thoſe who durſt preſume to diſturb the public peace. He alſo required, ſhe ſhould deliver up Bothwell, who had twice attempted his life, and even ſent Robert Melvil to Elizabeth, to demand it expreſly: but this ſhe refuſed, and only baniſhed him from England, purſuant to the treaty of league ſhe had concluded with his ſaid Majeſty.

Soon after, his party being, thro' accidents not neceſſary to be here particulariſed, became very conſiderable, he had the boldneſs to come into the King's preſenſe, under color of ſuing for pardon. James was ſurpriſed to ſee him; but was more ſo when he perceived that his whole court, ſome of his miniſters only excepted, were Bothwell's friends. He was therefore in a manner forced to grant it him, provided he departed the realm, and returned not unleſs recalled. Bothwell accepted the condition, and concealed himſelf on the borders of England: but at his departure, he left in the court a faction ſo powerful that James was finally obliged to diſmiſs the chancellor, lord-treaſurer, and others in whom he moſt confided. Bothwell was ready to improve this change, but the King broke his meaſures, by declaring to the ſtates, he was conſtrained to pardon him, and by demanding their aſſiſtance to free him from the yoke had been impoſed on him. The ſtates declaring for James, he recalled his miniſters, and Bothwell's partiſans were expeled the court.

The tranſactions of France gave Elizabeth no leſs uneaſineſs than the Scotiſh King's inconſtancy. General Norris was ſtill in Bretagne with the Engliſh forces. He had been promiſed a place in that province for a retreat, and that D'Aumont and Eſpinay ſhould join him; but he was long left there, without being thought of. At length, Eſpinay being arrived, they made together ſome little conqueſts, too inconſiderable to requite Elizabeth for the maintenance of her troops, which coſt her weekly upwards of three thouſand pounds ſterling (1). Thus, inſtead of imploying the Engliſh to drive the Spaniards from Bretagne, Henry uſed them only to keep in awe his enemies, and prevent their making greater progreſs, while he was proſecuting his wars elſewhere. Elizabeth finding herſelf thus impoſed on, would have recalled her troops, but was perſuaded by marſhal D'Aumont, not only to leave them, but even to ſend freſh ſupplies, on the hopes he gave her, that King Henry very ſpeedily would make a powerful effort to reduce that province.

He turns Papiſt. Ibid. p. 156, 157. Camden.

Elizabeth's vexation at the French King's procedure was nothing in compariſon to her concern, when ſhe heard he had reſolved to change his religion. At the firſt news, ſhe diſpatched Thomas Wilks to diſſuade him, if poſſible, from that deſign; but this envoy found the buſineſs concluded before his arrival. However Henry thought proper to inform him of the reaſons of his change, that he might therewith acquaint his royal miſtreſs. All he ſaid on this occaſion tended to this (2), that he had altered his religion very involuntarily, and after as long a delay as poſſible; but being at length convinced he ſhould never be fixed in his throne while a Proteſtant, he finally determined on imbracing the Catholic creed: that is, in other words, having put his conſcience in a balance with the crown, he had given it for the latter. After ſo expreſs a declaration of the inſincerity of his converſion, it is no wonder, Elizabeth ſhould loſe much of her eſteem for him, and the Pope and leaguers not conſider him as a true Catholic, or rather it is ſtrange they ſhould be ſatisfied with exterior appearances. Morlant, the French embaſſador at London, having told Elizabeth the ſubſtance of King Henry's diſcourſe to Wilks, ſhe wrote to the Gallic Monarch in the ſubſequent terms, viz.

This was not the only affair Wilks was charged to mention to the King of France. He had orders, in Queen Elizabeth's name, to complain, that the late treaty was not executed, and D'Aumont's delay had been extremely expenſive to her Majeſty. Henry caſt the whole blame on the marſhal, and poſitively promiſed to march himſelf into Bretagne, when the truce for that province was expired: he added that, in the mean time, he would adviſe with his council concerning the place of retreat for the Engliſh troops; but theſe were only empty words. This Prince's intention was not to imploy his forces againſt Bretagne, before he had reduced the reſt of France, but only to uſe the Engliſh troops by way of diverſion to the duke of Mercœur, for fear, when he had made himſelf abſolute maſter of Bretagne, he ſhould aſſiſt the duke of Mayenne. Still leſs did he deſign giving the Engliſh a place of retreat in that province, leſt he ſhould find it not very eaſy to diſlodge them. All this exceedingly diſturbed Elizabeth, and certainly had ſhe aided Henry only from a motive of friendſhip and generoſity, as ſhe indeavored to make him believe, ſhe would never have ſuffered ſuch infringements of treaties. But it was manifeſtly her intereſt to oppoſe the deſigns of King Philip, who aſpired to the maſtery of France, under pretenſe of maintaining the Catholic religion. Henry perfectly knew Elizabeth's policy, and therefore gave her only fair words, well knowing ſhe was intereſted to aſſiſt him. At length the King of Spain preparing to exert his utmoſt in ſupport of the league, which was declining ſince King Henry's turning Papiſt, Elizabeth readily made a league offenſive and defenſive with Henry, whatever reaſon ſhe had to complain of him. This league was concluded and ſigned, at Melun, in October, and among other articles it was agreed, that peace ſhould not be concluded without a mutual conſent.

Heſquet hanged. Camden.

About this time it was diſcovered in England, that one Heſquet had, by ſome Engliſh fugitives, been ſent over to perſuade Ferdinand earl of Derby to aſſume the title of King, as great-grandſon of Mary, daughter of Henry VII (1). When this was propoſed to the earl, Heſquet added, he might rely on the aſſiſtance of Philip II; but if he refuſed complying with his propoſitions, or did not inviolably conceal the buſineſs, he might be aſſured of not being long-lived. The earl fearing to be inſnared, informed againſt Heſquet, who was ſeized and hanged: but he himſelf died within four months, by a ſtrange poiſon which made him vomit himſelf to death (2). His gentleman of the horſe was ſuſpected of the deed, becauſe he fled the very firſt day of his lord's illneſs. The Engliſh fugitives imagined there were ſuch numbers of malecontents in England, that any one grandee's declaring againſt the Queen would be ſufficient to excite a general rebellion. This is not the only time that, in the like junctures, fugitives have flattered themſelves with ſuch vain hopes (3).

AN' 1594. Affairs of the Spaniards in Flanders. Grotius.

The duke of Parma's death had not quite prevented the Spaniards deſigned expedition againſt France. Their army had entered Picardy, taken Noyon, and was returned into Flanders. On Parma's death, count Fuentes and Diege d'Ibarra were at the head of the council, expecting a new governor. During their adminiſtration, they were inceſſantly laboring to excite troubles in Scotland, by aſſuring the Papiſts of a powerful aſſiſtance from his Catholic Majeſty. Their project was to ſend a Spaniſh army into Scotland; to aſſaſſinate or poiſon Queen Elizabeth; and then invade England with their army from Scotland, which the general conſternation upon her death would render leſs difficult. To execute their deſign upon Elizabeth, they had caſt their eyes on Roderigo Lopez, a Jew, and two Portugueſes. Lopez, the Queen's phyſician, had promiſed to poiſon her for fifty thouſand crowns. This plot being diſcovered, the three accomplices confeſſed, they had been corrupted, by count Fuentes and Don Diego Ibarra, to undertake this villanous fact. Lopez however pleaded in his excuſe, that his intention was only to draw money from the King of Spain, and that he had even preſented to the Queen a rich jewel ſent him by that Prince: but as he had not given any intimation of the plot, his excuſe was not allowed. At the gallows he affirmed, that he loved the Queen as well as Jeſus Chriſt. This plainly ſhewed he ſuffered not unjuſtly.

The day after theſe three villains were executed, a fourth, one Patric Cullen, a fencing-maſter, born in Ireland, ſent from Flanders to aſſaſſinate Queen Elizabeth, underwent the ſame fate. Edmund York and Richard Williams, who had been ſuborned by Ibarra to perpetrate the ſame villany, were likewiſe apprehended, and others were diſcovered who had ingaged to fire the royal navy. Elizabeth, on this occaſion, wrote to the archduke Erneſt, who had been appointed governor of the Netherlands, to demand puniſhment of the authors. She moreover told him, that to clear from ſuſpicion his Catholic Majeſty, the propereſt method would be to ſurrender all the fugitive Engliſh in his dominions, or at leaſt thoſe who were concerned in the conſpiracies (4). But foreſeeing that Antonio Perez, who had indeavored to excite commotions in Aragon, and was then in England, might likewiſe be demanded, ſhe told the archduke that the King of France had ſent him to his embaſſador at London, without her knowledge, and he had never been aſſiſted by her: but all this was to no effect. On the other hand, the earl of Eſſex received Perez into his houſe, to learn of him the ſecrets of the Spaniſh monarchy.

The twenty-ſecond of March, the city of Paris was, by count Briſſac, ſurrendered to King Henry, and the duke of Feria, who was there, was obliged to take from him a ſafe-conduct to retire with his Spaniſh troops to the duke of Guiſe's army. It was then only that Henry ſeriouſly reſolved to clear Bretagne of Spaniards, who were poſſeſſed of many places in that province. Marſhal D'Aumont having been intruſted with the management of this war, made good uſe of the Engliſh troops, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves with that bravery, that Elizabeth was obliged to write to Norris, not to be ſo laviſh of her ſubjects blood. at a ſiege in this war. Some time after, the Queen recalled Norris, to ſend him into Ireland.

Elizabeth's uneaſineſs concerning Scotland.

The affairs of Scotland gave Elizabeth perpetual uneaſineſs. She thence had intimations, that the Spaniſh faction was powerful at court; that ſomething was contriving againſt the Proteſtant religion, and that King James ſeemed to incline to the Popiſh party. This creating in her ſuſpicions, ſhe reſolved to ſend lord Zouch into Scotland, as well to be informed of the truth, as to fortify the Engliſh party, and inſtruct King James in his true intereſt. This embaſſador repreſented to the King, from his miſtreſs, that the ſtates late act was not capable to reſtrain the inſolence of the Roman Catholics, who affected publicly to exerciſe their religion, and correſpond almoſt openly with the King of Spain. James anſwered, that he would proceed againſt the Catholics by the eſtabliſhed ſtatutes; and if they refuſed ſubmiſſion to the laws, he would proſecute them with the ſword, provided the Queen, who had the ſame intereſt as himſelf, would contribute to the expenſe of a war. The embaſſador, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, earneſtly preſſed him to procure other laws againſt Papiſts, more ſevere than thoſe in force. To this James, in ſome heat, replied, "He was not at the Queen's "command, nor did it belong to her to preſcribe "in what manner he ſhould govern his kingdom." After that, he demanded Bothwell, who was retired into England.

But Elizabeth was very far from giving him this ſatisfaction. On the contrary, it was ſeemingly thro' her means that Bothwell was inabled to enter Scotland at the head of four hundred men, with whom he ſurpriſed Leith. He afterwards publiſhed a manifeſto, importing, "That perſons dangerous "both to church and ſtate having, by ſome artifice, procured admiſſion into the council, gave "occaſion by their conduct to believe, they were "forming deſigns againſt the Evangelic religion: "that for ſome time the Romiſh prieſts had been "ſeen roaming from village to village, and celebrating maſs in the moſt public manner: that "they indeavored to animate the Engliſh, in order to kindle a war between the two nations, "which could not but prove fatal to Scotland: "that to give a check to theſe dangerous conſpiracies, he had, with the concurrence of diverſe "lords and gentlemen, taken arms to clear the "realm of theſe pernicious counſellors, or bring "them to a ſtrict account for their actions: that this "buſineſs was the more urgent, as the Spaniards "were preparing to invade Scotland; and therefore he exhorted the Scots to join with him, to "prevent greater miſchiefs, and induce the King "to favor ſo juſt a deſign." He wrote in like terms to the general ſynod of the Kirk aſſembled at Dunbar, and to the Engliſh embaſſadors. When the coherence between Bothwell's manifeſto, and lord Zouch's remonſtrances to King James is conſidered, Elizabeth muſt needs be ſuſpected of being as the bottom of this affair.

Mean while James, having aſſembled ſome forces, prepared to oppoſe the deſigns of Bothwell, who declined not advancing to meet him: but the rebel, having ſome diſadvantage in the firſt ingagement, and finding himſelf not ſupported, was ſeized with a panic, and retired to the borders. Whereupon Elizabeth forbad any to harbor or conceal him. This was extremely pleaſing to King James, who was apprehenſive ſhe would have given him protection and ſupport. Tho' Bothwell's undertaking miſcarried, it however produced a very good effect. James, ſenſible of the danger he might incur by a breach with Elizabeth, finally determined on altering his conduct, leſt his vain projects ſhould occaſion his loſing in the end the Engliſh crown. He therefore aſſembled the ſtates, and prevailed on them to ſend into exile all ſuch Popiſh peers as had appeared over zealous for the Spaniard. They at firſt made ſome ſhew of reſiſtance, but were at length obliged to ſubmit. Then the ſtates inacted new laws againſt the Papiſts, and even formed ſuch a kind of aſſociation as was made in England ſome years before. One Graham Feintry, a ſtrenuous ſtickler for Spain, attempting to excite freſh commotions, was puniſhed with death (1).

The King of Scotland's change, and the vigor he exerted on this occaſion, deſtroyed whatever hopes the Catholics had entertained of ingaging him in their intereſt. They therefore formed new projects to place the crown of England on the head of ſome perſon of their perſuaſion, or at leaſt of ſome one not much bigoted to the Reformation. The Engliſh Papiſts caſt their eyes on the earl of Eſſex, who they obſerved approved not the laws made againſt them (2). But the Engliſh fugitives in Flanders were for the Infanta Iſabella, King Philip II's daughter. They even publiſhed a genealogy, to ſhew that the King of Scotland being a Heretic, the crown was devolved on the King of Spain, whence they infered, that he had power to diſpoſe of it in favor of his daughter: nor was this barely a chimera grounded on the paſſion of the Engliſh Papiſts. It is certain that Philip, tho' he wanted not imployment, ſince the King of France had declared war againſt him, intended to make extraordinary efforts to procure his daughter the crown offered by the Engliſh fugitives. The fame of his preparations was already ſpread over Europe, and produced miſchievous effects in Ireland, where the earl of Tir-oen * had rebelled, in expectation of the aſſiſtance promiſed by the Spaniard. This obliged Elizabeth to prepare for the defenſe of her dominions, and to ſend a ſtrong re-inforcement to Norris, now in Ireland.

* Hugh O-Neal.

Henry IV, as was obſerved, had declared war againſt Spain, which was certainly a very wrong ſtep, could it poſſibly have been avoided, conſidering France's wretched ſituation. But Philip II, by his continual and powerful ſupport of the league, had ſufficiently declared war againſt Henry, tho' he pretended to make war for and not upon that kingdom. However this be, Henry was indiſpenſibly obliged to maintain a war againſt Spain, and therefore believed, it would be better to attack Philip directly, than to ſtand on the defenſive: but as France was drained both of men and money, it was not eaſy for him to ſupport the war alone, and come off with honor. He had therefore recourſe to Elizabeth, as to his ultimate refuge in preſſing neceſſities: and, perhaps he was incouraged to break openly with Spain, by the hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance from England. To that purpoſe, he wrote to the Queen, that her recalling Norris and his forces, had truſtrated all his deſigns; and he rather expected ſhe ſhould ſend greater ſuccors, ſince he had declared war againſt Spain. Elizabeth anſwered, "That ſhe commended his reſo- "lution to attack the King of Spain's dominions:

"that this was a good expedient to prevent invasions, as she had experienced: that as to recalling her troops from Bretagne, he could not justly complain of it, since they had remained there longer than their treaty required, notwithstanding the manifest breach of that treaty, and the violation of his promise: that he had positively ingaged to surrender to the English the town of Morlaix, when taken, for a place of retreat; but that this very place, conquered at the expense of English blood, had been denied to the just expectation of the English, by a fraudulent capitulation of marshal D'Aumont, to have none but Catholics admited into it: that he ought not to be surprised, if she was unwilling to be his dupe any longer, since she could rely neither on his promises nor his treaties: that beside, she wanted her forces in Ireland, where there was danger of a general revolt." It is certain, Henry's behavior towards Queen Elizabeth could not much incourage her to grant him any great assistance: and therefore, it was only her fear of the Spaniards taking advantage of France's weakness which still held her attached to the interest of Henry, whom she no longer esteemed and regarded as formerly. It may be likewise affirmed, that since his accession to the Gallic throne, he had not taken one step tending to preserve Elizabeth's friendship.

Elizabeth and James heartily united. Camden.

The Queen, in the present situation of her affairs, not being able to rely much on the King of France, and considering all her expenses on this account as utterly fruitless, resolved to reserve her forces and treasure for the defense of her own dominions, in case they should be attacked by the Spaniard. Properly speaking, England was in danger only from Scotland; but the news she received of the change in King James freed her from all uneasiness. That Prince, perceiving Philip's aims were leveled as much against Scotland as England, finally comprehended that the surest means to break his measures was to live in union with Elizabeth. So, to shew it was his meaning to preserve this union, he issued a proclamation, inhibiting, under rigorous penalties, his subjects on the borders to injure the English; and Elizabeth published another to the same effect. He thenceforwards lived with Elizabeth in hearty intelligence, which nothing could interrupt, as being convinced it was the readiest way for him one day to ascend the throne of England.

Henry IV in great perplexity. Mezerai. Camden.

Henry IV, on declaring war against Spain, formed a design of breaking into the Netherlands, and making great conquests; but he soon became sensible that he had not laid his measures very justly. In April 1595, Ferdinando de Velasco, constable of Castile, entered Franche-Comté at the head of eighteen thousand men, and threatened the duchy of Burgundy. This obliged Henry personally to conduct thither the best part of his army. While he was thus busied in Burgundy, count Fuentes, who commanded in the Netherlands, after the archduke Ernest's decease, broke into Picardy, and possessed himself of Catelet. Then, he besieged Dourlens; routed the French who came to its relief, and carried the town by assault. Henry, on this mortifying news, instantly dispatched away Chevalier to England to demand a supply of forces for the defense of Picardy, according to his treaty with the Queen. In the instructions given to this envoy, he ordered him to take care this supply should be ready in a fortnight after the date: but Chevalier imployed twelve days in his voyage. Elizabeth replied, she would not fail sending a body of troops into Picardy, as soon as they could be ready to defend Calais, Diepe and Boulogne. In reality, the sole motive of her treaty with his Gallic Majesty, was to prevent the Spaniards from possessing themselves of those maritime towns; but she never designed to undertake defending the inland towns of that province, for which she was little concerned. This was not what Henry wanted, he being no way disposed to put the English into these places. He pretended that, Queen Elizabeth should immediately send him a body of troops, to assist him in clearing all Picardy of Spaniards. At this very juncture, the Bretagne deputies arrived at London, to demand supplies of the Queen, without specifying either number or service, and without offering a place of retreat; but this demand of succors was by Elizabeth absolutely rejected.

Progress of the Spanish conquests in France.

The Spaniards, after taking Dourlens, besieged Cambray, and became masters of that important fortress. Henry, seeing himself thus pressed, sent Lomenie, secretary of state, to Elizabeth, to demand of her a speedy and powerful aid. He expected, by entering into a league with Elizabeth, to ingage her to make war with Spain in the kingdom of France, so that she seemed obliged to send him forces and money whenever he had occasion, tho' the treaty contained nothing that way tending. But Elizabeth had no such intention, not being any way inclined to transport her forces into France, when her own dominions were in danger, or so to make war with Spain that all the profit should be Henry's, and the loss hers; wherefore she told the embassador, she could not comply with his master's demands. Lomenie, nettled at the ill success of his negociation, gave himself very haughty airs, and charged her with occasioning the loss of Cambray, by not sending into Picardy the demanded succors. He added, that she seemed to rejoice at the misfortunes of France; but she might soon repent, and by her conduct be forced to make a disadvantageous peace with Spain (1). These menaces, and the arrogance wherewith Lomenie uttered them, highly offended Elizabeth: nevertheless, as Henry's affairs were in a very bad posture, she judged it not convenient to deprive him of all hope of her future assistance. She answered Lomenie however suitably to her dignity, but less sharply than she would have done at another juncture. Afterwards, when he demanded a second audience, her answer was, that she would acquaint the King of France, by her embassador, with the reasons she had not to part with either troops or money.

who menaces Elizabeth.

Elizabeth's refusal greatly shocked Henry's council, wherein the leaguers influence was now but too predominant. Several advised him to make a separate peace with Spain, since he could hope for no assistance from Elizabeth. They seemed to talk as if she had been bound to supply Henry with forces whenever he demanded them, and had violated her ingagements. This was, doubtless, what was intended by the league: the French had reckoned to manage her as they pleased, but being disappointed, were very angry. Beside, Henry's council being mostly composed of the Reformation's avowed enemies, and of whom some had been the most zealous leaguers, considered Elizabeth not as a friend, whom they were hereafter to regard, but as a temporary ally, from whom they were to draw all poſſible advantages. It was not without reaſon, that Elizabeth diſtruſted King Henry, who, to obtain abſolution from the Pontif, had ſubmited to terms unbecoming a King, and tending to the Proteſtants deſtruction (1), thereby ſhewing, he no longer conſidered them as his friends. It was not therefore proper for her to aſſiſt powerfully one who was a friend only nominally: wherefore ſhe left him to manage his affairs as he would, without giving herſelf much concern: beſide, ſhe could expect from him only a bare diverſion to the arms of Spain, which probably would laſt no longer than requiſite for the intereſt of France. Henry's conduct gave her no room to expect any better, ſince he had left the Spaniards unmoleſted in Bretagne, tho' her greateſt danger was from thence: and in effect, this ſummer, thoſe Spaniards who were ſettled in Bretagne, made a deſcent in Cornwall, and fired a few villages (2). Tho' this expedition was inconſiderable, it however obliged Elizabeth to be on her guard, and demonſtrated the neceſſity of diſlodging the common enemy from that province: but the intereſt of England was not the motive of Henry's actions.

This procedure of the ſtates induced Elizabeth to tell them, ſince they had money enough to lend the King of France, they were undoubtedly able to pay their debts, and therefore ſhe demanded to be reimburſed of what ſhe had advanced for them: adding that, except ſpeedy ſatisfaction was given her, by a diſcharge of part of the debt and ſecurity for the remainder within ſuch a time, ſhe would take proper meaſures to do herſelf juſtice. The ſtates, thus preſſed, had recourſe to intreaties and ſubmiſſions to pacify her; humbly repreſenting, that the ſituation of their affairs admited not their anſwering her demands. But as excuſes ſignified little, they urged their treaty with her, by which they were not obliged to repay her 'till the war was ended. To this ſhe replied, that, when ſhe aſſiſted them, they were reduced to a ſtate of the utmoſt wretchedneſs, and ſhe ſhewed her bounty and generoſity, in not requiring reimburſement 'till peace was concluded, it not being likely they ſhould be able to pay her before: but ſince they were rich enough to lend the King of France money, it was evidently in their power to reimburſe her: that therefore that article of the treaty on which they inſiſted, ought naturally to be thus interpreted, "That "they ſhould not be in a condition to repay her "before the end of the war." There were great and even ſharp conteſts upon this ſubject: but at length the affair was for a while adjuſted, on theſe conditions: that the ſtates ſhould promiſe for the future, to pay the Engliſh forces in their ſervice (3), and join Elizabeth's fleet with a certain number of ſhips, in caſe ſhe ſhould be attacked by the Spaniards.

This year, at his own charge, ſir Walter Raleigh made into America a ſecond expedition, whence he reaped not any great advantage. Queen Elizabeth alſo fited out twenty-ſix ſhips to carry the war into thoſe regions, under conduct of ſir Francis Drake, and ſir John Hawkins: but, as the Spaniards had taken great precautions, the Engliſh admirals performed nothing memorable; nay, they both died in this expedition.

Sir Walter Raleigh's ſecond voyage to America. Camden. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 277.

Norris, as I ſaid, was diſpatched into Ireland to command againſt the rebels, at whoſe head was the earl of Tir-oen. The jealouſy which aroſe between that general and lord Ruſſel, lieutenant of Ireland, was the reaſon the Engliſh made there no greater progreſs. Tir-oen even obtained a truce, on giving hopes he would lay down his arms, and ſubmit to her Majeſty: but this was only a feint to gain time 'till the ſuccors, promiſed him from Spain, were arrived. This war continued ſome years; but my deſign is not to enter on a detail of the Iriſh affairs, which would require a ſeparate hiſtory: beſide, the manner wherein writers have delivered them is ſo confuſed, and the Iriſh names, as well of perſons as places, are ſo barbarous and hard to remember, that it is difficult to form a clear idea of thoſe matters.

Affairs of Ireland. Camden.

AN' 1596.

Whatever reſolution Elizabeth had taken of no farther interfering with the affairs of France, ſhe was however obliged to take other meaſures, by reaſon of the great ſucceſs of the Spaniſh arms in that kingdom. Cardinal Albert of Auſtria, who had ſucceeded his brother Erneſt in the Netherland government, arrived there early in this year, 1596. He immediately made mighty preparations, as if he intended to relieve La Fere, which had been for ſome time blocaded by the French King, and laſtly beſieged in form. But the archduke ſuddenly, after throwing ſuccors into the town, marched and inveſted Calais. This place had been formerly of very great note: but whether from a change in the method of beſieging towns, or from being neglected ſince it was recovered by France, it was now of ſmall repute. Henry, alarmed at this ſiege, diſpatched Sancy into England to ſollicit ſuccors. Marſhal Bouillon ſpeedily followed him, and ſo preſſed the Queen, that ſhe ordered eight thouſand men to be ready, under command of the earl of Eſſex: but ſhe required, in caſe the ſiege was raiſed by the Engliſh, to have the town delivered to them, ſince it was in effect loſt to France. The marſhal and Sancy eluded this demand by ſaying, they had no inſtructions on that ſubject; well knowing that at worſt King Henry had rather ſee Calais poſſeſſed by Spaniards, than reſtored to the Engliſh: ſo, under pretenſe that the relief of Calais was too preſſing to allow time to diſcuſs that propoſal, they ſo managed that Elizabeth gave orders for the imbarcation of thoſe troops; but at the ſame time news came that the place was taken, after only a twelve days reſiſtance. Then the archduke alſo carried Ardres with like facility: this was the ſixth place taken from France by the Spaniards, within a year. The ſuccors deſigned for Calais not having been ready in time, the new levied troops were diſ-

Elizabeth sends a fleet against Spain. Camden. Stow. Speed.

During this the Queen, having advice that King Philip was preparing to invade England and Ireland, resolved to prevent him. To this purpose, she fited out a fleet of a hundred and fifty sail, with twenty-two Dutch ships, and seven thousand soldiers. Charles Howard commanded as admiral, and the earl of Essex was appointed general of the land-forces (1).

Expedition of the English to Cadiz. June 3. Camden. Stow. p. 771, &c. Speed. June 18. Thuanus.

The fleet set out from Plymouth early in June, and held at a distance from the French and Spanish coasts, for fear of alarming the Spaniards, the commanders designing to surprise Cadiz. The master of an Irish vessel, returning from that port, gave them the joyful news, that all was there in the greatest security: that the garison was not strong, and the port full of ships of war, galeons, gallies, and trading vessels, freighted for the Indies. This intelligence inspiring them with fresh hopes, they arrived (June twenty) on the west side of the isle of Cadiz, and at their approach the Spanish ships retired to the Puntals. Next day, the English attacked them with great resolution (2), but met with so warm a reception, that the ingagement held from day-break 'till noon. At length the Spaniards, despairing to make a longer defense, resolved to sink their ships, and escape ashore. Their admiral ship, named San Felipe, was consumed to ashes, with two others near her; the Spaniards themselves firing it, to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands. The San Matteo and San Andreas were taken, and most of the others stranded.

During the fight at sea, the earl of Essex, with eight hundred men, landed at the Puntals, and marched on directly for Cadiz. Three or four hundred paces short of the city, he was met by five hundred Spaniards, who on sight of him retired within the gates, and were so closely pursued that the English had like to have entered with them. The consternation was so great in the town, that before any measures could be taken for its defense, the English had time to force a gate (3) and get in. Tho' they found some resistance in the streets, yet in half an hour they possessed themselves of the market-place. Then the garison and inhabitants withdrew to the castle and town-house, but were the same or the following day obliged to surrender. By the capitulation, they were to have their lives, on payment of seventy thousand ducats, for which four principal citizens were given in hostage (4). Cadiz thus in the power of the English, Essex turned out all the inhabitants, and then sent on board a great quantity of silver, ammunition, and other valuable booty, beside what was pillaged by the soldiers.

On the other hand, admiral Howard sent sir Walter Ralegh to fire the traders at Port-Real. The admiral was offered two millions of ducats if he would spare them; but rejected the offer, saying, he came to burn ships and not to ransom them. Mean time, the duke of Medina found means to unload some of these vessels, and fire others, to deprive the English of those rich ladings. Beside the merchant-ships, his Catholic Majesty lost two galeons, taken by the English, with above a hundred brass cannon (5), thirteen ships of war, eleven transports freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, without reckoning the stores prepared for the intended expedition against England. The English estimated his loss at more than twenty millions of ducats.

ELIZAB. AN' 1596.

The earl of Essex proposed, in a council of war, to keep Cadiz, and even offered to stay there, provided he was furnished with requisites (6); but his counsel was not followed, every one being impatient to return with his plunder to England. So the fleet set sail, after burning the town with some circumjacent villages. While the fleet was making its way homewards, and a north wind arising, the earl of Essex proposed sailing away for the Azores, and there waiting for the Indian caracs: but he was not listened to, every one fearing to lose what he had acquired. Mortifications given the earl of Essex. Camden.

Queen Elizabeth received these gallant warriors with great marks of esteem, and expressed her acknowledgment of the service they had done her. But the earl of Essex met with a mortification on his arrival at court; for having, before his departure, recommended sir Thomas Bodley to be secretary of state, the Queen, without regarding his recommendation, had confered that office on sir Robert Cecil, the lord treasurer's son, who was not Essex's friend. Some days after, he had also the vexation to see Francis Vere made governor of the Briel, tho' he had strongly sollicited for another. This convinced him that his credit was declining, and his uneasiness thereat ingaged him afterwards in extravagant projects which cost him his head.

Elizabeth demands payment from the states-general. Grotius.

His Catholic Majesty having been for some time incapacitated from pursuing his designs against England, Elizabeth renewed her applications to the states of the United Provinces, for payment of her arrears. The states, in excuse, alledged the same reasons as before, which were no better received. The Queen said, it was unjust her reimbursment should depend on a peace, which the states might defer as long as they pleased: that beside, the treaty she had made with them contained, in express terms, that the war should continue no longer than she saw convenient. But the states pretended, this article was inserted in the treaty only in honor to her. This contest held 'till the report of new preparations, in Spain, to invade England, induced her said Majesty to cease gradually her sollicitations. The truth is, the states delayed paying her, not so much thro' inability, as to keep her always attached to their interest. On the other hand, Elizabeth made not these pressing instances thro' want of money, but because she would not have her payment depend on the success of her debtors affairs: they were then able to reimburse her; but she knew not what alterations time might produce.

A new treaty between France and England. Camden. Thuanus. Mezerai. Stow.

When marshal Bouillon passed over to England, to demand aid, he had made some proposals for a stricter alliance between France and England. But King Henry had neglected this affair, because he perceived Elizabeth was on her guard, and not disposed to furnish him with either men or money, but upon good grounds. Mean while, the designs and preparations of the Spaniard becoming public, Henry believed Elizabeth would be more tractable, and he might treat with her upon easier terms.

ELIZAB. AN' 1596.

In this belief he diſpatched marſhal Bouillon and Sancy into England, to negociate with the Queen a league offenſive and defenſive. The treaty was ſoon concluded; for Elizabeth apprehended the ill ſituation of King Henry's affairs would compel him to ſtrike up a ſeparate peace with Spain. The chief articles of this league were, that the Queen ſhould furniſh four thouſand men for the defenſe of Picardy and Normandy: that the King of France, in caſe Queen Elizabeth was invaded, ſhould find the like number for the defenſe of England, not to ſerve above fifty miles from the ſea: that neither of the two crowns ſhould make peace without the other's conſent. By a ſecret article it was agreed, that England ſhould this year furniſh two thouſand men only. Very ſeemingly, Elizabeth concluded this league with France, with the ſole view of keeping Henry ingaged in the Spaniſh war, by means of the ſupplies ſhe was to ſend him: but it is not probable ſhe expected a like aſſiſtance in caſe of neceſſity, ſince Henry could not himſelf be without the Engliſh auxiliaries. On the other hand, Henry knowing that Elizabeth had conſented to this treaty from the ſole motive of intereſt, ſcrupled not to act on the ſame motive; that is, to make uſe of her aſſiſtance, 'till he could diſingage himſelf honorably from the war he had ſo unſeaſonably declared againſt Spain. There are few leagues but what have the like foundation: wherefore they are commonly ſeen to ſubſiſt only 'till the intereſt of one of the parties changes countenance. The ſtates of the United Provinces acceded to this league, with ſome additional articles which concerned them peculiarly: but Elizabeth's jealouſy of their attachment to France retarded ſome time the concluſion of their treaty. She pretended, they ought not to come into it as Sovereigns, but as aſſociated towns which had put themſelves under her protection: but King Henry found means to make her deſiſt from this pretenſion.

Philip II was quite out of patience at being thus baffled by Elizabeth, and, finding himſelf unable to protect even his own dominions, having all his life been ſo greedily gaping after thoſe of others, reſolving neither to deſiſt from his projects, nor ſuffer Elizabeth to injoy the ſatisfaction of her fortunate ſucceſs, he determined to make another effort, not only to be revenged on Elizabeth, but alſo to conquer England. Tho' he had received great damage from the Engliſh, yet as it was only in one of the places where he had made his preparations, he ſtill believed himſelf in condition to purſue his deſigns. He therefore aſſembled the whole remnant of his navy, freighted many foreign ſhips, and by this means had a formidable Armada, when Elizabeth deemed him utterly unable to act againſt her. This fleet ſailed from Liſbon to take in the land-forces at Fariola, and then ſteered directly for England: but a violent ſtorm ariſing not long after ſeting out, ſeveral ſhips were loſt, and the reſt ſo diſperſed, that the Armada, for this year, was rendered unſerviceable. Thus Elizabeth had the pleaſure to hear of its being diſabled from hurting her, before ſhe had notice of its ſailing: but not to be again expoſed to like dangers, ſhe took care to fortify the places where the Spaniards could moſt eaſily have landed (1), had not Providence blaſted their projects (2).

AN' 1597.

Very early in the year 1597, during a moſt ſevere winter, Prince Maurice obtained a victory over the Spaniards at Turnhout. But on the other ſide, in March, Hernando Tellez Portocarrero, governor of Dourlens, found means to ſurpriſe Amiens. This accident diſturbed the ſecret negociations of peace which, by the Pope's mediation, were on foot between Henry and Philip. The treaty was already far advanced without Elizabeth's having thereof the leaſt intimation, notwithſtanding Henry's late treaty with her, the principal article of which was, that no peace ſhould be made without a mutual concurrence.

Philip II, relying on a ſeparate accommodation with France, had reſolved to make a puſh againſt Ireland, where he had correſpondents, and even prepared a fleet to execute his deſign. The notice Queen Elizabeth had of this project made her reſolve to prevent him, as ſhe had often done very ſucceſsfully. For this purpoſe, ſhe equiped a fleet of a hundred and twenty ſhips, with ſix thouſand land forces, and gave the command to the earl of Eſſex (3). The earl's ſcheme was to ſail to Coruna, and deſtroy the armament preparing there, then to wait at the Azores for the Spaniſh Flota returning from Weſt-India: but contrary winds, ſtorms, and a quarrel between Eſſex and Ralegh broke theſe meaſures, and the fleet returned to England, without any memorable action. It is needleſs therefore to be more particular concerning an expedition whence Elizabeth reaped ſcarce any benefit. I ſhall only obſerve that, while the Engliſh were returning, a Spaniſh Armada from Fariola, was ſteering the ſame courſe, in order to make a deſcent in Cornwal: but a tempeſt from the north ſo diſperſed both fleets, that they could not even get ſight of each other.

Elizabeth ſends a fleet againſt Spain; Camden. Thuanus. Stow. Speed. which returns without much advantage.

The earl of Eſſex being returned to court, about the cloſe of October, met with a freſh cauſe of diſcontent. The Queen had created admiral Howard earl of Nottingham, and inſerted in his patent, that it was for his ſervices to his country in 1588, againſt the grand Spaniſh Armada, and afterwards, in taking the town of Cadiz, jointly with the earl of Eſſex. This patent offended Eſſex, who thought himſelf affronted by the Queen, in her aſcribing to that admiral any ſhare in the taking Cadiz. Beſide, by this creation, the new earl of Nottingham was to take place of him by a ſtatute of Henry VIII, which gave precedence to the lord high-ſteward, the lord chancellor, the lord treaſurer, the lord preſident, the lord privy-ſeal, the lord chamberlain, the lord high-conſtable, the earl marſhal, the lord high-admiral (4), before all other peers of equal degree (5). But Elizabeth, to aſſuage his reſentment, created him earl-marſhal of England, which preſerved to him the precedence of the lord high-admiral.

patched away to the diet an embaſſador, to anſwer theſe charges. He repreſented, That the Hanſe-Towns had, by abuſing their ſaid privileges, occaſioned their being annulled, by act of parliament in the reign of Edward VI: that afterwards Mary had, for a time, ſuſpended the execution of that act; but at length, even in her reign, thoſe privileges had been intirely aboliſhed, for which he alledged diverſe reaſons mentioned in Edward's reign: that as to the ſeizure of their ſhips in Portugal, they were freighted with proviſions for the Spaniards, and by the law of nations the Engliſh might ſeize proviſions deſigned for their enemies, and even confiſcate the veſſels, which however were reſtored to the owners. This buſineſs ſeemed quite done with, and had not been mentioned in two years, when ſuddenly the Emperor, at the ſollicitation of the Hanſe Towns, prohibited all commerce with the Engliſh merchants, called the Adventurers, throughout the Empire. This induced Elizabeth alſo to prohibit all traffic between the Hanſe Towns and England.

Henry demands ſuccors from Elizabeth. Camden.

Mean while, the King of France was greatly imbaraſſed, ſince the Spaniards were become maſters of Amiens, whence they could make incurſions to the very gates of Paris. He reſolved therefore, at any rate, to recover this place, and formed the ſiege about the end of May. At the ſame time, he ſummoned Queen Elizabeth to ſend him four thouſand men, anſwerable to their ſtipulation. Her ſaid Majeſty replied, that ſhe was ready to furniſh her quota of troops, provided he would ſubſiſt them, becauſe her expenſes in equiping a fleet, and maintaining an army in Ireland, incapacitated her from doing it. Troops without money ſuited not with Henry, whoſe exchequer was exhauſted. Wherefore, to induce Elizabeth to comply with his demand, he let her know, that offers of peace had been made him, with reſtitution of all his places, except Calais and Ardres, if he would abandon England. Hereby he would have inſinuated, that it was ſolely on her account he had refuſed a ſeparate peace, tho' in reality Amiens being ſurpriſed was the true cauſe of diſcontinuing the treaty, which he would not have commenced without her participation, had he retained for her the leaſt regard. However this be, Elizabeth, yet a ſtranger to the ſecret, told him by her embaſſador; ſhe could never believe, that ſo great a Prince would violate a ſolemn treaty ſo lately made, and confirmed with reciprocal oaths. She deſired him to peruſe the treaty, where he would find this article in expreſs terms: "The Queen of England ſhall ſend, this "year, four thouſand foot to ſerve the King, for "the ſpace of ſix months: they ſhall likewiſe ſerve "him as long in the following year, if the Queen "of England's affairs will conveniently permit, "in which point the King of France is to take her "honor and conſcience for ſecurity." That therefore it was manifeſt, the treaty was not violated by her, as ſhe offered to ſend forces, provided he would ingage for their ſubſiſtence. At length all this ended in what Henry very ſeemingly had purpoſed, viz. that Elizabeth, in lieu of troops, ſhould ſupply him with money. For ſecurity, Henry offered her Calais, provided ſhe would, within a certain limited time, ingage to recover it with her own forces. This was ingaging her to make a diverſion abundantly more advantageous to France, than the four thouſand men he demanded: it was even uncertain whether Calais could have been reduced within the time, which probably would have been ſhort enough. But Elizabeth was not to be thus inſnared, eſpecially as ſhe knew Henry had much rather ſee Calais in the hands of Spaniards than Engliſh; but the retaking of Amiens, which ſurrendered in September, finiſhed this diſpute.

ELIZAB. AN' 1597.

The ſurrender of Amiens renewed the negociations between France and Spain, which had been interrupted. Henry's conduct on this occaſion little correſponded with the ſervices he had received from Elizabeth in his moſt urgent neceſſities. He defered informing her of his abſolute neceſſity for a peace, 'till he had privately ſetled the principal articles. He probably believed that, as Elizabeth had only conſulted her own intereſt in their league, he ought alſo to conſider his own advantage only. Such a principle allows the breach of any alliance without ſcruple. He could not however ſo ſecretly tranſact this affair, but Elizabeth had notice of his proceedings and deſigns. On this account ſhe called a parliament to demand aid, intimating, ſhe was on the point of being abandoned by her ally, tho' he ſtill pretended not to treat without her. The parliament, perceiving England's danger of being ſpeedily invaded, voted a very conſiderable ſubſidy, on condition this extraordinary ſupply ſhould not be made a precedent.

AN' 1598.

Elizabeth well knew Henry was treating with Spain, but was ignorant the peace was already in a manner concluded, and the more, as he had deſired her to ſend embaſſadors to ſettle the points whereon they were to treat. She ſent therefore Wilks, Cecil, and Herbert. The firſt died on his very arrival at Paris. The two others waited on King Henry at Angers, to know on what terms the negociations ſtood with Spain. Henry gave a general anſwer, declaring he wanted a peace, and that the welfare of his people, which he prefered to all other conſiderations, abſolutely required it. Cecil replied, his royal miſtreſs deſired it no leſs, but wanted to know on what conditions it was propoſed by the King of Spain, and whether the ſtates of the United Provinces were to be included. Henry anſwered, the Catholic King offered to reſtore all the places taken in France, Calais not excepted; that his offer could not be rejected without expoſing his kingdom to utter ruin. Adding, he would ſoon diſpoſe the King of Spain to grant, both the Queen of England and the United Provinces very honorable conditions.

Camden. Grotius.

This ſufficed to convince thoſe embaſſadors, that the peace between France and Spain was already ſetled, and no care taken by Henry of his allies. Elizabeth having thereof ſome intelligence, ordered her ſaid miniſters to complain; and the ſtates deputies received alſo a like order from their principals: but Henry found means to avoid hearing the mortifying reproaches he muſt needs expect, by appointing commiſſioners to treat with the embaſſadors, inſtead of granting the audience they demanded. Theſe commiſſioners and the embaſſadors being met, Oldenbarnevelt, one of the ſtates agents, boldly exclaimed againſt the inſincerity wherewith King Henry had treated his maſters. He abjured his ſaid Majeſty, tho' abſent, to declare in his conſcience, if he thought it becoming a Prince to ſeparate from his allies without any juſt cauſe. Then, to confound the French commiſſioners, he read aloud the treaty of league, concluding with words to this purport; "That ſome Kings prefered their private "intereſts to their alliances; but that this often "proved fatal to them; for when Princes have "parted with their faith and honor, it is in vain to "think of ſupporting themſelves by mere power (1).

Cecil ſpake next, and ſaid, that being impowered only to treat of a general peace, ſince the ſtates of the United Provinces were not to be included in King Henry's treaty with Spain, he could proceed no farther. Then, after a juſtification of Elizabeth's conduct, and a bold cenſure of the French King's, he demanded time to inform the Queen of what paſſed. But this demand being eluded, he prayed the commiſſioners to remind King Henry of the oath he had taken before God and man. He concluded with ſaying, that her Majeſty expected to be reimburſed the ſums lent King Henry in his preſſing neceſſities. But whatever the embaſſadors alledged ſignified nothing, ſince the peace between France and Spain was concluded, and nothing was wanting but the formality of having it publicly ſigned by plenipotentiaries, who were to meet at Vervins.

Elizabeth highly inſenſed. Camden.

Elizabeth exceſſively reſented the French King's behavior towards her, and the more as ſhe ſaw no other cauſe which could oblige him to negociate a peace without her participation than pure complaiſance to the Pope and King of Spain. It is certain, Henry might have diſingaged himſelf with ſome appearance of ſincerity, had he but pretended unwillingneſs to treat without his allies, and afterwards, on the difficulties which ſhould ariſe, had urged the neceſſity he lay under to accommodate matters: but, by doing it without their knowledge, he clearly diſcovered, that he prefered the King of Spain's intereſt before that of his allies. This was in reality his character. He was ſo impatient to be in peaceable poſſeſſion of the Gallic crown, that, to attain this felicity, he ſcrupled not ſacrificing his old friends, who were unable to hurt him, to his moſt inveterate enemies, who ſtill created him diſturbance. He had not about him any one perſon who durſt cenſure ſuch a conduct; but in Elizabeth he found one of equal rank, who uſed him leſs ceremoniouſly. She ſent him a letter wherein, after other ſevere expreſſions, ſhe told him, "That if, "in temporal concerns, there was ſuch a thing as "a ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it was, doubtleſs, "ingratitude: that if he had obtained advan- "tageous terms from Spain, he ought to thank "England for them; and that ſolemn oaths and "mutual compacts were never intended for ſnares, "unleſs by the worſt of men." Henry was ſtung with theſe reproaches; but, as they admited no reply, choſe to take no notice of them. He excuſed himſelf upon the urgent neceſſity which forced him to make peace, and indeavored to perſuade Elizabeth that, whereas he had thitherto been only a burden to her, he would for the future give her marks of his acknowledgment, in procuring her a ſafe and honorable peace, and in never forſaking her intereſts: but all this was mere wind, to which Elizabeth ſhewed very little regard.

He ſigns the peace without his allies. May 10. Thuanus.

While this paſſed, certain articles of ſmall moment, which had remained undecided, were finiſhed at Vervins. Mezerai owns the peace might have been concluded and ſigned in leſs than three weeks, if Henry had not affected to perſuade the public he would not abandon his allies: yet all this tended only to procure the Engliſh and Dutch embaſſadors being admited to the conferences, without any declaration of what he would do in their favor. But Philip, who knew how far he ſhould be ſollicited, remained inflexible, and would never grant his commiſſioners a power to treat either with England or the ſtates. Finally, after Henry had made all the requiſite excuſes to clear himſelf to the public, he gave orders to his plenipotentiaries to ſign the treaty, yet aſſuring his allies, that he would not ratify it 'till forty days after, as if that time had been ſufficient to make their peace with the Spaniard, who even refuſed to treat with them. This peace was ſigned at Vervins the ſecond of May, and ratified by Henry the twelfth of June.

Elizabeth's reaſons for proſecuting the war. Grotius. Camden.

It was now incumbent on Queen Elizabeth and the ſtates to take proper meaſures to ſuſtain a war againſt the whole power of Spain, and in order thereto her ſaid Majeſty diſpatched Francis Vere to the ſtates to know their reſolution. Mean while, it was debated in council, whether it was proper to make peace, or continue the war. The council being divided upon this queſtion, ſeveral reaſons were alledged, pro and con: but the Queen, who perfectly knew her intereſt, readily declared for war. She well comprehended that, in ſtriking up a ſeparate peace, as might very eaſily have been effected, ſhe ſhould infallibly oblige the ſtates to ſubmit again to the Spaniſh yoke. In that caſe, ſhe foreſaw ſhe ſhould ſtand ſingle without any ally, and expoſed to the inſults of Philip, who would never want pretexts to quarrel with her, and reſume his former projects againſt England: nay, it was to be feared the King of France, incited by the Pope and a Popiſh council, whereat the original leaguers had great influence, would ſuffer himſelf to be ingaged in the combination to dethrone her. She was alſo apprehenſive that the King of Scots, in order ſooner to aſcend the Engliſh throne, would be tempted by promiſes to abandon the Proteſtant religion's intereſt. In a word, by forſaking the ſtates, ſhe expoſed herſelf to the danger of ſeeing break upon her own head that ſtorm which ſhe had all her life been laboring to turn upon her neighbors. On the contrary, in ſupporting them ſhe imployed the Spaniard, and prevented his making any conſiderable attempts upon England: moreover, if by a vigorous war ſhe could oblige Philip to a peace without any danger to the United Provinces liberty, ſhe would thereby ſecure friends who might in emergencies be greatly ſerviceable.

Such were the motives which determined Elizabeth to continue the war: but ſhe was very careful to conceal her intentions from the ſtates, and rather expreſſed a ſtrong diſpoſition towards peace, pretending herſelf unable to carry on ſo heavy a war. She intimated to them, that her intereſt was not any way concerned, and that Philip's vain efforts againſt England plainly evidenced ſhe was in no danger from that quarter. The ſtates not in a condition to diſſemble like her, their all being at ſtake, were brought to acknowledge that, if the war was continued, it was ſolely for the preſervation of their liberty, and therefore it was neceſſary to treat anew upon that foundation. In ſhort, ſhe ſo artfully managed, that they came to a freſh agreement with her, intirely to her advantage. The ſtates choſe rather to ſubmit to her terms than be forced to make a peace by which, in that juncture, they muſt have loſt their liberty, their religion, and the fruits of thirty years labor. The articles of this new treaty were (1):

That as to the other half, and the reſtitution of the places which were in her Majeſty's hands, the affair ſhould be amicably agreed when peace was concluded.

That for the gariſons of Fluſhing, the Briel, and other forts, Elizabeth ſhould furniſh eleven hundred and fifty men, to be paid by the ſtates, at the rate of one hundred and ſeventy pounds ſterling monthly, beſide utenſils and other uſual neceſſaries for ſoldiers in gariſon.

That for the future, her Majeſty ſhould be diſcharged of her ingagement to ſupply the ſtates with auxiliaries, and that the Engliſh, who now ſerved, or ſhould hereafter ſerve in the Netherlands, ſhould be paid by the ſtates, ſwear fidelity to them, and obey their generals orders.

That by this means, the Engliſh deputy's authority, ſtipulated in the former treaty, would be aboliſhed, the Queen nevertheleſs reſerving a power to put one perſon into the council of ſtate.

That if, during the war, the common enemy, or his adherents ſhould ſet out a fleet to invade England, or the iſles belonging to it, namely, thoſe of Wight, Silley, Guernſey, and Jerſey, the ſtates ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt her Majeſty with a fleet of thirty or forty warlike ſhips; and, in caſe of any invaſion, with five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe: that if her Majeſty ſhould equip a fleet of fifty or ſixty ſhips, to act offenſively either in Spain, Portugal, or America, the ſtates ſhould join her with the ſame number of ſhips; and if any Engliſh forces, as ten thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, at the leaſt, were ſent over into Flanders or Brabant, the ſtates ſhould furniſh out half the ſame number of Men.

It is from this treaty eaſy to obſerve, how well Elizabeth knew to improve the preſent circumſtances of the ſtates, and their fear of being forced to make a diſadvantageous peace with Spain, tho', for reaſons before mentioned, it was her intereſt to continue the war: beſide, when this treaty was negociating, the earl of Tir-oen was very formidable in Ireland. In fine, the Scotiſh King, in a manner openly, demanded to be declared the Queen's preſumptive heir. He diſperſed books, both printed and in manuſcript, wherein he pretended to prove that no perſon whatever could deprive him of his right: nay even a letter was ſhewn to Elizabeth, ſubſcribed with his own hand, and addreſſed to the Pope. Camden ſays, he had been ſurpriſed into this letter; but that author is too partial, in every thing concerning King James, to merit abſolute credit. Soon after, one Edward Squire was apprehended in London, for having undertaken to deſtroy Queen Elizabeth, by poiſoning the pummel of her ſaddle (1). All this manifeſts ſhe had no leſs reaſon to fear for herſelf than for the ſtates, and that it was her intereſt to ſupport them, and procure them a peace which ſhould aſcertain their liberty.

Elizab. An' 1598.

Not long before his deceaſe, he had aſſigned the ſovereignty of the Netherlands in dower to the Infanta Iſabella, his daughter, when he married her to archduke Albert, but the conditions annexed to this grant evidence he had no deſign to diſmember thoſe provinces from the Spaniſh monarchy. Beſide the reſervation of homage, and a power to keep gariſons in the citadels of Antwerp and Cambray, he had ſtipulated the reverſion of this Auſtrian heritage to the crown of Spain, in default of heirs deſcending from the Princeſs his daughter; and it is even pretended, he had incapacitated her ever having any. He was ſucceded by his ſon Philip III.

This year happened a troubleſome affair at the Engliſh court. Her Majeſty, conſulting Eſſex and the admiral on the choice of a proper perſon to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland, expreſſed ſome inclination for ſir William Knolles; but the earl of Eſſex, tho' his nephew, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, contending for ſir George Carew, whom he wanted to remove from court, as being jealous of him. He haughtily and with great obſtinacy maintained his argument, and finding the Queen inflexible, turned from her with ſuch an air of contempt that, provoked at his inſolence, ſhe gave him a box on the ear (2). He immediately laid his hand on his ſword, and being by the admiral, prevented from drawing it ſwore that he neither could nor would put up ſuch indignity; nor would he have taken it from Henry VIII. himſelf were he alive; and inſtantly retired from court. The lord privy-ſeal repreſenting to him, in a letter, the folly of his menaces, and adviſing him to ask the Queen's pardon, he ſent a long and paſſionate anſwer, wherein he treated her Majeſty very diſreſpectfully (3). But being at length brought to himſelf, by the advice of his friends, he was re-admited to favor. Few believed this reconciliation ſincere, and the earl's friends were in great fear for him.

with the Pope and Spaniard's aſſiſtance, (1), the earl of Tir-oen would abſolutely free them from the Engliſh yoke. Queen Elizabeth, informed of the ſtate of affairs, believed the utmoſt diligence muſt be uſed to reduce the Iriſh to their duty, and ordered her council to conſider in her preſenſe how to execute her reſolution. The earl of Eſſex harangued largely on this ſubject, blaming the conduct of former lord-deputies, who, he ſaid, amuſed themſelves with trifles inſtead of acting directly againſt Tir-oen, without giving him any reſpite: that, by truces granted him from time to time, he had reſtored his affairs; and withal, the Queen had been put to needleſs expenſe, ſince her troops were as well paid in a truce as during the war. This part of his diſcourſe greatly pleaſed her Majeſty, who loved not to empty her purſe without neceſſity. When a deputy came to be named, moſt of the council were for lord Montjoy. This was oppoſed by the earl of Eſſex, becauſe that nobleman had never commanded in chief, and was withal very bookiſh, whereas the affairs of Ireland required a martial and active general. He added, that to bring the war in Ireland to a ſpeedy period, its management ſhould be commited to ſome chieftain of reputation, and who was acceptable to the people. In a word, he ſo plainly pointed out himſelf, that he was nominated for that ſtation. His friends thought to oblige him, and his enemies hoped that this poſt, and his abſenſe from court, would afford them means to work his deſtruction.

What this youthful earl's real views were is not well known; but he had of late years made himſelf ſo popular, and gained ſo far upon the people by his affable deportment, that he was in a manner adored. He wanted only to gain the ſoldiery's affection; and this, very ſeemingly, was his aim in deſiring to command in Ireland: but as he had enemies who ſought nothing ſo much as his ruin, it was on this imploy they grounded their hopes of ſucceſs. On the other hand his friends, in ſerving him over zealouſly, did him a prejudice. They affected to publiſh his deſcent from the royal houſe of Scotland, and from that of England by his great-grandmother, who numbered among her anceſtors Edmund de Langley duke of York, and Thomas of Woodſtock, both ſons of Edward III. Hence it was intended to inſinuate, that, after the Queen's deceaſe, it would be better to place him on the throne than a foreign Prince. A book * was alſo dedicated to him, in which the author overthrew the titles of every pretender to the crown, except that of the Spaniſh Infanta. His adverſaries, perceiving he was forming ſome dangerous ſcheme, took care not to divert him from it: on the contrary, they every where, and on all occaſions, extoled his magnanimity, his prudence, and his attachment to the Proteſtant intereſt, in order to ingage him in meaſures which would more evidently manifeſt his deſigns. He had a very ſprightly genius, and many amiable qualities, but was too much intoxicated with his own merit, and regarded all the other Engliſh peers as greatly his inferiors. He was made lord deputy with a very extenſive commiſſion, to proſecute or terminate the war as he pleaſed; nay even to pardon Tir-oen and the other rebels; authorities never before granted to any of his predeceſſors: but it was inſerted in his patent, that, laying aſide all other affairs, he ſhould apply himſelf wholly to purſue and ruin the earl of Tir-oen, chief of the rebels. He could not complain of this clauſe, becauſe it was only what had by himſelf been propoſed in council.

Towards the cloſe of March, Eſſex ſailed for Ireland with 20000 foot, and 1300 horſe (2). The Engliſh had never before ſeen in that iſland ſo formidable a body of forces. The Queen had made this great effort, purſuant to Eſſex's advice, in order to put a ſpeedy end to the rebellion, and finiſh the war in one campain. On his arrival, whether of himſelf, or by the advice of his pretended friends, he affected to act directly contrary to his inſtructions. He immediately confered the command of his cavalry on the earl of Southampton, his intimate friend, againſt the expreſs injunctions of her Majeſty, who was offended with that nobleman for marrying without her permiſſion. Then, inſtead of marching againſt Tir-oen, he turned his arms againſt certain rebels in Munſter, whom he indeed forced into the woods and mountains, but with the loſs of many of his men: this expedition, of very ſmall importance, detained him in thoſe parts 'till the end of July. Mean while Elizabeth, informed of his proceedings, wrote to him in very angry terms, and reproached him with acting contrary to orders founded upon his own advice, commanding him withal to march into Ulſter againſt Tir-oen himſelf. He excuſed himſelf, by alledging that the council of Ireland, who were beſt acquainted with that kingdom's affairs, had adviſed him firſt to clear Munſter; and promiſed poſitively to march the firſt opportunity againſt the chief rebel: but he ſoon after wrote to court, that he was obliged to return to Dublin, to chaſtiſe ſome Iriſh who infeſted the country; and in effect he gained his point: but, after this ſecond expedition, his army was ſo diminiſhed, that he ſent home for a reinforcement, without which, he ſaid, he could not perform any great exploits in Ulſter. He began however to march thitherwards, but his vanguard, conſiſting of fifteen hundred men, under command of ſir Conyers Clifford, fell into an ambuſh and was utterly defeated.

Tho' it was amazing that, with ſuch a gallant army, he had done nothing conſiderable, but on the contrary was forced to demand a reinforcement, the Queen inſtantly ſupplied him with freſh troops. But ſoon after, he gave the court to underſtand, that all he could do this campain was to poſt himſelf on the frontiers of Ulſter with thirteen hundred foot and three hundred horſe. On his arrival in that province, the earl of Tir-oen deſired a parley, which he refuſed. Next day, when the armies were near each other, Tir-oen ſent Hagan, one of his officers, to acquaint Eſſex, that he was ready to ſubmit to her Majeſty, and deſired he would grant him a meeting on the banks of a ſmall river, where they might confer, each remaining on his own ſide. Eſſex conſented, and they diſcourſed about an hour, without any witneſs. Two hours after, Tir-oen demanded a ſecond conference, in preſenſe of ſome of the chief officers of the two armies. The earl of Eſſex granted his requeſt, and at this ſecond interview, it was agreed, that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to treat of a pacification, on the morrow. This negociation ended in a treaty of truce which was ſpeedily concluded. The truce was to continue 'till May the inſuing year *, with this condition, that either party ſhould be at liberty to break it, on giving a fortnight's notice.

she could not forbear saying, she suspected him of ill designs. She was counseled instantly to recall him: but she dreaded irritating him too far while he had the sword in his hand. Nevertheless, she wrote to him very sharply, and reproached him with his contempt of her orders. This letter made on Essex such impression, that he immediately determined on returning to England with the flower of his army, and revenging himself on his enemies, vainly relying on a general insurrection in his favor: but the earl of Southampton dissuaded him from so dangerous a resolution. The Queen, informed of this project, countenanced a report, that a fleet was preparing in Spain to invade England, and under that pretext raised six thousand men. Some time after, she augmented her army, and gave the command to the lord admiral, who was no friend to Essex: but this terror being dissipated, by advices from Ireland, she dismissed most of her forces.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 383. Stow. p. 788, &c.

The news of what passed in England convincing the earl of Essex that he was suspected by her Majesty, he took a sudden resolution to justify himself personally, without demanding the Queen's permission. He was accompanied by the earl of Southampton and several officers, who on their arrival in England disposed of themselves different ways. He reserved only six men to attend him, and posted with all diligence in order to be with the Queen before she had notice of his arrival; but, notwithstanding his care, he found he had been prevented. Elizabeth was then at Nonsuch, ten miles from London. She received him without any emotion, and even with marks of favor, but after some reproaches for his irregular conduct, she commanded him to his apartment 'till farther orders. After that, being asked, why he made with Tir-oen a truce, which might at any time be broken at a fortnight's warning, since he was impowered to conclude a peace? He answered, that the earl of Tir-oen was so unreasonable in his demands, that they could not be granted (1): but it was his opinion, that a truce might bring him to more equitable terms. This answer did not satisfy her Majesty, who was also very angry he left his government without her leave; beside that the persons who attended him into England were such as gave her great cause to suspect him: wherefore she commited him to custody at the lord keeper's, to prevent his lanching into new excesses.

His apology. Camden.

Camden, in his annals, gives us the earl's own apology, in which it appears, that he made but a very lame reply to the accusation of having neglected attacking the earl of Tir-oen, and imployed his army in expeditions of little consequence. He contented himself with saying, that he had put the Irish affairs in such a situation that, during his nine months government, the English had sustained no damage. But he was not intrusted with twenty thousand men, to stand only on the defensive. Concerning the persons who attended him, he said only, that not above six came to court with him, but of rest who accompanied him from Ireland, he was silent. The commission given Southampton, contrary to the Queen's express orders, he also passed over in silence. The rest consisted wholly in exclamations upon the injustice of suspecting him, and in magnifying his father's merits, his brother's, killed in the Queen's service, and his own. At the same time his friends and relatives loudly complained of the rigor wherewith he was treated, representing it as excessive: some even combined to rescue him forcibly; but to that he would not consent.

Elizab. An' 1599.

Mean while, the earl of Tir-oen, understanding Essex was arrested, broke the truce, and did great mischief to the English settled in Ireland. He flattered himself with a strong and speedy assistance from Spain (2) and the Pope, who had made him a present of a pretended phœnix plume. In this expectation, he formed no less a project than utterly to expel all the English from Ireland.

Tir-oen breaks the truce. Speed. Camden.

During this interim, Essex's partisans were inciting the people to rise in his behalf, representing him as the most accomplished peer England had ever beheld since the foundation of its monarchy: at the same time, they exclaimed against the ministry, not without malicious reflections on the Queen's conduct, as if she took no care of the Irish affairs. This highly prejudiced the earl, and increased her Majesty's suspicions of him. As she had irritated him, she readily supposed him meditating revenge. Wherefore, in the begining of October, she assembled her council in the star-chamber, where Essex's conduct was examined, and unanimously condemned by the privy-counsellors: yet nothing more was done against him, the Queen only desiring to satisfy the people, that it was not merely thro' her caprice that he was under confinement. He remained therefore at the lord keeper's house, where he gave himself up to devotion, spending his time in prayer, and writing letters to his friends in a strain so devout that some believed he had renounced all sublunary vanities.

About the close of this year, the archduke Andrew, governor of the Netherlands during the absense of his brother Albert, who was gone to Spain to espouse the Infanta, proposed a peace to Elizabeth. She replied, her concurrence should not be wanting, provided the United-Provinces were included. This condition at once put a stop to the negociation. Elizabeth suspected, the proposal was made only to amuse her 'till a fleet, then preparing in Spain, should be ready to invade England: but, this imaginary fleet, which gave her some uneasines, at length ended in a few gallies, put to sea by Frederico Spinola, a Genoese in the Catholic King's service, and conducted by him into the harbor of Sluys.

The earl of Tir-oen improved the disorder Essex had made in the Irish affairs. He reduced the whole province of Ulster to his obedience, and hoped speedily to be master of the whole kingdom. For his incouragement, Pope Clement VIII sent him a bull, whereby he granted to him and his adherents the same indulgences as to those who fought against the Turks, to recover the Holy-Land. But lord Montjoy, appointed lieutenant of Ireland in Essex's stead, found means to stop that rebel's progress, and give a considerable check to his insolence.

At the same time, archduke Albert (stiled likewise the Infante Cardinal) being returned from Spain, made new proposals of accommodation to Elizabeth. Henry IV supported them with his whole interest, and succeeded so far, that her Majesty sent plenipotentiaries to Boulogne, where the peace was to be negociated. But after the embassadors of those two contending crowns had been four months in that place, they parted, without ever assembling, by reason of a dispute of precedency between England and Spain. If the plenipotentiaries had met, another obſtacle would have occurred, which could never have been ſurmounted, viz. that the Spaniards were for a ſeparate peace or truce with England, whereto undoubtedly Elizabeth would not have conſented: beſide, the King of Spain pretended, that Elizabeth ſhould ſurrender the places mortgaged to her by the ſtates. Eſſex's ſtory continued. Camden. Cabala. p. 232, &c. Speed.

The earl of Eſſex was ſtill under arreſt at the lord privy-ſeal's, where he cloſely applied himſelf to devotion. He, from time to time, wrote ſuch ſubmiſſive letters to the Queen, that he ſeemed to have loſt that exceſſive haughtineſs which had been to him ſo prejudicial. At length Elizabeth, content with having humbled him, permited him to retire to his own houſe, under the free cuſtody of ſir Richard Berkley, who was to obſerve his motions. In all likelihood, he had been ſoon reſtored to favor, the Queen evidently diſcovering her ſentiments in that reſpect (2); but his friends and domeſtics ruined him. They had made ſuch ſtrong cabals among the people, that nothing was diſcourſed of but the earl of Eſſex's innocence. Whereas the Queen pretended to have treated him with much lenity and moderation, it was given out, that he was unjuſtly perſecuted, and even his life attempted on falſe ſuggeſtions. Elizabeth, who was very nice in ſuch points, and conſidered the peoples prejudices againſt her as a great misfortune, reſolved to manifeſt that Eſſex had more reaſon to praiſe her clemency, than complain of her rigor. To this end, ſhe ordered him to be brought before the privy-council, whereto ſhe had added four earls, two barons, and four judges: but ſhe aſſured theſe commiſſioners, it was not her intention to condemn him to any infamous puniſhment, as guilty of treaſon or diſloyalty; but only to convince him of having failed in his allegiance, and ſlighted her orders and inſtructions, thro' exceſs of vanity. Her deſign was to ſhew the prejudiced people, that the earl of Eſſex merited more rigorous penalties than a few months confinement.

Articles of his accuſation.

When he appeared before his judges, he was charged. 1. With contemning the Queen's orders, in making the earl of Southampton general of the horſe. 2. With making knights, contrary to the expreſs words of his patent. 3. With neglecting to purſue the earl of Tir-oen, tho' that was the chief end of his commiſſion. 4. With ſecretly confering with that rebel. 5. With granting a truce highly detrimental to her Majeſty's affairs. 6. With abandoning his government, without vouchſafing to aſk the Queen's permiſſion. Some inferences likewiſe drawn from his diſreſpectful expreſſions in his apology, and from certain dangerous principles contained in a book dedicated to him, concerning Richard II's dethronation.

He is declared guilty.

Having heard the articles of his accuſation, he fell on his knees, glorifying the Almighty for all his mercies, and then thanking his Sovereign for not ordering him to be examined in the ſtar-chamber. He declared, he would neither excuſe his faults, either in whole or in part, nor contend with her Majeſty: he acknowledged his guilt, but proteſted upon his honor, that his heart had been always free from the leaſt thought of rebellion. However, in continuing to ſpeak, he began to urge ſome excuſes in his own behalf. But the lord-keeper interrupted, by reminding him, that he had taken a good method, but was now ſwerving from it: that, in extenuating his faults, he likewiſe extenuated the Queen's clemency; and that in fine, a manifeſt diſobedience was but a bad proof of a good intention. The lord-keeper, in preventing him from inlarging on his juſtification, did him a good office. Elizabeth's deſign was not to have him rigorouſly tried, but only to ſhew he had been treated with more lenity than he deſerved. His confeſſion led him to the ſame end, whereas his juſtification would have obliged his judges to a ſeverer examination: ſo, whether he of himſelf comprehended his own intereſt, or was warned what to do, he was ſilent.

He is condemned to certain penalties.

The commiſſioners having conſulted apart, were of opinion, that he ought to be removed from the council-board, ſuſpended from his offices of earl-marſhal and maſter of the ordnance, and impriſoned during her Majeſty's pleaſure. His office of maſter of the horſe remained untouched, by expreſs command from Elizabeth, who was unwilling to give occaſion to believe ſhe had intirely withdrawn from him her confidence: ſhe even ordered the ſentence ſhould not be recorded. The earl received this chaſtiſement with ſuch humility, that the Queen, pleaſed with his deportment, removed Berkley from him, and left him at full liberty: but ſhe adviſed him to be his own keeper, and forbid him the court.

For ſome years, Queen Elizabeth had honored the earl of Eſſex with a very particular eſteem and affection. She had given him marks of it on ſundry occaſions; and particularly by the dignities, offices and commands he had injoyed. This diſtiction had ſo elated him, that he ſolely aſcribed to his merit theſe extraordinary favors which were the pure effect of his ſovereign's inclination. This occaſioned his not having always that regard for her ſhe had reaſon to expect from him, fancying ſhe could not be without his aſſiſtance: in a word, he was a very bad courtier. It is not ſtrange, that a conduct ſo imprudent altered the Queen's affection; and yet, thro' her whole procedure, it manifeſtly appeared not to be intirely extinguiſhed. Her intent was only to humble that arrogant ſpirit, which ſeemed aiming to vie with her, which ſhe believed to have now effected. He ſeemed at laſt to be ſenſible that humility was the ſole means of reſtoring him to that degree of favor he had heretofore injoyed, and had reſolved to purſue that method as the ſureſt. Immediately after his ſentence, while he was preparing for a country retirement, he ſent the Queen word: "That he kiſſed the rod and her "Majeſty's hand, which had only corrected, and "not ruined him; but ſhould injoy no peace, 'till "he ſaw again thoſe eyes which had once ſhined ſo "propitiouſly on him: that he had reſolved to "attone for his error, and like Nebuchadnezzar "to dwell with the beaſts of the field, eat graſs as "an ox, and be wet with the dew of Heaven, "'till it ſhould pleaſe his Queen to reſtore him to "his ſenſes." This ſubmiſſion was highly pleaſing to Elizabeth, and yet ſhe anſwered, ſhe would not be amuſed with vain words, but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience, ſhe would take ſome time to try his humility. This was a plain intimation that, with a little patience, he would appeaſe her intirely, and it was in ſome meaſure directing him how to form his conduct. But he was ſo imprudent as not to improve this advantage, and to follow the intereſted counſels of his domeſtics (1), who adviſed him to petition the Queen for the continuation of the farm of ſweet wines, which had brought him a very conſiderable profit. Elizabeth, to try him, refuſed his petition, knowing it to be in her power to repair the loſs whenever ſhe pleaſed: but inſtead of receiving this denial with the humility and reſignation he had profeſſed ſince his diſgrace, he diſcovered paſſion and reſentment, which gave his royal miſtreſs room to believe him not yet ſufficiently humbled. Whereupon Cuff, his ſecretary and confident, ſuggeſted to him, that the Queen not only intended to humble but beggar him, and render him univerſally contemptible. Cuff was ſeconded by other incendiaries, who at laſt inſpired him with the deſign of forcibly reſtoring himſelf to favor, and deſtroying all his enemies about the Queen's perſon. This reſolution taken, his gates were open to all who diſliked the court. The earl of Southampton, who had withdrawn into the Netherlands, returned to England; and Eſſex, quiting the country, returned to his houſe at London. Being arrived, Merrick his ſteward kept open houſe for all who thought they had cauſe to complain of the Queen or her miniſters, and a great number of ſuſpicious perſons reſorted thither: in a word, his whole conduct ſhewed he was meditating ſome dangerous project. His adverſaries improving theſe proceedings, found means to inſpire the Queen with ſuſpicions, and to ſtation about him ſpies, who informed the court of what paſſed (2).

But Burnet (p. 18.) thinks it was a real conſpiracy, and the rather, as earl Goury, on the King's death, ſtood next to the ſucceſſion of the crown, as being deſcended from Margaret, daughter of King Henry VII.

He humbles himſelf. Camden.

An' 1601. Snares laid for him; Camden.

It is pretended that thoſe who had projected his deſtruction, knowing his pride and haughtineſs, cauſed his friends at court to write to him, not to diſcover ſo much impatience in his diſgrace, but to throw himſelf abſolutely on her Majeſty's clemency, as the readieſt way to her favor. Theſe advices drew from him anſwers ſuitable to the intentions of his enemies, which being communicated to the Queen, completed his ruin. They abounded with expreſſions denoting his fury and impatience, and even intimating his deſigns. He ſaid, that a ſtorm was fallen upon him, when he expected a harveſt: that the Queen had reduced him to a private life, which was diſagreeable to him: that he was incapable of ſo vile a ſubmiſſion as was expected from him: that he had been unjuſtly impriſoned: that Sovereigns had not a power unlimited nor were infallible: that he had been wounded in every pore of his body: that his enemies triumphed, but ſhould never have the ſatisfaction to ſee him cringe to them. To theſe expreſſions, which were no ſigns of repentance, care was taken to add reports ſufficient to render the Queen for ever implacable. She was told, he had ſaid, "The old "woman is now become no leſs crooked and "diſtorted in her mind than in her body." which he falls into.

In all appearance, the earl of Eſſex thought all farther caution needleſs, his project being now formed, tho' his meaſures were very ill laid. Thoſe who ſpeak moſt favorably of the affair, affirm that his project was to ſeize the Queen's perſon, and drive his enemies from court, as had been more than once practiſed in Scotland with regard to King James: but Eſſex ſeems to have had deeper views, ſince he courted the King of Scotland's aſſiſtance; perhaps to place him on the throne before Elizabeth's deceaſe. It was known he had written to that Prince; that a plot was formed to deprive him of the ſucceſſion, and give the crown to the Spaniſh Infanta: that for this purpoſe the projectors who governed at court, had filled the moſt conſiderable poſts with the Infanta's adherents: that ſecretary Cecil, the late treaſurer's ſon, was at the head of this party, and had ingaged therein the lord treaſurer Buckhurſt, with the earl of Nottingham lord admiral: that, the better to execute his project, he had commited the government of the maritime places to his creatures, where the Spaniards might moſt conveniently land: that the Queen was ſo impaired in her underſtanding, that ſhe was incapable to act of herſelf, and was intirely guided by her miniſters: that he was therefore neceſſarily obliged to proceed openly to defeat this conſpiracy; and to this end, was ſpeedily to diſpatch embaſſadors to England, to demand a public declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, creatures and penſioners of Spain, from court and council. At the ſame time he furniſhed him with proofs to be uſed by the embaſſadors, to demonſtrate the reality of this combination. Laſtly, he inſinuated, that his embaſſadors ſhould be ſufficiently ſupported. Camden, who wrote in the reign of James I, has not thought proper to tell us, how theſe propoſals were received by that Prince: but it may be judged they were not diſapproved, ſince preſently after he diſpatched into England embaſſadors, who however came too late. This hiſtorian adds, the earl of Eſſex gained to his party ſome Preſbyterian miniſters, and even ſome Papiſts, by commiſerating their afflicted condition under the Queen's tyrannical government, and by inſpiring them with hopes of eaſement. Then he allowed entertainment to men of the ſword, in and about London, whom he ſtationed near his houſe. After that, he eſtabliſhed a council compoſed of the earl of Southampton, ſir Charles Davers, ſir Ferdinando Gorges governor of Plymouth fort, ſir John Davis a great mathematician, John Littleton a man of good ſenſe and judgment, and equally qualified for field and cabinet.

He plots to ſeize the Queen's perſon. Camden. Treaſons of earl of Eſſex.

Eſſex gave them a liſt of certain noblemen and others of note whom he believed at his devotion, earls, barons, knights, and gentlemen, in number a hundred and twenty, and deſired them to conſult, whether it was propereſt to ſeize the palace, the Tower, or both at once. The reſult of their deliberation was, that the Queen's perſon and palace ſhould firſt be ſeized, and when ſhe was in their power, the earl ſhould diſmiſs certain perſons from her preſenſe, and turn them out of their places; but that nothing ſhould be done 'till the Scotiſh embaſſadors were arrived (1).

Is ſent for to council. Feb. 7. Camden.

Mean while, the extraordinary reſort of ſuſpected perſons to Eſſex's houſe, ſome words unwarily droped by the conſpirators, and the ſpies reports, confirming the court's ſuſpicions, the council met at the treaſurer's, and ſent one of the ſecretaries to the earl of Eſſex, to require his attendance: but, at the ſame time, a note was delivered him, adviſing him to take care of himſelf. Whereupon he told the ſecretary he was indiſpoſed and could not ſtir from home. Immediately after, he conſulted, whether he ſhould purſue his firſt project of ſeizing the palace, or attempt raiſing the city of London, or make his eſcape ſince his plot was undoubtedly diſcovered. The firſt of theſe projects was deemed impracticable, becauſe the guards had been doubled. The ſecond occaſioned long debates on the uncertainty of its execution, the Londoners diſpoſition not being ſufficiently known. In this interim, one of the conſpirators entered, affirming he came from the city, and that its inhabitance were ready to defend the earl againſt all his enemies. He added, that the ſheriff, Thomas Smith, who commanded a thouſand of the city militia, had promiſed to join him. Probably the perſon who made this falſe report had been induced to it by ſome of the principal conſpirators, who finding the earl begin to relax, was willing to ingage him ſo far as to leave no poſſibility of his receding. This was ſufficient to induce Eſſex to determine on exciting an inſurrection in the city, being perſuaded the people were diſpoſed in his favor. It was therefore agreed, that next day the earl, attended by five hundred men, ſhould enter London, and aſſembling the aldermen and common-council, require their aſſiſtance. That if the citizens were favorably inclined, they ſhould be imployed to gain acceſs to the Queen, or, in caſe of diſappointment, the conſpirators ſhould retire to ſome other part of England.

Reſolves to execute his deſign. Camden.

Treaſons of earl of Eſſex.

Anſwerably to this determination, the earls of Rutland and Southampton went next morning to Eſſex's houſe, with three hundred gentlemen and the gates were inſtantly ſhut, and no perſon ſuffered to paſs either in or out. But ſir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the moſt zealous of his party was permited on ſome pretext to go out (2). It was probably he who diſcovered all to the court; for ſoon after the Queen ſent to the mayor of London, to order the trained-bands to be ready to march upon the firſt notice. At the ſame time, ſhe ſent to him the lord keeper, the earl of Worceſter, and ſir William Knolles (3), who were let in thro' a wicket, without any of their attendants except the purſe-bearer. In the court-yard they ſaw the earls of Eſſex, Rutland, and Southampton, ſurrounded with a croud of armed men, and the lord-keeper advancing towards them, told Eſſex, he was ſent by the Queen to know the reaſon of ſo great a concourſe. Then the earl raiſing his voice, ſaid; "He certainly knew there "was a deſign to murder him in his bed (4): that "his hand-writing was counterfeited, in order to have "a pretenſe to deſtroy him: that he had aſſembled "his friends for the ſecurity of his life, ſince his "enemies could not be ſatisfied without having his "blood." The lord-keeper anſwering, the Queen would do him juſtice, provided he would diſcover his grievances, was interrupted by a voice, crying out, "My lord, you are betrayed, they deſign "only to ruin you; we loſe time, let us be gone." Hereupon the earl made a ſign to thoſe ſent by the Queen to follow him (5), and while they were croſſing the court, they heard a confuſed noiſe, ſaying, "Kill them; away with that great ſeal; "ſecure them in priſon." When they were in the houſe, the earl told them, "If they would have a "little patience, he would go and adviſe with the "lord mayor and ſheriffs, and return immediately." He thereupon left them, and, ordering the door to be ſhut, ſet a guard upon them.

Immediately after, he began to march with his company, and entering the city, cryed out, "For "the Queen! for the Queen! a plot is laid for my "life!" then he went to the ſheriff's houſe, which was at a diſtance, and during his march was not joined by one citizen, tho' numbers led by curioſity crouded to ſee him paſs. He in vain cried out, "Arm, my friends, or you can do me no good," not a man ſtired in his favor. The ſheriff, who ſaw him approaching, withdrew by a back door to the lord mayor's. The ſheriff's flight convinced Eſſex he had been deceived when told, he might depend on his aſſiſtance. While he was at the ſheriff's, uncertain what to do, he was informed that a herald had proclaimed him a traytor, in one of the city wards, and that the earl of Cumberland had done the ſame in another. Upon this, he left the ſheriff's houſe, and crying in the ſtreets, "that "England was going to be delivered to the Infanta "of Spain, conjured the inhabitants to take arms "for the prevention of ſo great a misfortune." But ſeeing none prepare to ſecond him, and hearing withal that the lord admiral was marching againſt him with a ſtrong party, he reſolved on returning home: but coming to Ludgate, he found Leviſon poſted there with a company of ſoldiers to oppoſe his paſſage. He inſtantly ſent Gorges to deſire leave to paſs thro'; but, being denied, was obliged to return to St. Paul's. Here Gorges repreſented to him, that it would be proper to diſcharge the three counſellors, and having the earl's leave, he freed them immediately, and accompanied them himſelf to While-hall. could, ſtill expecting to be relieved by the Londoners. Soon after, the lord admiral inveſted the houſe, both from the ſtreet and the gardens which reached to the river. Then, he ſummoned thoſe within to ſurrender, to which they anſwered, they would die ſword in hand. This was the opinion of lord Sands, who earneſtly preſſed Eſſex to fight his way out, repreſenting that, at the very worſt, it was more honorable to die by the ſword, than the ax, and indeed the beſieged ſeemed to be all fixed in that reſolution. But the earl of Eſſex ſuddenly changed his mind, and offered to ſurrender on theſe three conditions; that they ſhould all be civily treated; tried according to law; and that Aſhton the miniſter ſhould be ſent to him to comfort him in priſon. The lord admiral anſwered, that he ingaged for the firſt; that the Queen would doubtleſs perform the ſecond; and as to the third, he promiſed his intereſt to obtain it. Aſhton was a preſbyterian preacher. This done, the earls of Eſſex, Rutland, Southampton, the lords Sands, Cromwell, Monteagle, with Davers and Bromley, were put into boats and conducted to the Tower. The reſt were commited to other priſons. Next day the Queen by proclamation, thanked the Londoners for their fidelity, warning them withal to have a watchful eye on whatever paſſed in the city, the conſpiracy being, as ſhe ſaid, more dangerous than was imagined.

The thirteenth of February, Thomas Lee, Eſſex's creature, and Tir-oen's intimate friend, was hanged, for ſaying to a certain officer, that it would be a glorious action for ſix brave fellows to force the Queen to releaſe Eſſex and the other priſoners. Two days after, her Majeſty iſſued a proclamation, ordering all vagrants to leave the city on pain of death. The court had notice, that great numbers of ſuch lay lurking in London, to reſcue the earl of Eſſex, when opportunity offered.

Lee executed. Camden. Stow.

Feb. 15.

At length, ſome of the priſoners having diſcovered the conſpirators moſt ſecret reſolutions, the earls of Eſſex and Southampton were tried the nineteenth of February. They were charged with the crimes above mentioned, and their ſole defenſe was, that they had done nothing but for their own preſervation; however, they could not prove their lives had been in danger. Eſſex expreſſed a diſregard of his life, but Southampton implored the Queen's mercy, and deſired the peers to interceed for him. They were both ſentented to die as traytors.

Eſſex and Southampton condemned. Camden. State-Try. Treaſons of earl of Eſſex.

Eſſex, after his condemnation, ſeriouſly reflected on his paſt conduct, and appeared very penitent. Aſhton, by his exhortations and remonſtrances, greatly contributed, towards bringing him to this diſpoſition. But becauſe this Preſbyterian miniſter adviſed him to declare whatever he knew, and probably by that means, the King of Scotland was known to be concerned in the conſpiracy, Camden ſpeaks of it in ſuch manner as ſhews he approved not this conduct. "By the impreſſions (ſays he) left "upon him by his miniſter, Eſſex could think of "nothing but damnation, unleſs he diſcovered the "whole ſcene, and confeſſed who where his com-"plices". A writer who argues thus, is eaſily perceived to be ſecretly intereſted in the depoſition of the criminal. However this be, the earl of Eſſex deſiring to ſpeak with ſome of the privy-counſellors, the lord keeper, the lord treaſurer, the lord admiral, and ſecretary Cecil went to him. He immediately aſked the lord keeper's pardon for detaining him at his houſe, and Cecil's for accuſing him of aſſerting the Infanta's title to the crown of England, and was ſincerly reconciled to both. Then he declared, that the Queen could not be ſafe while he lived, and deſired he might ſuffer privately in the Tower. deſired to ſpeak with Blunt and Cuff, who were inſtantly ſent for. Being come, he exhorted both to implore pardon of God and the Queen, and told Cuff that this diſloyalty was owing to his counſels. He declared that ſir Henry Nevill, embaſſador to France, was privy to the conſpiracy. This probably occaſioned that miniſter's being recalled as he was going to Paris, and ordered into the lord admiral's cuſtody. The earl of Eſſex ſaid alſo, that Montjoy, lord deputy of Ireland, and ſeveral others in Scotland, France, and the Netherlands, were acquainted with the deſign: but lord Montjoy's behavior in Ireland had ſo recommended him to Elizabeth, that ſhe took no notice of Eſſex's depoſition againſt him. In ſhort, the penitent criminal made a full diſcharge of his conſcience, and concealed nothing of what he knew. Eſſex, (ſays Camden) "thought a verbal confeſſion too little, and there-"fore being moved by the diſmal ſcene preſented "to his conſcience, by the perſon whom he choſe "to guide it, he delivered the ſame in writing "under his own hand, which his enemies ſhewing "to King James ſome time after, brought the earl "and his friends into great diſeſteem with that "Prince". Had not King James been concerned in this affair, there is no viſible reaſon why Eſſex's declarations ſhould have made him forfeit his eſteem: but, according to the earl's project, the Scotiſh embaſſadors were now on their way to London, and King James ever after ſpoke of this nobleman as of one who was his martyr.

Camden.

The twenty-fifth of February was appointed for the earl of Eſſex's execution. That day Elizabeth appeared ſome what irreſolute: ſhe even ſent orders to the lieutenant of the Tower to countermand his execution: but preſently after ordered him to proceed. This irreſolution, feined or real, has afforded plenty of matter for plays and romances, in which Elizabeth is repreſented as ſtruggling with love and anger, not knowing which of the paſſions ſhe ſhould obey. She was however then in her ſixty-eighth year, an age wherein the motions of love could not be very violent. But without dweling on theſe trifles, it ſuffices to ſay, that the earls of Eſſex died like a good chriſtian, with all the ſigns of a ſerious repentance. His head was not ſeparated from his body 'till the third ſtroke; but the firſt deprived him of all ſenſe of pain. Marſhal Biron being told in what manner he died, ridiculed it, and ſaid, ſuch a death was more becoming a prieſt than a ſoldier.

Camden.

Thus terminated the life and projects of the earl of Eſſex, projects which were never yet thoroughly known. Tho' they ſeem to have tended only to dethrone Elizabeth, and place England's Crown on the Scotiſh King's head, it is however not unlikely that he only uſed that Prince's title as a pretenſe to ruin Elizabeth, and that his confidence in the peoples affection inſpired him with deeper views. It is certain, the Queen had given occaſion to think ſhe had more than a common eſteem for this ſprightly peer. When he was yet but twenty one years old, ſhe forgave him what ſhe had lent his father for his expedition to Ireland; and he was the only perſon to whom ſhe was ever ſo liberal. The earl of Leiceſter dying not long after, ſhe ordered his goods to be expoſed to ſale, for payment of the ſums ſhe had lent him. Before the earl of Eſſex had done her any conſiderable ſervice, ſhe made him knight of the garter, and gave him a place in her privy-council. She continued afterwards to diſtinguiſh him from all her other courtiers, not only by the poſts, offices, and commands ſhe honored him with, but chiefly by particular marks of her favor, which were viſible to all, and made him be looked on as a favorite. Theſe favors produced their uſual effect, I mean, puffed him up with with pride and vanity. He could not bear that any ſhould be promoted but by his means, and was a ſworn enemy to all who partook of the Queen's confidence: nay, he grew ſo eccesſively arrogant, that he pretended to domineer even over her Majeſty, and compel her in all things to follow his advice. This procured him that unfortunate box on the ear, which, doubtleſs, inſpired him with thoughts of exemplary vengeance; for he thence-forwards began to meditate projects which proved his ruin, and might have been attended with that of the Queen herſelf; ſo careful ought Sovereigns to be, not to affront perſons of honor. His family was originally from Evreux in Normandy, and thence borrowed its ſur-name. It was noble and ancient, as may be infered from his alliances with the prime nobility of England, among whom ſome were of the blood royal. Walter D'Evreux, his father, was however the firſt of his houſe dignified with the title of earl (1).

The earl being dead, his chief accomplices were brought to their trials (2). In Blunt's examination, Eſſex's written confeſſion was read to him. Blunt ſeeing it ſigned with the earl's own hand, was ſo confounded, that he could only ſay, with up lifted eyes, "Lord thou knoweſt from what "deſigns I indeavored to divert him". Next was read the confeſſion of Lee, who had been executed, in which he ſaid, Blunt had permited him to ſend to the earl of Tir-oen, who told the meſſenger, "that if Eſſex would be guided by him, "he would make him the greateſt man in Eng-"land". Lee had likewiſe depoſed, that the two earls and Blunt were in the ſame plot, and formed the ſame projects. Blunt made a weak defenſe, as did alſo Davers, Davis, Cuff the earl's ſecretary, and Merick his ſteward, and they all received ſentence of death. Blunt ſaid, upon the ſcaffold; that for three years he had obſerved the earl was diſcontented, and fired with ambition: that when they were in Ireland, the earl told him his deſign of taking with him the flower of the army; of ſeizing Milford-haven in Wales; of raiſing men in thoſe parts, and marching directly to London; that he had diſſuaded him from ſuch a dangerous and difficult undertaking; but had indeed adviſed him to take a ſelect company of men and ſeize her Majeſty's perſon, and in her name to act afterwards as he ſaw convenient: "but, added "Blunt, tho' it is true, that in all our debates "we never thought of imbruing our hands in the "Queen's blood, yet had we ſucceded, I cannot "ſay but her life might have been in danger". He declared, that he died a Roman Catholic, but ſuch a one as ſolely relied on the merits of Chriſt's death and ſufferings.

The Queen and council believed it prudent to limit juſtice to the execution of theſe few perſons, by reaſon of the number and quality of the complices. The earl of Southampton was detained in priſon, and the reſt were fined, tho' very few paid their fines. Henry Nevill was only condemned to impriſonment during the Queen's pleaſure, though it was proved againſt him that he knew of the conſpiracy, and made no diſcovery (3).

Embaſſadors from Scotland. p. 427. Camden. Stow.

The earl of Mar and lord Kinloſs, the Scotiſh ambaſſadors, arrived to late, when Eſſex was in cuſtody. It is well known, on what account the earl of Eſſex had required them, but we are ignorant of the inſtructions given them by King James concerning the plot. Nevertheleſs, it may with good probability be inſerted from Eſſex's propoſal, and the arrival of theſe embaſſadors juſt as the conſpiracy took vent, that Scotiſh King was not againſt it. Howſoever this be, theſe embaſſadors confined themſelves to congratulate her Majeſty on the diſcovery of ſo dangerous a plot: to demand the puniſhment of one Valentine Thomas, who in 1568 had accuſed their maſter of ill deſigns againſt the Queen, for which he was now in priſon: to complain that two Engliſh fugitives had been by ſtratagem drawn out of Scotland, whither they had fled for protection: and laſtly, to demand the aſſignment of ſome lands in England for the King their maſter (4). Elizabeth, without taking notice of what ſhe knew, replied; ſhe very kindly received the King's congratulation, and wiſhed that no ſuch thing might ever happen in his kingdom: that ſhe had not put to death the ſaid Valentine purpoſely to ſhew how little ſhe credited his depoſition: that the two fugitives had been adroitly recovered by the warden of the March, who was faulty in ſuffering them to eſcape, and that ſhe was aſtoniſhed the King of Scotland ſhould demand them, ſince to protect the ſeditious ſubjects of another Prince, was teaching his own to rebel, that as to aſſigning the ſpecified lands ſhe had given a ſufficient anſwer before; however, ſhe would make a yearly augmentation of two thouſand pounds, provided he would ſincerely maintain their mutual friendſhip, without ſuffering himſelf to be influenced by ſuch as ſought their own private advantage in the public calamities.

The Queen's anſwer.

The ſiege of Oſtend, commenced this year in July, furniſhed copious matter for a hiſtory of the Netherlands. Sir Francis Vere, the firſt governor during this ſiege, and the Engliſh troops which ſerved under him, ſignaliſed themſelves very gallantly, and were a great honor to their nation (5).

Oſtend beſieged. Grotius. Camden.

Henry IV came to Calais in Auguſt, as if to take a nearer view of what paſſed at the ſiege; and this gave the archduke ſome uneaſineſs: but this journey was not ſo much to obſerve the ſiege, as to confer more commodiouſly with Elizabeth on his project againſt the houſe of Auſtria. Mezerai pretends, Elizabeth firſt conceived this deſign, and earneſtly deſired to confer in perſon with Henry, in a veſſel between Dover and Calais: but I cannot readily believe that at her age, and iſſueleſs as ſhe was, that provident Queen would form a deſign of this nature, the execution whereof required much time and expenſe. I ſtill leſs believe, that ſhe would have expoſed herſelf to the dangers of the ſea, to confer with Henry, whom for ſome time ſhe had neither valued nor truſted. It is more probable this Prince, meditating then the deſign which he would have afterwards executed, was deſirous to engage Elizabeth in it. The Engliſh hiſtorians only ſay, that the Queen hearing of King Henry's arrival at Calais, ſent ſir Thomas Edmunds to compliment him in her name, and that in return, Henry ſent marſhal Biron, and count D'Auvergne, with duke D'Aumont, who were very graciouſly received. Mezerai adds, that Elizabeth ſhewed theſe French lords Eſſex's ſcull in her cabinet: but Camden has confuted this in his Annals, by affirming, the head was buried with the body. He ſays only, that the Queen, ſpeaking to marſhal Biron concerning the earl of Eſſex, told him, that it was her advice to the King of France, never to ſpare the heads of thoſe who attempted to diſturb his tranquillity.

Monopolies complained of. D'ewes, p. 597, &c. Townſhend. p. 192. &c.

The parliament meeting in October, great complaints were made in the lower-houſe, concerning ſeveral monopolies authoriſed by the Queen's letters-patent, which gave private perſons the ſole privilege of ſelling certain commodities, excluſively of all others. Elizabeth being informed, that the commons conſidered theſe monopolies as ſo many infringements on her ſubjects privileges, annulled moſt of theſe grants, and left the reſt to be tried juridically. This procedure, even before ſhe had been addreſſed, was ſo pleaſing to the commons, that a hundred and forty of their members were appointed to wait on her with their thanks. She neglected not this opportunity of teſtifying to the houſe her great affection for her people. When ſhe had received the ſaid deputies compliment, ſhe returned the following anſwer.

The Queen annuls them.

She is thanked by the commons. Camden.

GENTLEMEN.

Her ſpeech to the commons deputies.

"I Owe you hearty thanks and commendations for your ſingular good will towards me, not only in your hearts and thoughts, but which you have openly expreſſed and declared, whereby you have recalled me from an error proceeding from my ignorance, not my will. Theſe things had undeſervedly turned to my diſgrace (to whom nothing is more dear than the ſafety and love of my people) had not ſuch harpies and horſe-leaches as theſe been made known and diſcovered to me by you. I had rather my heart or hand ſhould periſh, than that either my heart or hand ſhould allow ſuch privileges to monopoliſts as may be prejudicial to my people. The ſplendor of regal majeſty hath not ſo blinded mine eyes, that lincencious power ſhould prevail with me more than juſtice. The glory of the name of a King may deceive Princes who know not how to rule, as gilded pills may deceive a ſick patient. But I am none of thoſe Princes: for I know that the common-wealth is to be governed for the good and advantage of thoſe who are commited to me, not of my ſelf to whom it is intruſted; and that account is one day to be given before another judgment-ſeat. I think my ſelf moſt happy, that by God's aſſiſtance I have hitherto ſo proſperouſly governed the common-wealth in all reſpects; and that I have ſuch ſubjects as, for their good, I would willingly leave both kingdom and life alſo. I beſeech you, that whatever miſdemeanors and miſcarriages others are guilty of, by their falſe ſuggeſtions, may not be imputed ſo me: let the teſtimony of a clear conſcience intirely in all reſpects excuſe me. You are not ignorant, that Princes ſervants are oftentimes too much ſet upon their own private advantage; that the truth is frequently concealed from Princes, and they cannot themſelves look narrowly into all things, upon whoſe ſhoulders lieth continually the heavy weight of the greateſt and moſt important affairs.

Elizabeth had the good fortune to be believed when ſhe ſpoke in this manner, becauſe in reality the Engliſh, under her reign, were the happieſt people in the whole univerſe. They ſaw no deſigns upon their liberties, nor any infringement on their privileges incouraged. Juſtice was adminiſtered impartially, the crown-revenues, and the ſubſidies, granted by parliament for the public occaſions, were not vainly laviſhed. They had therefore reaſon to think their Sovereign truly loved them, ſince ſhe made them injoy ſuch ſingular felicities (1). Some of this illuſtrious Queen's ſucceſſors have talked in the ſame manner to their parliaments, nay, it is in great meaſure become cuſtomary: but they have not all gained the ſame credit, becauſe it is not words but deeds which perſuade. Nor did this terminate only in reciprocal compliments. The commons, willing to ſhew their gratitude to their benevolent Princeſs, granted her the largeſt ſubſidy they had ever given ſince her reign commenced. Happy are ſuch of the Kings of England as, by a free and ſincere conduct, wiſely preſerve ſo good a correſpondence between them and their parliaments.

The war in Ireland was carried on this year more ſucceſsfully than in the two former. The rebels however received from Spain ſuccors under command of Don Juan de Aguilar, who landed at Kingſale, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the town. He inſtantly publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that Elizabeth being rightfully depoſed by his Holineſs, her ſubjects were abſolved from their oath of allegiance, and he was come to deliver Ireland from the jaws of the devil. But inſtead of making the progreſs he expected, he found himſelf beſieged in Kingſale, by the lord deputy. The earl of Tir-oen ſoon after advancing towards the Engliſh to raiſe the ſiege, was utterly routed, after which the Spaniſh general was forced to capitulate. He was permited to retire with his forces into Spain, having firſt ſurrendered the forts he had taken. This capitulation was ſigned the ſecond of January 1602. During this winter's reſidue, the lord-deputy had ſuch ſucceſs againſt the rebels, that Tir-oen affairs were reduced to a very indifferent ſituation.

AN' 1602.

Mean while Elizabeth, to divert the Spaniards from making freſh attemps upon Ireland, armed eight large ſhips, with ſome others of ſmaller burden, under conduct of ſir Richard Leviſon and ſir William Monſon. Theſe two commanders being ſeparated, Leviſon met with thirty eight Spaniſh veſſels coming from Weſt-India, and attacked them, but without ſucceſs. Monſon joining him ſome time after, they together ſet upon a huge carac of ſixteen hundred tons, richly laden from Eaſt-India, and which lay under the caſtle of Zizambra in Portugal, where ſhe was guarded by eleven gallies commanded by Spinola. Notwithſtandig the difficulty of this enterpriſe, they attacked the carac, and diſperſing the gallies took that rich prize, valued at a million of ducats, and, with the loſs of only twelve men, brought it ſafe to England.

In September following, Spinola, with ſix gallies he had ſaved, ſailing for Flanders, met in the channel ſome Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, with whom he had a ſmart ingagement. Two of his gallies were ſunk, one taken, and with the other three he retired into Sluys.

Gallies taken by the Engliſh.

This ſame year, happened a furious conteſt in England between the Jeſuits and the Secular prieſts. Theſe accuſed the Jeſuits of being the ſole cauſe of the ſevere laws inacted againſt Catholics, becauſe they had been concerned in all the conſpiracies, and had even ſuborned villains to aſſaſſinate her Majeſty.

Quarrel between the Jeſuits and Secular prieſts. Camden.

(1) Sir Robert Naunton partly aſcribes the cauſe of this mutual love, between the Queen and her parliaments, to the choice of parliament-men. For, ſays he, I find not that they were at any time given to any violent or pertinacious diſpute, elections being made of grave and diſcreet perſons, not factious and ambitious of fame; ſuch as came not to the houſe with a malevolent ſpirit of contention, but with a preparation to conſult on the public good, Frag. Reg. p. 14.

ELIZAB. AN' 1602.

When this quarrel was at the height, Elizabeth had intelligence, that the Jeſuits, and ſuch of the Secular prieſts as eſpouſed their principles and party, were hatching ſomewhat againſt the government. Thereupon ſhe baniſhed them the realm by proclamation, prohibiting, under pain of immediate death, their ever returning to England. The other Secular prieſts, who adhered not to the Jeſuits, were alſo liable to a like penalty, in caſe they refuſed taking the oath of allegiance.

Proclamation againſt the Jeſuits. Rym Fœd Vol. XVI. p. 473, 489.

It was alſo in the courſe of this year, that King Henry IV of France cauſed marſhal Biron's head to be ſtruck off, for conſpiring with others to diſmember the Gallic monarchy. This marſhal had been his right hand, while his affairs were in a bad poſture: but ſince the pacification with Spain, he thought the beſt way to procure quiet was to gain by favors ſuch of the French nobility as had moſt oppoſed him. This could not be effected without neglecting his old friends, and thence aroſe the plot whereof marſhal Biron was principal. His accomplices, as count D'Auvergne, and ſome others, eaſily obtained their pardon. But marſhal Bouillon, who was alſo of the number, deemed it ſafeſt to withdraw into Germany, whence he wrote to Elizabeth, praying her to interceed in his behalf. King Henry likewiſe wrote to her, acquainting her with the conſpiracy, and aſking her advice concerning marſhal Bouillon. Her Majeſty replied, ſhe could not adviſe him, 'till ſhe knew certainly if the marſhal was guilty: ſhe warned him alſo, to take care it was not a Spaniſh artifice to make him entertain ſuſpicions of his beſt ſubjects. But Henry, not conſidering the marſhal as ſuch, told the Engliſh embaſſador, that the Queen his miſtreſs had a better opinion of Bouillon than he deſerved, ſince it was certain he was deeply concerned in Eſſex's plot, and had not even diſowned it.

Tir-oen's affairs in Ireland daily declined. The lord deputy having cloſely purſued him, without giving him any reſpite, even to the places where he judged himſelf ſecureſt, finally conſtrained that rebel to caſt himſelf on the Queen's mercy; but would not receive his ſubmiſſion without expreſs order from court. The order coming at laſt, the earl of Tir-oen ſurrendered to the lord-deputy, who determined on conducting him over to England and preſenting him to her Majeſty.

AN' 1603.

Near the cloſe of January 1603, Elizabeth began to feel the firſt attacks of a diſtemper which not long after laid her in the earth. Her being obliged to have a ring ſhe wore on her finger filed off, was conſidered as a bad omen, becauſe ſhe was wont to ſay, with that ring ſhe had been married to her people. As ſhe was now well advanced in years, it was readily conjectured ſhe would not recover. Accordingly, ſome time before her death, ſhe had the mortification to ſee herſelf forſaken by moſt of her creatures, who ſtrove with emulation to court the favor of the Scotiſh King, her preſumptive ſucceſſor. This threw her into a melancholy, the cauſe whereof could not poſſibly be concealed, eſpecially as it was openly talked of ſending for King James before ſhe expired. In the begining of March, ſhe was ſeized with a heavineſs in all her limbs, which rendered her motionleſs, and even made her ſpeak with much difficulty. This was attended with great frowardneſs, ſo that ſhe could not bear any one near her but the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who comforted her, and joined with her in prayer. In ſhort, when ſhe was perceived approaching her laſt hour, the council ſent the lord admiral, the lord privy-ſeal and the ſecretary, to pray her to name her ſucceſſor. She faintly anſwered, "That ſhe had always ſaid, her throne was the "throne of Kings, and ſhe would have no mean "perſon to ſucceed her." The ſecretary repreſenting to her, that theſe words were very obſcure, and the counſel deſired ſhe would declare her pleaſure in plainer terms, "I will (ſaid ſhe) that a King "ſucceed me: and who ſhould that be but my "neareſt kinſman, the King of Scots?" Then being admoniſhed by the archbiſhop to fix her thoughts upon God, "That I do (ſaid ſhe) neither doth my "mind wander from him at all." When ſhe could no longer pray with her tongue, ſhe lifted up her hands and eyes heaven-wards, and giving ſome other ſigns of her confidence in God's mercy, ſhe expired on the twenty-fourth of March, Old Style, in the ſeventieth year of her age, and the forty-fourth of her reign (1).

Elizabeth's death. Camden.

To diſplay in few words the elogy of this illuſtrious Queen, it ſeems to be ſufficient to obſerve, that her name is ſtill of bleſſed memory with the Engliſh, now when flattery cannot be ſuppoſed to have any ſhare in the veneration they pay her: but Elizabeth was the perſon who baniſhed Popery from England and reſtored the Reformation. This alone was the cauſe why two parties have been formed on her account, mutually taxing each other with flattery or rancor. The Proteſtants, conſidering that this Queen was the ſole bulwark of their religion, which probably without her would have been deſtroyed in England, Scotland, Ireland, and poſſibly even in France and the Netherlands, cannot forbear beſtowing on her high commendations, and feel themſelves inclined to excuſe her failings. For the ſame reaſon, the Romaniſts regard her with a quite different eye; nay, ſome have not ſcrupled painting her in the blackeſt colors, and giving her the moſt odious epithets. This makes it impoſſible to draw up for her a character which ſhall give univerſal ſatisfaction: wherefore I ſhall content myſelf with making ſome reflections, which will aſſiſt thoſe who ſeek only truth, to paſs on this famous Queen impartial judgment, free from party-paſſion and prejudice.

Her character.

Elizabeth had a large portion of ſenſe, and a judgment naturally ſound and ſolid: this appeared in her whole conduct, from the begining to the end of her reign. Nothing better manifeſts her capacity, than her addreſs in ſurmounting the difficulties and troubles created by her enemies, eſpecially when it is conſidered what theſe enemies were, the moſt powerful, the moſt artful, the moſt ſubtil, and the leaſt ſcrupulous in Europe (2). The bare naming them is a ſufficient demonſtration. The court of Rome under ſeveral Popes, Philip II King of Spain, the Duke of Alva, Henry II and Charles IX Kings of France, Catherine di Medicis, the duke of Guiſe, the cardinal of Lorrain, Mary Queen of Scots, all the Romiſh clergy, and particularly the Jeſuits. Had her forces been proportionable to thoſe of her adverſaries when united, there would be nothing very extraordinary: ſtrength often ſupplies the want of capacity. But in what manner did ſhe withſtand ſo potent, ſo formidable enemies? It was by two or three maxims which ſhe made the rule of her conduct, and from which ſhe never ſwerved: "To make herſelf beloved by "her people: to be frugal of her treaſure: to "cheriſh diſſenſion among her neighbors." If circumſtances be rightly conſidered, ſhe had no other way to ſecure herſelf. It cannot therefore be denied, that this is a clear evidence of her ability: but as that was never queſtioned, it is not what I am chiefly to deſcribe. On the contrary, her enemies have thence taken occaſion to defame her, by repreſenting as vices diſguiſed what her friends extol as ſo many virtues. They pretend, that her ability conſiſted wholly in a moſt exquiſite diſſimulation, and a profound hypocriſy: in a word, they ſay, ſhe was a perfect comedian. As to myſelf, I pretend not to deny that ſhe made great uſe of diſſimulation, as well to the courts of France and Spain, as to the Queen of Scotland and the Scots: this would be denying a manifeſt truth: the Pope's was the only court with which ſhe never diſſembled. I am alſo perſuaded that, being ſo much concerned to gain the love and eſteem of her ſubjects, ſhe affected to ſpeak frequently and with exageration of her tenderneſs for them, and deſired to have it believed that ſhe did, thro' exceſſive love for her people, things wherein her own intereſt was moſtly concerned: but the queſtion is to know, whether in her circumſtances her diſſimulation was blameable. What injury was it to her ſubjects to indeavor to perſuade them, ſhe dearly loved them, ſince ſhe actually and really did whatever was neceſſary to convince them? As to foreigners, it muſt be carefully obſerved, that her diſſimulation and artifices tended not to invade their poſſeſſions, but to preſerve her own. Her enemies frequently attempted to deprive her both of crown and life, and ſhe ſaved both by her policy and diſſimulation. Where is the hurt of ſuch a conduct? Can the diſſimulation and artifices which aim only at ſelf-preſervation be, without extreme prejudice, confounded with the diſſimulation and artifices which tend to ſurpriſe the innocent, and invade the property of others; can theſe, I ſay, be conſidered upon the ſame foot? For my own part, I am ſo far from looking on this kind of diſſembling as any blemiſh to Elizabeth's reputation, that I am rather of opinion, it ought to be reckoned among her commendable qualities.

Her diſſimulation.

Of her avarice. Oſborn.

Avarice is another failing, imputed to her even by her friends. I will not gainſay her having been ſomewhat too penurious, and that, on certain occaſions, ſhe adhered too cloſely to her maxim, not to be at any expenſe but what was abſolutely neceſſary. Nevertheleſs, I in general maintain, that her circumſtances required her, if not to be covetous, at leaſt not to part with her money but with the greateſt caution, both to preſerve her peoples affection, and inable her to repulſe her adverſaries. After all, whom did ſhe prejudice by her great frugality? A dozen of ravenous courtiers, who very gladly would have had her laviſh her treaſure, as did the King her father in the begining of his reign. As for the reſt of her ſubjects, inſtead of having cauſe to complain of this pretended avarice, they had reaſon to be pleaſed with it, ſince it conſiſted not in ſpoiling them of their property by illegal methods, as Henry VII, her grandfather, had done, but in prudently managing her revenues, and conſequently their own (1).

Slanders on her chaſtity.

She is likewiſe accuſed of not being ſo chaſte as ſhe affected to appear: nay, ſome pretend, there are now in England the deſcendants of a daughter ſhe had by the earl of Leiceſter. But as hitherto no proof of this accuſation has been produced, it may be ſafely reckoned among the calumnies wherewith her reputation has been attacked, as well during her life as ſince her deceaſe.

ELIZAB. AN' 1603.

Reflections on the Scotiſh Queen's death.

It is not eaſy to juſtify her concerning Queen Mary of Scotland. Here it muſt freely be owned, that ſhe ſacrificed equity, juſtice, and perhaps her own conſcience, to her ſafety. If Mary was guilty of her huſband's murder, as there is reaſon to believe, it belonged not to Elizabeth to puniſh her: nor in reality did ſhe on that account deprive her of life, but ſhe uſed that pretext to detain her in priſon, under the fallacious excuſe of manifeſting her innocence. On this occaſion her diſſimulation was truly cenſurable. This firſt injuſtice ingaged her afterwards to uſe numberleſs arts and devices to have a pretenſe to perpetuate the unhappy Queen's impriſonment. Hence finally aroſe the fatal neceſſity of bringing her to the ſcaffold. Then, this exceſs of violence gave birth to more artifices and acts of diſſimulation to juſtify herſelf, and throw the blame on a very innocent perſon. This is indiſputably a great ſtain on Elizabeth's character, and which manifeſtly proves to what height ſhe carried the fear of loſing a tottering crown. This continual apprehenſion is what characteriſes her reign, becauſe it was the ſpring of almoſt all her actions. All can be ſaid for Elizabeth is, that Mary and her partiſans had brought matters to ſuch a point, that one of the two Queens was to periſh, and it was natural for the weakeſt to fall: but this excuſes not Elizabeth's injuſtice to Mary in detaining her a priſoner, which injuſtice had no other foundation than Elizabeth's fear concerning her crown.

Of Elizabeth's religion.

I come now to Elizabeth's religion. I believe her being truly a Proteſtant was not ever queſtioned: but, as it was her intereſt to be ſo, ſome have taken occaſion to doubt, whether the zeal ſhe expreſſed for her religion was the effect of her real perſuaſion or policy. What may have occaſioned this doubt is, that it clearly appears, in her hiſtory, that, in aſſiſting the Proteſtants of France and the Netherlands, as well as thoſe of Scotland, ſhe had only temporal views, namely, her own ſafety and defenſe againſt menaced invaſions: but it cannot thence be infered ſhe was not a good Proteſtant, or had no religion at all, it not being any way impoſſible that her religion ſhould agree with her temporal intereſt. All can be alledged is, that ſhe ſometimes prefered her temporal before her religious concerns.

Of her perſecuting the Papiſts;

She is virulently charged with perſecuting the Catholics, and puting to death many. Very true it is that ſome ſuffered death in her reign: but we may venture to affirm, that none were puniſhed but for conſpiring againſt the Queen or ſtate, or for attempting to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion in England, and by violent methods re-eſtabliſh Popery. The Catholics who lived peaceably were tolerated, tho' with ſome reſtraint as to the exerciſe of their religion, but with none as to their conſciences. If this may be termed perſecution, what name ſhall be given to the Proteſtants ſufferings under Mary (2)?

and the Puritans.

The Preſbyterians think alſo, they have reaſon to complain of the ſtatute inacted in this reign, which deprived them of liberty of conſcience, tho' they were Proteſtants. I ſhall not take upon me to determine, whether they had cauſe to complain of Elizabeth's juſt praiſe.

To ſum up in very few words what may ſerve to form Elizabeth's character, I ſhall add, that ſhe was a good and illuſtrious Queen, with many virtues and noble qualities, and few faults. But what ſhe ought above all things to be eſteemed for is, that ſhe made the Engliſh injoy a felicity unknown to their anceſtors, under moſt of the Kings her predeceſſors. JAMES I. Firſt Monarch of Great Britain, and twenty-fourth King of England ſince the Conquest.

The council proclaim James I. March 24. Wilſon. Stow.

NO ſooner had Queen Elizabeth breathed her laſt, but the council met to conſult what meaſures were to be taken in the preſent juncture. Elizabeth, who had delayed naming her ſucceſſor 'till the ultimate period of her life, finally declared the King of Scotland was, next herſelf, to aſcend the Engliſh throne; nor was it doubted but her will agreed with this declaration: ſo the council deemed it neceſſary to be previouſly aſcertained by peruſing the deceaſed Queen's teſtament, which was immediately opened, and found to confirm what ſhe had verbally declared. The Scotiſh King had therefore in his perſon a threefold right, which rendered his title indiſputable. The firſt was what is in England termed a Parliamentary Right, which derived its validity from the act of parliament ſecuring the crown to Henry VII, and his heirs. The ſecond was Hereditary Right; for this Prince was the neareſt relative, and natural heir to Elizabeth. Theſe two rights were farther corroborated by her ſaid late Majeſty's will, which made the third. Wherefore the council readily judged he ought to be acknowledged for King of England. This reſolution being imparted to the lord-mayor of London, the new King was proclaimed, by the ſtile of James I, ſix hours after the Queen's demiſe.

James informed of his acceſſion to the crown of England. Stow. Welden.

Tho' the council had been careful to ſend the King the news of his acceſſion to the crown of England, ſir Robert Carey, lord Hunſdon's youngeſt ſon, found means to be before them. James, who impatiently expected theſe tidings, did however receive them without changing countenance, the Queen's indiſpoſition affording him time to be compoſed whenever the news ſhould arrive: nevertheleſs, he could not forbear lifting up his eyes towards Heaven, ſeemingly to thank God for the favor he had ſo impatiently expected. Elizabeth would never poſitively declare ſhe intended to nominate him her ſucceſſor. She contented herſelf with keeping him in hope, but in ſuch a manner that ſhe ſeemed to reſerve the power of depriving him of the ſucceſſion, if ſhe diſliked his conduct. James's correſpondence with the earl of Eſſex, which, tho' connived at, was not unknown to the Engliſh court, might give him ſome apprehenſions: beſide, Elizabeth never loved him; whether becauſe he was ſon of her mortal enemy, or had expreſſed too much impatience to poſſeſs the crown of England, or, in fine, on account of his inclination to the Papiſts. All theſe reaſons made this Prince very uneaſy under the expectation of a crown to which his birth intitled him, but which he might notwithſtanding have miſſed, had Elizabeth been pleaſed to take meaſures for his deprivation: wherefore the news of that Queen's death could not but be agreeable to him, ſince, by his correſpondence with one of the chief miniſters, he was aſſured ſhe had done nothing to his prejudice. James I. An' 1603. Du Cheſne Hiſt. d'Angleterre.

Preſently after Carey's arrival, came ſir Charles Percy and Thomas Somerſet, who, by the Engliſh council's order, notified to him her Majeſty's demiſe, and the council's diligence in proclaiming him (1). Theſe were followed by ſir Thomas Lake, who was ſent by the council to inform him of the kingdom's ſtate and condition. Stow. Spotſwood.

While the news of King James's acceſſion to the crown was haſtening to Scotland, the Engliſh were reflecting on the alterations which Queen Elizabeth's death was like to produce. The people in general lamented the loſs of their Queen. They had been happy under her, and were not ſure their happineſs would continue in the new reign. A King of Scotland on the throne of England, was in general no pleaſing object: beſide, ſince James was paſſed his minority, he had not given of himſelf any very advantageous idea. his favorites; inclination to the Papiſts, whereof he had, on diverſe occaſions, given viſible marks; all theſe, I ſay, were not qualities apt to prepoſſeſs the Engliſh in his favor. It was however hoped, he would tread in the ſteps of the illuſtrious Queen, his immediate predeceſſor; that being judged the beſt courſe he could follow: and what is deſired, is readily credited. As for the deceaſed Queen's miniſters and courtiers, the good and welfare of the realm was what leaſt affected them: every one was wholly intent on gaining favor with the ſucceſſor. Towards the cloſe of the late reign, there were two factions at court, the one conſiſting of Eſſex's friends, and the other of his enemies. The firſt was intirely humbled by the death of that earl; and the other had ſo far the aſcendant, that they abſolutely ruled in the council. Sir Robert Cecil, ſecretary of ſtate, and the late lord-treaſurer's ſecond ſon, was at the head of this party: but this politic courtier, foreſeeing that on Queen Elizabeth's deceaſe his party muſt inevitably ſink, King James, conſidering the earl of Eſſex as his martyr, had taken timely meaſures for his ſupport. Before her late Majeſty's death, he had devoted himſelf to the King of Scotland, and held a private correſpondence to inform him of what paſſed at court; by which means he had ſecured that Prince's favor, tho' it was not without danger of loſing the Queen's, had ſhe been informed of his intrigues (1). He was the only man of his party who had gained the new King's good graces, which he ſo artfully cultivated, that he ſoon became his prime miniſter.

The hopes and fears of the Engliſh with regard to religion. Speed.

There was likewiſe another particular which ingaged the attention of the Engliſh, viz. Religion. James's deportment in Scotland gave occaſion for ſundry reflections, which kept people in uncertainty, none knowing poſitively what was to be hoped or feared. This King was born of Romiſh parents, but being taken from his mother in his infancy, had been educated in the Proteſtant religion, and always profeſſed it. On the other hand, the religion he had been brought up in, tho' Proteſtant, was ſomewhat different from the religion eſtabliſhed in England, if not in doctrine, at leaſt in diſcipline, and ſome other points of external worſhip, which were conſidered by the two churches as very important; in a word, it was the Preſbyterian or Puritanical religion: yet had this Prince, on numberleſs occaſions, made evident that he was far from being Popery's adverſary. All this formed a certain contraſt, which bred a ſuſpenſe almoſt univerſal. The Catholics hoped to find under his government gentler treatment, and more indulgence than under Elizabeth; nay, they carried their expectations much farther. The Preſbyterians flattered themſelves, that James, who had been educated in their perſuaſion, would promote reforming the Engliſh church upon the plan of the Scotiſh kirk, and hoped ſpeedily to ſee the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy's overthrow. Laſtly, thoſe of the church of England thought to have reaſon to expect that the new King would conform to their religion, ſince it was eſtabliſhed by law: nevertheleſs, the hopes of all three parties could not but be mixed with fears, ſince the King had not yet declared. Such were the ſentiments of the Engliſh concerning their new King, whom as yet they knew only by report.

James ſets out for England. Stow. p. 819, &c. Spotſwood. Weldon.

Soon as James was, by thoſe diſpatched from the council of England, informed of his being proclaimed, he ſent away Aſton, to acquaint the privy counſellors, that he was preparing for his journey, and accordingly he left Scotland the fifth of April, eleven days after Elizabeth's death. The chief Scotiſh grandees, by whom he was attended into England, were the duke of Lenox, the earl of Mar, lords Hume and Kinlaſs, with ſeveral others of leſs diſtinction, but who afterwards were promoted to Engliſh honors and dignities. He imployed more than a month in his journey from Edinburg to London, where he arrived the ſeventh of May. He had no ſooner entered England, but the people ſtrove to demonſtrate their reſpect by magnificent entertainments in all the towns thro' which he paſſed. Such were their acclamations, their wiſhes for his proſperity, their praiſes and joy for his arrival, that a certain honeſt Scot could not refrain crying out, "This people will ſpoil a gude King." Mean while, the multitudes which flocked from all parts to behold their new Sovereign, grew at laſt ſo troubleſome to him, that he was forced to ſet bounds to their curioſity by a proclamation. This greatly ſurpriſed the populace, who comprehended not, why a little inconveniency ſhould hinder his Majeſty's receiving the reſpects of his new ſubjects. But perhaps this was owing to James's apprehenſion leſt, among the croud, ſome aſſaſſin might lurk and attempt his life; perhaps, likewiſe, he was deſirous of accuſtoming his vaſſals not to be too familiar with their Sovereign. Howſoever this be, it prevented not peoples paying him every where due reſpect, in beholding and expreſſing much ſatisfaction in ſeeing him paſs in order to aſcend the throne.

Proclamation to hinder the people from flocking to him. R. Coke's Detec.

At York, moſt of the Engliſh peerage did him homage. Among theſe was ſecretary Cecil, who was generally conſidered as a diſgraced miniſter, becauſe he had been Eſſex's declared enemy: but great was the ſurpriſe, when the King received him with extraordinary tokens of favor and eſteem. This gave room to ſuſpect he had already taken care to gain his favor, and the King's behavior to him afterwards confirmed the ſuſpicion. Some tax this miniſter with inſpiring King James with the deſign of ſeting himſelf above the laws, and not ſuffering the parliament to ſhare with him the ſupreme authority: it is at leaſt certain that James's chief care, after his acceſſion, was to maintain the prerogative royal in its utmoſt extent, nay to carry it higher than any of his predeceſſors. He muſt, at the time I am now ſpeaking of, have formed a vaſter idea than had been hitherto conceived of a King of England's power, ſince on his arrival at Newark he, by his ſole warrant, and without the leaſt juridical formality, cauſed a cut-purſe to be hanged. It cannot be denied that this exceeded the legal power of a King of England, and was directly contrary to the Engliſh nation's privileges: very probably, care was taken to warn him of the ill effects ſuch arbitrary doings might produce among the people, ſince he refrained from them ever after.

On the third of May, he came to Theobald's, ſecretary Cecil's houſe (2), where he ſtayed ſome days. (1) The perſon who managed Cecil's correſpondence at the court of Scotland, was Bruce, a younger brother of a noble family in Scotland, who carried the matter with ſuch addreſs and ſecreſy, that all the great men in England, without knowing of each others doing it, and without the Queen's ſuſpecting any, ſigned in writing an ingagement to aſſert and ſtand by the King of Scots right of ſucceſſion. continue every man in his ſtation. However, at his coming to Theobald's, he increaſed their number with ſeveral others, moſt of whom were Scots; his deſign being, as he afterwards more manifeſtly evidenced, to make but one kingdom of England and Scotland. The new Scotiſh counſellors were the duke of Lenox, the earl of Mar, lord Hume and ſir James Elphinſtone *. He likewiſe nominated two Engliſh noblemen, viz. lords Zouch and Burleigh, ſecretary Cecil's eldeſt brother. I alſo find that, at the ſame time or preſently after, he admited into his council the earls of Northumberland and Cumberland (1) lords Thomas and Henry Howard (the late duke of Norfolk's ſon and brother) of whom the firſt was a ſuſpected, the latter a known Papiſt, tho' on the King's arrival he had imbraced the Proteſtant creed. James's gratitude to the Howard-family, diſgraced under the late reign for the Queen his mother's ſake, did not ſtop there. Lord Thomas was created earl of Suffolk, and then lord-treaſurer; and lord Henry was made ſome years after earl of Northampton: moreover, Philip earl of Arundel, the late duke of Norfolk's eldeſt ſon, having loſt his title by being condemned, tho' Elizabeth pardoned him, his ſon Thomas was, by the new King, created earl of Arundel and Surrey. Thus did James's regard for the duke of Norfolk's family clearly manifeſt what he thought of Elizabeth's treatment of that duke and his houſe. Nor was it in this alone that he expreſſed reſentment againſt his ſaid predeceſſor. On all occaſions he affected making appear, that it was purely thro' policy that he had concealed his averſion for her while living. Of this the moſt notable mark he gave was, his neither going into mourning himſelf, nor admiting any perſon to his preſenſe in a mourning-habit.

Laviſh of honors and dignities. Wilſon. Stow. Weldon.

From James's ſeting foot in England, to his departure from Theobald's, he made about two hundred knights, and ſome days after his arrival at London, he made abundance more. As Elizabeth had been very ſparing in diſtribution of honors, wherewith Sovereigns are wont to reward the merit and ſervices of their ſubjects, her ſucceſſor on the contrary beſtowed them with a liberal, or rather profuſe hand. Never had the like number of knights, barons, and earls been made in any former reign. This occaſioned a ſatirical libel, intituled, "A help for weak memories to retain the "names of the nobility (2):" the truth is, James created ſuch numbers of knights and peers, particularly in the firſt years of his reign, that ſuch a help was very neceſſary. It is in reality pretended, the current of honor was ſo obſtructed during Elizabeth's reign, that ſcarce a county had knights enough to form a jury (3).

Beſide the three Howards, Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurſt and high-treaſurer, was made earl of Dorſet; ſir Robert Cecil was at firſt created baron of Eſſingdon, then viſcount Cranburne, and laſtly earl of Saliſbury; and Philip Herbert, the earl of Pembroke's brother, was made earl of Montgomery; I confine my ſelf to theſe, becauſe their names moſt frequently occur in the begining of this reign: I muſt alſo add, that the earl of Southampton, who had been ſentenced to death, and the earl of Eſſex's ſon, were reſtored to their eſtates and honors before the King reached London. But lords Grey, Cobham, Carew (4), and ſir Walter Ralegh, who had been Eſſex's enemies, were by his Majeſty very coldly received. Theſe four courtiers of Elizabeth had not a little contributed to the earl of Eſſex's ruin, as well as ſecretary Cecil; but this latter, as I obſerved, had wiſely anticipated himſelf in the King's good graces. Nothing could be a plainer evidence of James's conſidering the earl of Eſſex as his martyr, as he himſelf termed him, than the gracious reception he gave the earl of Southampton when he came to wait on him. This was publicly owning, that he approved thoſe two earls conſpiracy, the intent of which was to ſet him on the throne before Queen Elizabeth was dead. This gained him no credit with the diſintereſted: but, from that very inſtant, he began to liſten to the adulations of his courtiers, who raiſed even to the ſkies every one of his actions; all which was but too notorious during his whole reign.

His grand idea of regal power. R. Coke.

King James, with good natural parts, had a large ſhare of acquired knowledge. He was able to form the plan of a good government, with the general maxims whereof he was perfectly well acquainted: but his antipathy to war, a great weakneſs for his favorites, certain prejudices he had imbibed wherein all who approached his perſon helped to confirm him, ever prevented his reducing to practiſe his theory. He was perſuaded that the authority of Sovereigns over their ſubjects was unlimited, and that all monarchial government ought to be abſolute, without conſidering that theſe maxims could not be applied to the government of England, unleſs its very conſtitution were deſtroyed: moreover, he was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favor of his own parts and merit. Soon as his courtiers diſcovered his genius and character, they failed not attacking him in the moſt ſenſible part; that is, they took all occaſions to applaud his wiſdom, learning and capacity, and to talk in the higheſt ſtrain of regal prerogative. As this pleaſed him infinitely, ſo it was the beſt way to gain his favor. Hence aroſe diverſe expreſſions little known in preceding reigns, but which in this were common. His Majeſty was ſtiled, the Solomon of the age, and his Sacred Majeſty, and theſe ſycophantic titles, which he greedily ſwallowed, confirmed him more in his prejudices. Among other prepoſſeſſions, he had one which greatly influenced his whole adminiſtration; this was, he ſtrongly believed, he had acceded to the crown of England ſolely by hereditary right, and could not bear it ſhould be thought he was in the leaſt obliged to Queen Elizabeth, or that his title proceeded from any act of parliament. Had this been only a ſpeculative notion, it would not have much diſturbed the Engliſh: but he drew from this principle terrible conſequences, tending to no leſs than arbitrary power, and of courſe to the ſubverſion of the Engliſh conſtitution. From his being King by hereditary right he infered, that his will ought to be the ſole rule of government, and conſidered, as undeniable truths, all the wild aſſertions of certain writers concerning regal power. This pretended hereditary right, with its conſequences, were the fountain of thoſe diviſions which in this reign commenced between King and parliament, and which continued during the three ſubſequent reigns. This alſo gave birth to the Whig and Tory factions, who worry each other even to this day. It is therefore requiſite for the reader's information, to obſerve, before we proceed, that this hereditary right whereby James I pretended to reign, was not

JAMES I. AN' 1603.

Remarks on the Engliſh ſucceſſion.

ſo indiſputable as himſelf then did, and as many ſtill do imagine it.

Firſt, no law can be produced on which may be grounded the crown of England's hereditary ſucceſſion. Secondly, the Engliſh hiſtory abounds with precedents, ſhewing that the parliament aſſumed a power to diſpoſe of the crown, and ſettle the ſucceſſion without any regard to the next heir. Thirdly, ſince the conqueſt, more Kings have mounted the throne by virtue of acts of parliament, or ſome other means, than by hereditary right; the four firſt particularly, viz. William the Conqueror, William Rufus, Henry I, and Stephen, moſt certainly came not to the crown by this right: when was it then that the crown became hereditary? It belongs to thoſe who maintain this opinion, to point out the time. Fourthly, of all the Kings, from William the Conqueror to James I, not one had leſs right to the crown than Henry VII, before he was confirmed by parliament (1). It was therefore from the parliament's confirmation, rather than from Henry VII's hereditary right, that James could derive his own title. Laſtly, if ſome inſtances may be produced of Kings ſucceeding from father to ſon, and if it be thence infered to have been by hereditary right, it will alſo be eaſy to demonſtrate that this right vaniſhes when traced to its ſource. For example, if it be ſuppoſed that Elizabeth, Mary, Edward VI, and Henry VIII acceded to the crown by hereditary right, tho' there would be much to be ſaid concerning the two Queens, the fountain of this right ſprings from Henry VII, who was heir neither of the houſe of York, nor the houſe of Lancaſter. Henry VI and Henry V ſucceeded from father to ſon, to Henry IV, who was not Richard II's next heir. Edward III could not by hereditary right ſucceed his father Edward II, ſtill living. Edward II, Edward I, and Henry III, form the longeſt hereditary ſucceſſion, from father to ſon, occurring in the Engliſh hiſtory; but they derived their right from John Sans-terre (or without-land) who certainly was not Richard I's next heir. I paſs over in ſilence the former Kings, the caſe being too evident to need any farther explication. Thus, of twenty-three Kings, from the Conqueſt to James I, at leaſt the moiety aſcended not the throne by hereditary right. As for thoſe who ſucceeded from father to ſon, and may be ſuppoſed to have reigned by hereditary right, they could ſupport their right of ſucceſſion only by acts of parliament, adjudging the crown to ſome one of their anceſtors, contrary to hereditary right: How then can the hereditary ſucceſſion of the crown of England be indiſputably eſtabliſhed? From what has been ſaid it follows, that nothing is more uncertain than the right whereby the Kings of England reigned from the conqueſt to the time of James I, ſince it is not poſſible to lay down any undoubted principle upon this head. It is much eaſier to combat all the different opinions concerning the ſucceſſion, than eſtabliſh any one by ſolid and undeniable reaſons. I ſhall here, in confirmation of what I have advanced, ſubjoin, that the Kings who were deemed the ableſt and moſt prudent, were careful to have their titles confirmed by parliament, when they judged them liable to any objections. So, James I, in reſolving to eſtabliſh this pretended hereditary right, was the original author of the combuſtions wherewith England has been agitated, and which are not yet ceaſed.

JAMES I. AN' 1603.

The choice this King made of the miniſters who were to manage public affairs, contributed not a little towards cheriſhing the high conceit he had of his perſonal qualifications, and of the regal power. The firſt was ſir Robert Cecil, afterwards earl of Saliſbury. This miniſter, who had been Eſſex's ſworn enemy, knowing how deeply the new King was concerned in that earl's misfortune, found no better way to keep in his good graces than by perpetually flattering him, and making his court, by talking of monarchial government according to his natural ideas of it: he was at leaſt accuſed of inſpiring him with ſentiments very diſadvantageous to the people and parliament. He was in other reſpects a man of great genius, conſummate prudence, vaſt capacity, and perfectly well acquainted with the nation's ſtate and intereſt. The earls of Suffolk and Northampton (one lord-chamberlain, the other lord-keeper) were abundantly inferior to the earl of Saliſbury in parts and ability: but it is pretended they were internally Papiſts, and as Popery could not be otherwiſe re-eſtabliſhed in England than by arbitrary power, they eagerly labored to indulge the King in his notions concerning regal authority. To theſe three perſons James chiefly commited the management of affairs: all the other courtiers followed the ſame method, and emulouſly ſtrove to gain their Sovereign's favor by a blind ſubmiſſion to his pleaſure.

Soon after the King's arrival at London, he ſent into Scotland a numerous train of lords and ladies to attend his Queen and family, who were ready for their journey to the Engliſh court. While the royal family were on their journey, James recollected that he had complained to Elizabeth of Valentine Thomas, who had calumniated him, and was ſtill in priſon. It is not known wherein this calumny conſiſted; but whatſoever it was, about a month after the King's arrival, Thomas was brought on his trial, and hanged, for conſpiring againſt Elizabeth, and ſome of her council (3).

About the ſame time, and before Queen Ann's arrival, marquis Roſny came from his Gallic Majeſty, to congratulate King James on his acceſſion to the crown of England. He had expreſs orders, from the King his maſter, to appear with all his train in mourning, at his firſt audience: but he was told, he would diſoblige the King, who would doubtleſs regard this affectation as a reproach for not going himſelf into mourning for Queen Elizabeth. The marquis, in his memoirs, ſays, that King James, being at table, openly boaſted, that for diverſe years before Elizabeth's death, it was properly he who governed England, and that no reſolution was taken in council but by his direction. He would perhaps have been nearer the truth, had he ſaid, Elizabeth governed Scotland and himſelf too, without his perceiving it. The French King's deſign was not merely to congratulate the new King: his chief aim in ſending marquis Roſny, his favorite, was, to prevent James's being gained Count Aremberg, embaſſador from archduke Albert and the Infanta Iſabella, Sovereigns of the Netherlands, was come to London ſome time before, but was ſick, or feigned to be ſo, all the while marquis Roſny remained in England. It was not 'till after the marquis's departure, that he deſired King James to ſend one of his privy-council to hear the occaſion of his embaſſy. Cecil, whom the King choſe, was ſtrangely ſurpriſed to hear nothing from him but compliments. Very ſeemingly, this embaſſador was diſpatched over to England only to obſerve what paſſed, and to feel the new King's pulſe concerning a pacification between England and Spain. James had already manifeſted, by his proceedings, that he was inclined to peace, ſince, without any ſollicitation, he had revoked the letters of mark granted by Elizabeth to ſeveral private perſons. Some time after, Taxis came alſo to London from the King of Spain, and, having congratulated his Majeſty on his acceſſion to the crown, deſired commiſſioners might be appointed to treat with him of a peace. This negociation, which was then only begun, finally terminated in a pacific treaty, concluded in the inſuing year (1).

Plot diſcovered in favor of Arabella Stuart. Camden's Ann. Wilſon. Stow. Speed. Weldon.

While the court was at Wilton, a conſpiracy, or rather the project of a conſpiracy was diſcovered, the authors whereof were the lords Grey and Cobham, ſir Walter Ralegh, George Brook, Watſon and Clark, prieſts, and ſome others (2). The deſign was, to place on the throne Arabella Stuart, King James's couſin-german. To this end, lord Cobham was to treat with the archduke at Bruſſels, and try to obtain ſix hundred thouſand crowns, whereof Ralegh was to have ſeventy thouſand. Cobham was likewiſe to carry Arabella's letters to the archduke, the King of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, wherein ſhe ſhould promiſe to eſpouſe the perſon whom they ſhould nominate, and to grant a full toleration to the Catholics. It was farther agreed, that lord Grey * ſhould ſollicit his Majeſty's permiſſion to levy two thouſand men for the ſervice of Holland, and with theſe troops ſhould ſeize his perſon: but this was only a project wholly unexecuted, except that ſome of the conſpirators had confered with count Aremberg. It is preſumed that the count contrived this plot merely to deſtroy Ralegh, who of all the men in England, was moſt dreaded by the Spaniards, and that afterwards he himſelf informed the King of it (3). However this be, the conſpirators being apprehended, were tried at Winchester, in November following, and condemned to die. Ralegh was found guilty on the written evidence of a ſingle witneſs, namely, lord Cobham, even without being confronted, contrary to the expreſs law of the land (4). Nevertheleſs, only George Brook, lord Cobham's brother, and the two prieſts were executed, the King having ordered the others being remanded to priſon, but without giving them a pardon. Lord Grey died ſoon after, and lord Cobham finally obtained his liberty (5). But ſir Walter Ralegh remained twelve years in the Tower, where he wrote a Hiſtory of the World, much eſteemed in England. I ſhall in the courſe of this reign have farther occaſion to bring him on the ſtage.

Not long after this plot was diſcovered, the King and Queen were crowned at Weſtminſter, with the uſual ſolemnity, on the twenty-fifth of July, St. James's day (6). Immediately after the coronation, King James iſſued a proclamation, expreſly forbiding all perſons, who had any buſineſs at court, to repair thither 'till winter, by reaſon of the plague which raged then exceedingly, and carried off upwards of thirty thouſand in London only. In this reign, proclamations were much more frequent than in the preceding ones: in the firſt eight or nine months, no fewer than twelve came abroad.

I juſt intimated what hopes both Papiſts and Puritans had conceived that they ſhould experience ſome happy change in this new reign. The Romaniſts could not believe, that a Prince, who had never expreſſed any hatred of them, ſhould ſuddenly alter his mind, and chuſe to tread in the ſteps of his predeceſſor. The Puritans fancied that James, having been educated in their creed, and profeſſed it all his life 'till his arrival in England, would ſhower on them his favors: at leaſt they expected he would reform good part of the faults they found in the church of England. Both were deceived, but theſe latter abundantly more than the others. Of the Papiſts, James hated only the Jeſuits, and ſuch as were too ſervilely attached to the court of Rome and the Papal prerogatives: but, on the other hand, he ſaw it would not be in his power to grant a full toleration to the other Catholics, even was he ſo diſpoſed; and for this reaſon, he believed it adviſeable not to diſcover his ſentiments of them too openly. Thus were the Papiſts, who had expected at leaſt a full toleration of their religion, ſtrangely ſurpriſed when, on preſenting to his Majeſty a petition on this occaſion, they received for anſwer, that he thought himſelf obliged to ſupport what he found eſtabliſhed in the kingdom.

(3) The beſt account can be given of this obſcure affair, is this.—Sir John Forteſcue, ſir Walter Ralegh, lord Cobham, and ſome others, deſired that King James might be tied to ſome articles at his acceſſion to the crown, on account of the known feud between the two nations; but by the artful management of lord treaſurer Buckhurſt, and the ranting proteſtations of the earl of Northumberland, who threatened to bring the King in by the ſword, all articles and conditions to bind him were droped. However, for this propoſal, Ralegh and the reſt were frowned upon by the King, and, at the King's coming to London, forbid their attendance at court.

religion as he found it at his acceſſion to the crown, without any innovation. This was what James abſolutely deſigned. When he firſt entered the realm, he not only went over to the church of England, but even purpoſed to compel the Puritans to conform, and to be revenged on them for the vexations occaſioned him by the Preſbyterian ſynods in Scotland: beſide, a church governed by Preſbyters too much reſembled a republic, to be agreeable to a Prince ſo ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favor of monarchy: the church of England's government was abundantly more conformable to his principles (1). Mean while, not to appear at firſt over partial, and to make believe, he would not be determined without hearing the arguments of both ſides, he appointed a conference between the two parties, wherein himſelf would be moderator. Mean while, he iſſued a proclamation, commanding both parties to be quiet, 'till matters were regulated as he ſhould judge requiſite.

He appoints a conference between the Epiſcopalians and Puritans.

An' 1604. Conference at Hampton-court. Barlow. Fuller. Spotſwood. Wilſon. Coke, p. 7.

The conference between ſome biſhops and Preſbyterian miniſters was held at Hampton-court, the fourteenth, ſixteenth and eighteenth of January 1604. James immediately gave the Preſbyters to underſtand what they were to expect. He declared, "That, following the example of all Chriſtian "Princes, who uſually began their reigns with the "eſtabliſhment of the church, he had now, at his "entering upon the throne, aſſembled them for "ſettling a uniform order in the ſame, for planting "unity, removing diſſenſions, and reforming "abuſes, which were naturally incident to all politic "bodies. And that he might not be miſapprehended, and his deſigns in aſſembling them miſconſtrued, he farther declared, that his meaning "was not to make any innovation of the government eſtabliſhed in the church, which he knew "was approved of God, but to hear and examine "the complaints which were made, and remove "the occaſion of them; therefore he deſired the "petitioners to begin, and to ſhew what were their "grievances." Doctor Reynolds being ſpokeſman, reduced what he had to ſay to two heads, the firſt whereof related to the doctrine, and the ſecond to the diſcipline of the church. As to the doctrine, he ſaid, the articles of the church of England were in ſome places obſcure, and in others defective. Then he mentioned the articles he ſpake of, and deſired the King they might be ſo explained as to leave no ambiguity, and that what was deficient might be ſupplied. Hereupon commenced a diſputation, wherein his Majeſty always replied, anſwering the miniſters arguments himſelf, one while with reaſon, another while with authority and menaces. The miniſters ſeeing the King become their adverſary, which they did not expect, choſe to be ſilent, and feigned being ſatisfied. Then James upbraided their preſumption, ſaying, they ought not to have importuned him for ſuch trifles. Indeed, this was not their main grievance. The government, and external worſhip of the church was what moſt troubled them. The points they inſiſted on, were, 1. That ſufficient care was not taken to plant good and learned Paſtors in the churches, to the peoples exceſſive detriment. 2. That ſubſcription was required to the common-prayer-book, wherein they ſaw ſeveral things which their conſcience would not ſuffer them to receive. 3. That the clergy were liable to the cenſures of lay-men, by means of the high-commiſſion. 4. They objected againſt the croſs in baptiſm, the ring in marriage, the ſurplice, with certain other particulars which they looked on as ſuperſtitious. On all theſe points there were warm diſputes, wherein James himſelf took care to reply to the miniſters, without giving the biſhops time to ſpeak. James's conduct was ſo agreeable to the prelates and their partiſans, that the lord chancellor, unwilling to miſs ſuch a fair opportunity to flatter the King, ſaid aloud, "He "had often heard that the prieſthood and royalty "were united, but never ſaw it verified 'till now." Whitgift, archbiſhop of Canterbury, carried his adulation ſtill higher, and ſaid, "He verily believed "the King ſpake by the Spirit of God." After this, James diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and ordered the biſhops and miniſters to meet again, in three days, at the ſame place.

James highly flattered. Echard. Spotſwood. Wilſon. Coke.

On the eighteenth of January, the day appointed by his Majeſty, the prelates were called firſt into his preſenſe, and delivered to him their explanation of the liturgy. Then the King queſtioned them about excommunication, the high-commiſſion, the oath ex officio, the ſubſcription to the common-prayer-book; and approving their anſwers, ordered the miniſters to be called in, and the writing preſented by the biſhops to be read before them. The miniſters believing it was in vain to make any reply, kept ſilence: nay, it is pretended that ſome of them declared, their doubts were ſufficiently cleared. However, the King ſuppoſing they had nothing to object, and had reaſon to be ſatisfied with the condeſcenſion ſhewn them, exhorted the biſhops to treat with lenity ſuch as were of a contrary opinion, and commanded the miniſters to preſerve in unity the church, and beware of obſtinacy and diſobedience. "Obedience and "humility, added he, are the marks of good and "honeſt men, ſuch I believe you to be; but it "feareth me, that many of your ſort are humorous, "and too buſy in the perverting of others. The "exceptions taken againſt the communion-book, "as I perceive, are matters of mere weakneſs, and "they who are diſcreet will be gained with time "and by gentle perſuaſions; or if they be in-"diſcreet, better it is to remove them, than to "have the church troubled with their contentions. "For the biſhops, I will anſwer, that it is not "their purpoſe preſently and out of hand, to in-"force obedience, but, by fatherly admonitions and "conferences, to induce ſuch as are diſaffected. "But if any be of an oppoſite and turbulent ſpirit, "I will have them inforced to a conformity. "Neither tell me, that the wearing of a ſurplice, "or uſing the croſs in baptiſm, will diminiſh the "credit of miniſters who have formerly diſallowed "the ſame; for that is juſt the Scotiſh argument, "when any thing was concluded which ſorted not "with their humor: the only reaſon why they "could not obey was, That it ſtood not with their "credit to yield, having been ſo long of a con-"trary opinion. I will none of that; but that a "time be limited by the biſhops of every dioceſe "to ſuch, and they who will not yield, whatſoever "they are, let them be removed; for we muſt "not prefer the credit of a few private men to the "general peace of the church."

James's threats to the Preſbyterian miniſters. Spotſwood. p. 479.

In this manner paſſed the pretended conference, whoſe ſole end was to make the public believe, the miniſters were convinced and fully inſtructed; wherefore their ſtill ſeparating from the church was purely thro' obſtinacy. Hence it was natural to infer that, to conquer their obſtinacy, there was a neceſſity of uſing ſome ſeverity: and this was what James plainly intimated, when he ſaid; "He

(1) Wilſon ſays, that the King thought, if church power were in the hands of many, it would not be ſo eaſy to be managed, as when in the hands of one, who had dependance upon him, and with whom he might better grapple. "would anſwer for the biſhops, that it was not "their deſign immediately to inforce obedience," and when he afterwards added more clearly, "that, "after ſuch a time, they ſhould be dealed with "in another manner." But this conference wrought not the conviction of the Puritans, and all the fruit his Majeſty reaped therefrom, was the convincing them how far they were miſtaken in depending on his protection.

Whitgift was a mild and peaceable man, who would gladly have reclaimed the Puritans by gentle methods, agreeable to the goſpel; but he died very ſoon after, on the twenty-ninth of February.

Bancroft ſucceeds.

He was ſucceeded by Richard Bancroft, a prelate of a quite different character, who, inſtead of dealing moderately with thoſe people, never ceaſed inſenſing the King againſt them, and doing them all poſſible ill offices. Herein he was but too cloſely imitated by the other prelates, who found a double advantage in ruining that ſect. Firſt, they made their court to the King, who bore them a deadly hatred. Secondly, they preſerved the hierarchy, which the Puritans wiſhed to overthrow. The perſecution which theſe ſuffered while Bancroft was at the clergy's head, induced many families to quit the realm, in order elſewhere to injoy that liberty of conſcience denied them at home (1). Bancroft is likewiſe charged with having been one of the moſt zealous to inſtil into the King maxims of arbitrary power.

He perſecutes the Puritans. Neal. Oſborn.

The twenty-ſecond of February, James iſſued a proclamation, commanding all Jeſuits and other prieſts having orders from any foreign Potentate, to depart the kingdom. This proclamation was ſo worded, that the King apparently took a particular care to demonſtrate that he baniſhed not the Jeſuits thro' hatred to the Catholic religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to that dogma which attributed to Popes unlimited power over crowned heads. This is what James obſerved moſt punctually during his whole reign. He conſtantly affected to conſider the Romiſh creed ſo far only as it might be contrary to civil government, that is to ſay, with reſpect to the Pontif's unbounded authority: as for other doctrines, he was very willing to allow the Papiſts to believe juſt what they would, provided they renounced the belief of the Pope's ſuperiority over Kings. He was perſuaded this equity would procure him a peaceable reign: but he had too much reaſon afterwards to be convinced, that he was taking wrong meaſures, and yet would never alter his conduct. Very few Catholics were ſatisfied with ſo limited a toleration; and all zealous Proteſtants regarded King James as a Papiſt. It is certain he gave room to be thought Popiſhly inclined, by his conſtant care to ſhew he only diſliked the Pope's abſolute power, but little minded ſuch other doctrines as diſtinguiſhed the two religions. This obliged him to take, in favor of the moderate Catholics, ſome ſteps which rendered him greatly ſuſpected by many of the Reformed (2), while others conſidered his zeal againſt the Preſbyterians as a certain evidence of his attachment to the Proteſtant religion.

James's regard for the Papiſts. Burnet.

This proclamation againſt Jeſuits was ſoon followed by another, injoining the Puritans to conform to the eſtabliſhed church's worſhip. Herein apppeared not the ſame care to juſtify King James's conduct with reſpect to this ſort of perſecution. His Majeſty intimated in the firſt, that he would have regard to the tender conſciences of thoſe Catholics who could not comply with the church of England's received doctrines: but this contained not the leaſt indulgence for the tender conſciences of the Puritans; theſe were all a ſet of obſtinate people, who deſerved not to have any favor ſhewn them!

Proclamation againſt Puritans. March 5. Wilſon. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. P. 574. Stow. Speed.

As the parliament was to meet March 19, James deemed it neceſſary to win the affection of his ſubjects, by ſuppreſſing ſome abuſes introduced near the late reign's cloſe, tending to the peoples oppreſſion. This he did by diverſe proclamations againſt certain monopolies; againſt protections frequently hindering the courſe of juſtice; againſt ſalt-petre men, who, if not bought off, dug up peoples houſes; againſt the court purveyors, who ſeized any man's horſes and cart, under color of imploying them for the King, and then excuſed them for money. Among theſe proclamations, there was one not ſo acceptable to the people, viz. that againſt hunting, on very ſevere penalties to the offender. This was a reign of proclamations: the King and his miniſters would gladly have had them regarded as laws; but neither the judges nor people were as yet thereto accuſtomed.

Soon after was iſſued another, appointing the fifth of Auguſt to be obſerved as a holy-day. It was ordered, that annually, on that day, public thanks ſhould be returned to God in all the churches, for the King's miraculous deliverance, in the year 1600, from the conſpiracy of the Gouries, who attempted againſt his life (3). This new holy-day was not univerſally liked. Beſide, the occaſion of it happening to the King before his acceſſion to the crown of England, many, as well in Scotland as England, had the malice to affirm it was only a fiction to cover James's real conſpiracy againſt the two Ruthvens, or Gouries, who were killed on this occaſion. I relate not this with intent to blemiſh King James's reputation, or call in queſtion the deliverance for which he was pleaſed to thank God, but only to ſhew that, from the begining of his reign in England, there were ſome who entertained not of him any extraordinary opinion.

As the time of the parliament's meeting approached, King James and his Queen made their entry into London four days before, not having done it ſooner by reaſon of the plague. His Majeſty had need that day of all his patience, he hating nothing more than ſuch ſolemnities as drew about him crouds of people (4). Herein he greatly differed from Queen Elizabeth, who took pleaſure in ſeeing her people preſs to behold her, and in hearing their acclamations.

The King and Queen make their entry into London. March 25. Wilſon. Stow. Speed.

James I's notion of the Engliſh conſtitution was, as I obſerved, widely remote from what had been thitherto current. If any of his predeceſſors had been of his opinion, they had been at leaſt careful to conceal it, or to diſplay it on extraordinary occaſions

(3) There was not only a yearly feaſt for this deliverance (whether real or imaginary) but alſo a weekly commemoration, by a ſermon every Tueſday. Weldon ſays, that the wiſeſt of the Scotiſh nation gave little credit to that ſtory, p. 8. And Dr. Welwood, that, being in itſelf ſo improbable a thing, and attended with ſo many inconſiſtent circumſtances, it was diſbelieved at the time it was ſaid to have been attempted, p. 19.

(4) The ſuburbs and city were one continued ſcene of pageantry. There were ſeven triumphal gates or arches erected in the ſtreets, thro' which he was to paſs from the Tower to White-hall. It ſeems, he indured this day's brunt very patiently, being ſure he ſhould never have ſuch another. But afterwards (ſays Wilſon) in his public appearances, the crouds of people made him ſo impatient, that he often diſperſed them with frowns, not to ſay curſes. His private recreations at home, and his hunting exerciſes abroad, both with the leaſt diſturbance, were his delights. Stow, p. 836, &c. Wilſon, p. 667.

caſions only. For his part, he thought not proper to follow their example, ſince he omited no opportunity to diſcover his ſentiments. He was perſuaded, the nation's and parliament's privileges were ſo many uſurpations, or at beſt but revocable conceſſions of the crown, and gave frequent occaſion to believe, he had formed a deſign to free both himſelf and ſucceſſors from the reſtraint which the laws, cuſtoms, and immunities of the Engliſh nation had laid on his predeceſſors. Howſoever this be, from one end of his reign to the other, he imbraced all opportunities to improve his prerogative-royal, to which he ſet no bounds but his will. The firſt public ſtep which manifeſted his ſentiments, was the calling his firſt parliament, and whereon I am now entering. Both in the writs and the proclamation, he took upon him to deſcribe what ſort of repreſentatives ſhould be elected, not by way of exhortation, as practiſed by his predeceſſors, but by way of command, and as conditions without which they ſhould not be admited into the houſe. This was directly ſtriking at the commons, whoſe privilege of deciding the validity of elections had never been conteſted. Obſerve the terms wherein his Majeſty expreſſes himſelf.

Thus James aſſumed a power not only to injoin penalties on ſuch as ſhould offend againſt the ſtatutes concerning elections, but alſo to injoin them by a bare proclamation, the authority whereof he rendered equal to that of the laws. This will ſoon appear not done without deſign.

At opening the parliament, the King being ſeated on his throne, ſent for the commons as uſual: but as the croud was exceſſive, diverſe of the repreſentatives could not enter. A certain member, named * Crofts, ſtriving to get in, was rudely thruſt back by one of the King's guards, who knowing him to be what he was, ſaid to him jeeringly, " Goodman Burgeſs, you come not here." This affair made ſome noiſe afterwards; but the houſe thought proper to take no notice of it. The commons being entered, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, which tho' very long merits being inſerted at length, that from ſome certain paſſages may be diſcovered this Prince's genius, character and deſigns.

" The firſt whereof is (and which of itſelf, altho'
" there were no more, is not only a ſufficient, but " a moſt full and neceſſary ground and reaſon for " convening this aſſembly) this firſt reaſon, I ſay, JAMES I.
" is, that you, who are here preſently aſſembled AN' 1604.
" to repreſent the body of this whole kingdom,
" and of all ſorts of people within the ſame, may
" with your own ears hear, and that I out of my " own mouth may deliver unto you, the aſſurance
" of my due thankfulneſs for your ſo joyful and " general applauſe, to the declaring and receiving
" of me in this ſeat, " which God by my birth" right and lineal deſcent, had in the fulneſs of " time provided for me; " and that, immediately
" after it pleaſed God to call your late Sovereign,
" of famous memory, full of days, but fuller of
" immortal trophies of honor, out of this tranſi-
" tory life. Not that I am able to expreſs by " words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of " mine inward thankfulneſs, but only that out of " mine own mouth you may reſt aſſured to expect " that meaſure of thankfulneſs at my hands, which " is according to the infiniteneſs of your deſerts,
" and to my inclination and ability for requital of " the ſame. Shall I ever? Nay, can I ever be " able, or rather ſo unable in memory, as to for" get your unexpected readineſs and alacrity, your " ever memorable reſolution, and your moſt won" derful conjunction and harmony of your hearts,
" in declaring and imbracing me as your undoubt-
" ed and lawful King and governor? Or ſhall it " ever be blotted out of my mind, how at my
" firſt entry into this kingdom, the people of all
" ſorts rid and ran, nay rather flew to meet me?
" Their eyes flaming nothing but ſparkles of af" fection; their mouths and tongues uttering no" thing but ſounds of joy; their hands, feet, and
" all the reſt of their members, in their geſtures,
" diſcovering a paſſionate longing and earneſtneſs
" to meet and imbrace their new Sovereign.
" Quid ergo retribuam? " Shall I allow in my ſelf
" that which I could never bear with in another?
" No, I muſt plainly and freely confeſs here, in all " your audiences, that I did ever naturally ſo far
" miſlike a tongue too ſmooth, and diligent in " paying their creditors with lip-payment and ver-
" bal thanks, that I ever ſuſpected that ſort of peo" ple meaned not to pay their debts in more ſub-
" ſtantial ſort of coin. And therefore, for expreſ-
" ſing my thankfulneſs, I muſt reſort unto the " two reaſons of my convening this parliament,
" by them in action to utter my thankfulneſs: both
" the ſaid reaſons having but one ground, which is
" the deeds, whereby all the days of my life I am
" by God's grace to expreſs my ſaid thankfulneſs
" towards you, but divided in this, that in the firſt
" of theſe two mine actions of thanks are ſo inſe-
" parably conjoined with my perſon, as they are " in a manner become invidually annexed to the " ſame. In the other reaſon, mine actions are
" ſuch, as I may either do them, or leave them
" undone, altho' by God's grace I hope never to " be weary of the doing them.

" As to the firſt, it is the bleſſings which God
" hath in my perſon beſtowed upon you all, where-
" in I proteſt, I do more glory at the ſame for " your weal, than for any particular reſpect of " mine own reputation, or advantage therein.

" The firſt then of theſe bleſſings, which God
" hath jointly with my perſon ſent unto you, is,
" outward peace; that is, peace abroad with all " foreign neighbors: for I thank God, I may
" juſtly ſay, that never ſince I was a King, I ei" ther received wrong of any other Chriſtian Prince
" or ſtate, or did wrong to any. I have ever, I
" praiſe God, yet kept peace and amity with all,
" which hath been ſo far tied to my perſon, as at " my coming here, you are witneſſes, I found the " ſtate imbarked in a great and tedious war; and
" only by mine arrival here, and by the peace in " my

James I. An' 1604.

" my perſon, is now amity kept, where war was " before, which is no ſmall bleſſing to a Chriſtian " commonwealth: for, by peace abroad with their " neighbors the towns flouriſh, the merchants be- " come rich, the trade doth increaſe, and the peo- " ple of all ſorts in the land injoy free liberty to " exerciſe themſelves in their ſeveral vocations, " without peril or diſturbance. Not that I think " this outward peace ſo unſeparably tied to my " perſon, as I dare aſſuredly promiſe to my ſelf, " and to you, the certain continuance thereof: but " thus far I can very well aſſure you, and in the " word of a King, promiſe unto you, That I " ſhall never give the firſt occaſion of the breach " thereof; neither ſhall I ever be moved, for any " particular or private paſſion of mind, to inter- " rupt your public peace, except I be forced there- " unto, either for reparation of the honor of the " kingdom, or elſe by neceſſity for the weal and " preſervation of the ſame: in which caſe, a ſe- " cure and honorable war muſt be prefered to an " unſecure and diſhonorable peace. Yet do I " hope, by my experience of the by-paſſed bleſ- " ſings of peace, which God hath ſo long, ever " ſince my birth, beſtowed upon me, that he will " not be weary to continue the ſame, nor repent " him of his grace towards me; transfering that " ſentence of King David's, upon his by-paſſed " victories of war, to mine of peace; that " that " God who preſerved me from the devouring jaws " of the bear, and of the lion, and delivered them " into my hands, ſhall alſo now grant me victory " over that uncircumciſed Philiſtine." But altho' " outward peace be a great bleſſing, yet it is far " inferior to peace within, as civil wars are more " cruel and unnatural than wars abroad. And " therefore the ſecond great bleſſing which God " hath within my perſon ſent unto you, is peace " within, and that in a double form: firſt, by my " deſcent lineally out of the loins of Henry VII, " is reunited and confirmed in me the union of the " two princely Roſes of the two houſes of Lancaſter " and York, whereof that King of happy memory " was the firſt uniter, as he was alſo the firſt " ground-layer of the other peace (the lamentable " and miſerable events, by the civil and bloody " diſſenſion betwixt theſe two houſes, were ſo great, " and ſo late, as it need not be renewed unto your " memories) which as it was firſt ſettled and united " in him, ſo is it now re-united and confirmed in " me; being juſtly and lineally deſcended not only " of that happy conjunction, but of both the " branches thereof in any times before. But the " union of theſe two princely houſes is nothing " comparable to the union of theſe two ancient and " famous kingdoms, which is the other inward " peace annexed to my perſon.

" And here I muſt crave your patiences for a " little ſpace, to give me leave to diſcourſe more " particularly of the benefits which do ariſe of that " union which is made in my blood, being a " matter which moſt properly belongeth to me to " ſpeak of, as the head wherein that great body is " united. And firſt, if we were to look no higher " than to natural and phyſical reaſons, we may " eaſily be perſuaded of the great benefits which " by that union do redound to the whole " iſland: for if twenty thouſand men be a ſtrong " army, is not the double thereof, forty thouſand, " the ſtronger army? If a baron inricheth himſelf " with double as many lands as he had before, is " he not double the greater? Nature teacheth us, " that mountains are made of motes; and that at " the firſt, kingdoms being divided, and every " particular town, or little country, as tyrants or " uſurpers could obtain the poſſeſſion, a ſigniory " a-part: many of theſe little kingdoms are now, " in proceſs of time, by the ordinance of God, " joined into great monarchies, whereby they are " become powerful within themſelves, to defend " themſelves from all outward invaſions, and their " head and governor thereby inabled to redeem " them from foreign aſſaults, and puniſh private " tranſgreſſions within. Do we not yet remember, " that this kingdom was divided into ſeven little " kingdoms, beſide Wales? And is it not now " the ſtronger by their union? And hath not the " union of Wales to England added a greater " ſtrength thereto? Which, tho' it was a great " principality, was nothing comparable, in great- " neſs and power, to the ancient and famous king- " dom of Scotland. But what ſhould we ſtick " upon any natural appearance, when it is manifeſt " that God, by his Almighty Providence, hath " pre-ordained it ſo to be? Hath not God firſt " united theſe two kingdoms, both in language, " religion, and ſimilitude of manners? Yea, hath " he not made us all in one iſland, compaſſed with " one ſea, and of itſelf by nature indiviſible, as " almoſt thoſe who were borderers themſelves on " the late borders, cannot diſtinguiſh, nor know, " or diſcern their own limits: theſe two countries " being ſeparated neither by ſea, nor great river, " mountain, nor other ſtrength of nature, but only " by little ſmall brooks, or demoliſhed walls, ſo as " rather they were divided in apprehenſion, than " in effect; and now in the end and fulneſs of time " united, the right and title of both in my perſon, " alike lineally deſcended of both the crowns, " whereby it is now become like a little world " within itſelf, being intrenched and fortified round " about with a natural, and yet admirably ſtrong " pond or ditch, whereby all the former fears of " this nation are now quite cut off: the other part " of the iſland being, ever before now, not only " the place of landing to all ſtrangers who were to " make invaſion here, but likewiſe moved by the " enemies of this ſtate, by untimely incurſions to " make inforced diverſion from their conqueſts, for " defending themſelves at home, and keeping ſure " their back-door, as then it was called, which " was the greateſt hindrance and lett my prede- " ceſſors of this nation ever got, in diſturbing " them from their famous and glorious conqueſts " abroad: " what God hath conjoined then, let " no man ſeparate." I am the huſband, and all " the whole iſland is my lawful wife; I am the " head, and it is my body; I am the ſhepherd, " and it is my flock. I hope therefore no man will " be ſo unreaſonable as to think, that I, who am " a Chriſtian King, under the goſpel, ſhould be a " polygamiſt, and huſband to two wives; that I " being the head, ſhould have a divided and mon- " ſtrous body; or that, being the ſhepherd to ſo " fair a flock (whoſe fold hath no wall to hedge it " but the four ſeas) ſhould have my flock parted " in two. But as I am aſſured that no honeſt ſub- " ject, of whatſoever degree, within my whole " dominions, is leſs glad of this joyful union than " I am; ſo may the frivolous objection of any " who would be hinderers of this work (which " God hath in my perſon already eſtabliſhed) be " eaſily anſwered; which can be none except ſuch " as are either blinded with ignorance, or elſe " tranſported with malice, being unable to live in " a well-governed common-wealth, and only de- " lighting to fiſh in troubled waters: for if they " would ſtand upon their reputation and privileges " of any of the kingdoms, I pray you, were not " both the kingdoms monarchies from the begin- " ing? and conſequently, could ever the body be " counted without the head, which was ever unſe- " parably joined thereunto? ſo that as the honor " and privileges of either of the kingdoms could " not be divided from their Sovereign; ſo are they " now confounded and joined in my perſon, who " am equal and alike kindly head to you both. " When this kingdom of England was divided " into ſo many little kingdoms, as I told you be- " fore, one of them behoved to eat up another, " 'till they were all united in one: and yet can " Wiltſhire or Devonſhire, which were of the " Weſt-Saxons, altho' their kingdom was of " longeſt durance, and did by conqueſt overcome " diverſe of the reſt of the little kingdoms, make " claim to priority of place or honor before Suſſex, " Eſſex, or other ſhires, which were conquered by " them? and have we not the like experience in the " kingdom of France, being compoſed of diverſe " duchies, and one after another conquered by the " ſword? for even as little brooks loſe their names " by their running and falling into great rivers, " and the very name and memory of the great " rivers ſwallowed up in the ocean; ſo by the con- " junction of diverſe little kingdoms in one, are all " theſe private differences and queſtions ſwallowed " up. And, ſince the ſucceſs was happy of the " Saxon kingdoms, being conquered by the ſpear " of Bellona, how much greater reaſon have we to " expect a happy iſſue of this greater union, which " is only faſtened and bound up by the wedding- " ring of Aſtrea? And as God hath made Scot- " land (the one half of this iſle) to injoy my birth, " and the firſt and moſt imperfect half of my life; " and you here to injoy the perfect and laſt half " thereof; ſo cannot I think that any would be ſo " injurious to me, no, not in their thoughts and " wiſhes, as to cut aſunder the one half of me from " the other: but in this matter I have far enough " inſiſted, reſting aſſured that, in your hearts and " minds, you all applaud this my diſcourſe.

" Now altho' theſe bleſſings, before rehearſed, " of inward and outward peace be great; yet ſee- " ing that, in all good things, a great part of their " goodneſs and eſtimation is loſt, if they have not " appearance of perpetuity or long continuance; " ſo it hath pleaſed Almighty God to accompany " my perſon alſo with that favor, having healthful " and hopeful iſſue of my body, whereof ſome " are here preſent, for continuance and propagation " of that undoubted right which is in my perſon, " under whom I doubt not but it will pleaſe God " to proſper and continue for many years this union, " and all other bleſſings of inward and outward " peace, which I have brought with me.

" But neither peace outward, nor peace inward, " nor any other bleſſing which can follow there- " upon, nor appearance of the perpetuity thereof, " by propagation in the poſterity, is but a weak " pillar, and a rotten reed to lean unto, if God " do not ſtrengthen, and, by the ſtaff of his bleſ- " ſing, make them durable; for in vain doth the " watchman watch the city, if the Lord be not " the principal defenſe thereof; in vain doth the " builder build the houſe, if God give not the " ſucceſs; and in vain, as Paul ſaith, doth Paul " plant, and Apollo water, if God give not the " increaſe: for all worldly bleſſings are but like " ſwift-paſſing ſhadows, fading flowers, or chaff " blown before the wind, if, by the profeſſion of " true religion, and works according thereunto, " God be not moved to maintain and ſettle the " thrones of Princes. And altho' that ſince mine " entry into this kingdom I have, both by meeting " with diverſe of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and like- " wiſe by ſundry proclamations, clearly declared " my mind in points of religion, yet do I not " think it amiſs, in this ſo ſolemn an audience, I " ſhould now take occaſion to diſcover ſomewhat " of the ſecrets of my heart in that matter; for I " ſhall never, with God's grace, be aſhamed to " make public profeſſion thereof at all occaſions, " leſt God ſhould be aſhamed to profeſs and allow " me, before men and angels; eſpecially, leſt that " at this time men might preſume, upon the miſ- " knowledge of my meaning, to trouble this par- " liament of ours farther than were convenient.

" At my firſt coming, altho' I found but one " religion, and that which by myſelf is profeſſed, " publicly allowed, and by the law maintained; " yet I found another ſort of religion, beſide a " private ſect, lurking within the bowels of this " nation. The firſt is the true religion, which " by me is profeſſed, and by the law eſtabliſhed: " the ſecond is, the falſely-called Catholics, but " truly Papiſts: the third, which I call a ſect, ra- " ther than a religion, is the Puritans or Noveliſts, " who do not ſo far differ from us in points of re- " ligion, as in their confuſed form of policy and " purity, " being ever diſcontented with the pre- " ſent government, and impatient to ſuffer any ſu- " periority, which makes their ſect unable to be " ſuffered in any well-governed common-wealth." " But as for my courſe towards them, I remit it " to my proclamations made on that ſubject.

" And now for the Papiſts, I muſt put a diffe- " rence betwixt my own private profeſſion of mine " own ſalvation, and my politic government of " the realm, for the weal and quietneſs thereof. " As for mine own profeſſion, you have me your " head now among you, of the ſame religion which " the body is of: as I am no ſtranger to you in " blood, no more am I a ſtranger to you in faith, " or in matters concerning the houſe of God. And " altho' this my profeſſion be according to mine " education, wherein, I thank God, I ſucked the " milk of God's truth with the milk of my nurſe, " yet do I here proteſt unto you, that I would " never, for ſuch a conceit of conſtancy, or other " prejudicate opinion, have ſo firmly kept my firſt " profeſſion, if I had not found it agreeable to all " reaſon, and to the rule of my conſcience. But " I was never violent, nor unreaſonable in my pro- " feſſion: " I acknowledge the Roman church to " be our mother church, altho' defiled with ſome " infirmities and corruptions," as the Jews were, " when they crucified Chriſt. And as I am " no enemy to the life of a ſick man, becauſe I " would have his body purged of ill humors; no " more am I enemy to their church, becauſe I " would have them reform their errors, not wiſh- " ing the down-throwing of the temple, but that " it might be purged, and cleanſed from corrup- " tion; otherwiſe how can they wiſh us to enter, " if their houſe be not firſt clean? But as I would " be lother to diſpenſe in the leaſt point of mine " own conſcience, for any worldly reſpect, than " the fooliſheſt preciſian of them all; ſo would I " be as ſorry to ſtrait the politic government of " the bodies and minds of all my ſubjects to my " private opinions: nay, my mind was ever " ſo free from perſecution, or thralling of my ſub- " jects in matters of conſcience, as I hope thoſe " of that profeſſion within this kingdom have a " proof ſince my coming, that I was ſo far from " increaſing their burdens, with Rehoboam, as I " have, ſo much as either time, occaſion, or law " could permit, lightened them: and even now at " this time, have I been careful to reviſe and con- " ſider deeply upon the laws made againſt them, " " That ſome overture might be proponed to " the preſent parliament, for clearing theſe laws by " reaſon (which is the ſoul of the law) in caſe they " have been in paſſed times farther, or more rigo- " rouſly extended by judges, than the meaning of " the law was, or might tend to the hurt as well " of the innocent, as of guilty perſons." And as " to the perſons of my ſubjects who are of that profeſſion,

James I. An' 1604.

" profeſſion, I muſt divide them into two ranks, " clerics and laics. For the part of the laics, cer- " tainly I ever thought them far more excuſable " than the other ſort, becauſe that ſort of religion " contained ſuch a doubtful, ignorant, and implicit " kind of faith in the laics, grounded upon their " church as, except they do generally believe what- " ſoever their teachers pleaſe to affirm, they cannot " be thought guilty of theſe particular points of " hereſies and corruptions, which their teachers do " ſo wilfully profeſs. And again, I muſt ſub- " divide the ſame laics into two ranks, that is, " either quiet and well-minded men, peaceable " ſubjects, who either, being old, have retained " their firſt drunken-in liquor upon a certain ſhame- " facedneſs to be thought curious, or changeable; " or, being young men, thro' evil educations, have " never been nurſed or brought up but upon ſuch " venom, inſtead of wholeſome nutriment; and " that ſort of people I would be ſorry to puniſh " their bodies for the error of their minds, the re- " formation whereof muſt only come of God, and " the true ſpirit. But the other rank of laics who, " either thro' curioſity, affectation of novelties, or " diſcontentment in their private humors, have " changed their coats, only to be factious ſtirrers of " ſedition, and perturbers of the commonweal; " their backwardneſs in their religion giveth a " ground to me (their magiſtrate) to take the " better heed to their proceedings, and to correct " their obſtinacy.

" But for the part of the clerics, I muſt directly " ſay and affirm that, as long as they maintain " one ſpecial point of their doctrine, and another " point of their practiſe, they are no way ſufferable " to remain in this kingdom. Their point of " doctrine is, that arrogant and ambitious ſupre- " macy of their head, the Pope, whereby he not " only claimeth to be ſpiritual head of all Chriſtians, " but alſo to have an imperial civil power over all " Kings and Emperors, dethroning and decrowning " Princes with his foot as pleaſeth him, and diſ- " penſing and diſpoſing of all kingdoms and empires " at his appetite. The other point which they " obſerve in continual practiſe is, the aſſaſſinates " and murders of Kings, thinking it no ſin, but " rather a matter of ſalvation, to do all actions of " rebellion and hoſtility againſt their natural Sove- " reign Lord, if he be once curſed, his ſubjects " diſcharged of their fidelity, and his kingdom given " a prey, by that three-crowned Monarch, or rather " monſter, their head. And in this point I have " no occaſion to ſpeak farther here, ſaying, " That " I could wiſh from my heart, that it would pleaſe " God to make me one of the members of ſuch a " general union in religion, as laying wilfulneſs aſide " on both hands, we might meet in the midſt, " which is the center and perfection of all things. " For if they would leave and be aſhamed of ſuch " new and groſs corruptions of theirs, as themſelves " cannot maintain, nor deny to be worthy of re- " formation, I would for my own part be content " to meet them in the mid-way, ſo that all novel- " ties might be renounced on either ſide." For as " my faith is the true, ancient, catholic and apoſtolic " faith, grounded upon the ſcriptures and expreſs " word of God; ſo will I ever yield all reverence " to antiquity, in the points of eccleſiaſtical policy: " and by that means ſhall I ever, with God's " grace, keep my ſelf from either being a heretic " in faith, or ſchiſmatic in matters of policy.

" But of one thing would I have the Papiſts of " this land to be admoniſhed, that they preſume " not ſo much upon my lenity (becauſe I would be " loth to be thought a perſecutor) as thereupon " to think it lawful for them daily to increaſe their " number and ſtrength in this kingdom; whereby, " if not in my time, at leaſt in the time of my " poſterity, they might be in hope to erect their " religion again. No, let them aſſure themſelves, " that as I am a friend to their perſons, if they be " good ſubjects, ſo I am a vowed enemy, and do " denounce mortal war to their errors. And that " as I would be ſorry to be driven, by their ill " behavior, from the protection and conſervation of " their bodies and lives; ſo will I never ceaſe, as " far as I can, to tread down their errors and wrong " opinions: firſt, I could not permit the increaſe " and growing of their religion, without betraying " my ſelf and mine own conſcience: ſecondly, this " whole iſle, as well the part I am come from, as " the part I remain in, in betraying their liberties, " and reducing them to the former ſlaviſh yoke " which both had caſten off before I came among " them: and thirdly, the liberty of the crown in " my poſterity, which I ſhould leave again under " a new ſlavery, having found it left free to me " by my predeceſſors. And therefore would I " wiſh all my good ſubjects, who are deceived " with that corruption; firſt, if they find any be- " gining of inſtinction in themſelves of knowledge, " and love to the truth, to foſter the ſame by all " lawful means, and to beware of quenching the " ſpirit which worketh within them: and if they " can find as yet no motion tending that way, to " be ſtudious to read and confer with learned men, " and to uſe all ſuch means as may farther their " reſolution; aſſuring themſelves, that as long as " they are diſconformable in religion from us, they " cannot be but half my ſubjects, be able to do " but half ſervice, and I to want the beſt half of " them, which is their ſouls.

" And here I take occaſion to ſpeak to you, my " lords the biſhops; for as you, my lord of Durham, " ſaid very learnedly this day, in your ſermon, " Correction without inſtruction is but a tyranny:" " ſo ought you, and all the clergy under you, to " be more careful, vigilant, and diligent, than " you have been, to win ſouls to God, as well " by your exemplary life, as doctrine. And ſince " you ſee how careful they are, ſparing neither " labor, pains, nor extreme peril of their perſons, " to pervert (the devil is ſo buſy a biſhop) you " ſhould be the more careful and wakeful in your " charges. Follow the rule preſcribed to you by " St. Paul, " Be ye careful to exhort and inſtruct, " in ſeaſon, and out of ſeaſon:" and where you " have been any way ſluggiſh before, now waken " yourſelves up again with a new diligence in this " point, remiting the ſucceſs to God, who calling " them either at the ſecond, third, tenth, or twelfth " hour, as they are alike welcome to him, ſo ſhall " they be to me, his lieutenant here.

" The third reaſon of my convening you at this " time, which containeth ſuch actions of my thank- " fulneſs towards you, as I may either do, or leave " undone, yet ſhall, with God's grace, ever preſs " to perform all the days of my life. It conſiſteth in " theſe two points; in making laws at certain " times, which is only at ſuch times as this, in " parliament; or in the careful execution thereof " at all other times. As for the making them, " I will thus far faithfully promiſe unto you, that I " will ever prefer the weal of the body, and of the " whole commonweal, in making good laws and " conſtitutions, to any particular or private ends " of mine, thinking ever the wealth and weal of " the public to be my greateſt weal, and worldly " felicity: a point wherein a lawful King doth " directly differ from a tyrant. But, at this time, " I am only thus far to forewarn you in that point, " that you beware to ſeek the making too many " laws, for two eſpecial reaſons. Firſt, becauſe in " corruptiſſimâ Republicâ plurimæ leges: and the " execution

JAMES I. AN' 1604.

" execution of good laws is far more profitable in " a commonweal, than to burden mens memories " with the making too many of them. And next, " becauſe the making too many laws in one par- " liament will bring in confuſion, for lack of leiſure " wiſely to deliberate before you conclude: for the " biſhop ſaid well to day; that to deliberation would " a large time be given, but to execution a greater " promptneſs was required. As for the execution " of good laws, it hath been very wiſely and " honorably foreſeen, and ordered by my prede- " ceſſors in this kingdom, in planting ſuch a num- " ber of judges, and all ſorts of magiſtrates, in " convenient places, for the execution thereof. And " therefore muſt I now turn me to you who are " judges and magiſtrates under me, as mine eyes " and ears in this caſe: I can ſay no otherwiſe to " you, than as Ezekias, the good King of Juda, " ſaid to his judges; "Remember that the thrones " you ſit on are God's, and neither yours nor " mine." And that as you muſt be anſwerable to " me, ſo muſt both you and I be anſwerable to " God, for the due execution of our offices. " That place is no place for you to utter your af- " fections in; you muſt not there hate your foe, " nor love your friend; fear the offenſe of the " greater party, or pity the miſery of the meaner; " you muſt be blind, and not ſee diſtinctions of " perſons; handleſs, not receive bribes; but keep " that juſt temper and mild-courſe in all your pro- " ceedings that, like a juſt balance, you may nei- " ther ſway to the right nor left hand. Three " principal qualities are required in you, know- " ledge, courage and ſincerity; that you may diſ- " cern with knowledge, execute with courage, and " do both in upright ſincerity: and as, for my " part, I do vow and proteſt here in the preſenſe " of God, and of this honorable audience, I ne- " ver ſhall be weary, nor omit any occaſion where- " in I may ſhew my carefulneſs of the execution of " good laws; and, as I wiſh you who are judges, " not to be weary in your office, in doing it, ſo " ſhall I never be weary, with God's grace, to " take account of you, which is properly my " calling.

" And thus having told you the three cauſes " of my convening this parliament, all three " tending only to utter my thankfulneſs, but in " diverſe forms; the firſt by word, the other two " by action; I do confeſs, that when I have " done, and performed all which in this ſpeech " I have promiſed, Inutilis ſervus ſum: Inutile, " becauſe the meaning of the word Inutilis in " that place of ſcripture, is underſtood, that in " doing all that ſervice which we can to God, " it is but our duty, and we do nothing to God, " but that which we are bound to do: and in " like manner, when I have done all I can for " you, I do nothing but what I am bound to do, " and am accountable to God upon the contrary. " For I do aknowledge; "That the ſpecial and " greateſt point of difference that is betwixt a " rightful King, and a uſurping Tyrant, is in " this; that whereas the proud and ambitious " Tyrant doth think his kingdom and people are " only ordained for ſatisfaction of his deſires and " unreaſonable appetites; the righteous and juſt " King doth, by the contrary, acknowledge him- " ſelf to be ordained for the procuring the wealth " and proſperity of his people, and that his greateſt " and principal worldly felicity muſt conſiſt in " their proſperity". If you be rich, I cannot " be poor; if you be happy, I cannot but be " fortunate; and I proteſt that your welfare ſhall " ever by my greateſt care and contentment. And " that I am a ſervant is moſt true; that as I am " head and governor of all the people in my domi- " nions, who are my natural vaſſals and ſubjects, " conſidering them in numbers and diſtinct ranks; " ſo if we will take the whole people as one body, " and maſs, then as the head is ordained for the " body, and not the body for the head, ſo muſt " a righteous King know himſelf to be ordained " for his people, and not his people for him: " for altho' King and people be relata, yet can he " be no King if he want people and ſubjects: but " there are many people in the world who lack " a head; wherefore I will never be aſhamed to " to confeſs it my principal honor, to be the great " ſervant of the common-weal; and ever think " the proſperity thereof to be my greateſt felicity, " as I have already ſaid.

JAMES I. AN' 1604.

" But as it was the whole body of this king- " dom (with a uniform aſſent and harmony) as " I told you in the begining of my ſpeech, which " did ſo far oblige me, in goodwill and thankfulneſs " of requital by their alacrity and readineſs in de- " claring and receiving me to that place which God " had provided for me, and not any particular " perſons (for then it had not been the body) ſo is " my thankfulneſs due to the whole ſtate. For " even as in matters of faults, Quod à multis pec- " catur impunè peccatur; even ſo in the matters of " virtuous and good deeds, what is done by the " willing conſent and harmony of the whole body " no particular perſon can juſtly claim thanks, as " proper to him for the ſame: and therefore I " muſt here make a little apology for my ſelf, in " that I could not ſatisfy the particular humors " of every perſon who looked for ſome advance- " ment or reward at my hand, ſince my entry into " this kingdom. Three kinds of things were " craved of me, advancement to honor, prefer- " ment to place of credit about my perſon, and re- " ward in matters of land or profit. If I had " beſtowed honor upon all, no man could have " been advanced to honor; for the degrees of honor " do conſiſt in prefering ſome above their fellows: " if every man had the like acceſs to my privy or " bed-chamber, then no man could have it, becauſe " it cannot contain all: and if I had beſtowed lands " and rewards upon every man, the fountain of " my liberality would have been ſo exhauſted and " dried, as I would lack means to be liberal to " any man: and yet was I not ſo ſparing, but I " may without vaunting affirm, that I have inlarged " my favor, in all the three degrees, towards as " many, and more than ever King of England did, " in ſo ſhort a ſpace. No, I rather crave your " pardon, that I have been ſo bountiful: for, if " the means of the crown be waſted, I behoved " then to have recourſe to you my ſubjects, and be " burdenſome to you, which I would be lotheſt to " be of any King alive; for as it is true that, " as I have already ſaid, it was a whole body " which did deſerve ſo well at my hand, and not " every particular perſon of the people: yet were " there ſome who, by reaſon of their office, credit " with the people, or otherwiſe, took occaſion " both before, and at the ſame time of my coming " among you, to give proof of their love and " affection towards me. Not that I am any way " in doubt, that if other of my ſubjects had been " in their places, and had the like occaſion, but " they would have uttered the like good effects (ſo " general and ſo great were the love and affec- " tion of you all towards me) but yet this having " been peformed by ſome ſpecial perſons, I could " not without unthankfulneſs but requite them ac- " cordingly: and therefore had I juſt occaſion to " advance ſome in honor, ſome to places of ſer- " vice about me, and by rewarding to inable ſome " who had deſerved well of me, and were not " otherwiſe able to maintain the ranks I thought " them

James I. An' 1604.

" them capable of, and others who, altho' they " had not particularly deſerved before, yet I found " them capable and worthy of place of preferment " and credit, and not able to ſuſtain thoſe places " for which I thought them fit, without my help. " Two eſpecial cauſes moved me to be ſo open-" handed, whereof the one was reaſonable and ho-" norable but the other (I will not be aſhamed to " confeſs unto you) proceeded of mine own infirmi-" ty. That which was juſt and honorable, was " that, being ſo far beholden to the body of the " whole ſtate, I thought I could not refuſe to let " run ſome ſmall brooks out of the fountain of my " thankfulneſs to the whole, for refreſhing of par-" ticular perſons who were members of that mul-" tidude. The other, which proceeded out of " mine own infirmity, was, the multitude and " importunity of ſuitors. But altho' reaſon cometh " by infuſion, in a manner, yet experience groweth " with time and labor: and therefore do I not " doubt, but experience in time coming will both " teach the particular ſubjects of this kingdom not " to be ſo importune and undiſcreet in craving; " and me not to be ſo eaſily and lightly moved " in granting that which may be harmful to " my eſtate, and conſequently to the whole king-" dom.

" And thus having at length declared unto you " my mind, in all the points for the which I " called this parliament, my concluſion ſhall only " now be, to excuſe my ſelf, in caſe you have " not found ſuch eloquence in my ſpeech as, " peradventure, you might have looked for at " my hands. I might, if I liſt, alledge the great " weight of my affairs, and my continual buſineſs " and diſtraction, that I could never have leiſure " to think upon what I was to ſpeak, before I " came to the place where I was to ſpeak: and " I might alſo alledge, that my firſt ſight of this " ſo famous and honorable aſſembly might like-" wiſe breed ſome impediment. But leaving theſe " excuſes, I will plainly and freely, in my man-" ner, tell you the true cauſe of it; which is, that " it becometh a King, in my opinion, to uſe " no other eloquence than plaineſs and ſincerity. " By plaineſs I mean, that his ſpeeches ſhould " be ſo clear, and void of all ambiguity, that they " may not be torn nor rent aſunder in contrary " ſenſes, like the old oracles of the Pagan gods: " and by ſincerity I underſtand, that uprightneſs " and honeſty, which ought to be in a King's " whole ſpeeches and actions; that, as far as a " King is in honor erected above any of his ſub-" jects, ſo far ſhould he ſtrive in ſincerity to be " above them all, and that his tongue ſhould be " ever the true meſſenger of his heart. And " this ſort of eloquence may you ever aſſuredly " look for at my hands".

Sundry remarks made on James's ſpeech.

This harangue was not received with the applauſes his Majeſty had expected. Beſide its exorbitant prolixity, diverſe particulars were remarked which gave room for criticiſm. Firſt, none could tell what to make of his " actions of thanks inſe-" parably conjoined in his perſon," and containing two bleſſings, the firſt whereof was confined to theſe two points: 1. That having never had war with any of his neighbors, he infered thence, that he brought peace with him every where. But it was no great wonder he had not been hitherto at war with his neighbors, ſince Scotland has properly no neighbors but the Engliſh. 2. That, without being ſollicited, he had revoked the letters of mark againſt Spain. The other bleſſing of his " actions " of thanks" conſiſted in the union in his perſon of the titles of the two houſes of Lancaſter and York. Hence he would have inſinuated that, by his acceſſion to the throne of England, he freed the Engliſh from the dread of ſeeing a renewal of the civil wars occaſioned by the ſaid two houſes titles: but this pretended dread was only a chimera of his own forming; ſince Henry VIII, who much more juſtly united in his perſon the rights of the two contending houſes, the dread of a civil war had ſo diſappeared, that it was abſolutely forgot. As for his efforts to manifeſt the great advantages which would accrue to England from the union of the two kingdoms, they were intirely vain, as will hereafter appear: beſide, his inferences from the arbitrary compariſons, of a head with a divided body, a huſband with two wives, a ſhepherd with two flocks, ſeemed ſo little ſolid, that they were turned to ridicule. What he advanced concerning religion gave univerſal diſguſt. The Papiſts were not ſatisfied with his diſtinctions. The Puritans were extremely ſhocked that he ſhould poſitively ſay of them, " They were ever diſcontented with " the preſent government, and impatient of any " ſuperiority, which made their ſect inſufferable " in a well-governed common-wealth." The Proteſtants in general remarked in his ſpeech too great condeſcenſion for the Papiſts, and even contradiction in what he ſaid on their account. On the one hand, he affirmed, he was of the church of England, and his faith grounded upon the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, he was ready to lay aſide all prejudice, and meet the Catholics half way. He declared himſelf a mortal enemy to their errors, but took care to intimate, that he confined, as I may ſay, theſe errors to the doctrine of the Pope's exorbitant power. With regard to the other ſort of " actions of thanks," conſiſting in the making and executing laws, it was ſaid, that a King of England might extol his condeſcenſion concerning ſome particular ſtatute, inacted to his own detriment, and the nation's benefit: but no King before him ever pretended that giving his aſſent to ſuch laws as were for his own and the kingdom's good, was laying any obligation on the people. It was likewiſe remarked, that he admoniſhed the parliament not to inact too many laws, as if he feared being obliged to carry too far his pretended thankfulneſs. That, as for the few good laws he was willing to admit, all the effects of his thankfulneſs conſiſted in giving the judges a very common and trivial charge. It was laſtly obſerved, that this thankfulneſs whereon turned his whole ſpeech, was as imaginary as the cauſe which produced it. In thanking the people of England " for receiving and imbracing him as their un-" doubted and lawful King and governor," he did not mean to declare, that the people had made him ſo, but only that, being undoubted King by his birth-right, they had received and owned him as ſuch. This was leſſening the obligation, and conſequently the thankfulneſs alſo: many were therefore of opinion that his Majeſty's drift in this tedious harangue, was not ſo much to expreſs his thankfulneſs to the Engliſh, as to inſinuate that all the obligation he had to them was, their not oppoſing his undoubted right: that his chief intention was, to obtain of the parliament the union of both kingdoms; to prevent any new laws againſt Papiſts, and to have the execution of thoſe already in force left to him. What was at firſt only conjectured became certain afterwards, as this King's views were gradually unveiled: but in this very parliament the Engliſh began to conceive a ſuſpicion and jealouſy of their new Sovereign. This is what put the houſe of commons on their guard, and made them carefully weigh the words and actions of this Prince, who, notwithſtanding the maxims laid down in the cloſe of his diſcourſe, was a very great proficient in the art of ſelecting

Act to confirm the King's title. Statut. c. 1. Wilſon.

The firſt buſineſs entered upon by this parliament was to prepare a ſtatute for acknowledging King James's title to the crown of England. This was not of his own moving: on the contrary, in all appearance, by repeating ſeveral times in his ſpeech, that he was undoubted King by birth-right, he deſigned to intimate, that he needed not parliamentary confirmation. But if this was his intent, the two houſes did not, or ſeemed not to underſtand it; whether they reſolved to preſerve a privilege hitherto injoyed, or apprehended ſuch omiſſion might occaſion troubles and rebellions. James, on his part, judged it not prudent to refuſe the act.

Commiſſioners to examine the union of the two kingdoms. Spotſwood. p. 480. &c. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 600. Wilſon.

After the parliament had conſidered of ſome other affairs, they appointed commiſſioners to examine his Majeſty's propoſal concerning a union between the two kingdoms: but to this James had already put obſtacles, by laviſhing honors and riches upon his Scotiſh courtiers. This convinced the Engliſh, they could not but loſe by a union, whoſe end they were perſuaded was to make the Scots partakers of England's wealth, whereas the Engliſh had nothing to expect in Scotland (1). Hence alſo aroſe farther occaſion to cenſure his Majeſty's ſpeech, where he ſpoke of Scotland as one half of the iſland, tho' the Engliſh were far from being ſtrangers to the vaſt inequality between the two halves. The Scots greedineſs after places, penſions and rich matches, raiſed the jealouſy of the Engliſh, and rendered them very averſe to the union James had projected. With theſe diſpoſitions the commiſſioners met to examine the advantages and inconveniences, in order to make their report to the two houſes (2).

The peoples diſcontent about religion. Wilſon.

While this was in agitation, the majority of people could not forbear expreſſing their diſcontents touching religion. The Papiſts expected greater favors from a Prince whom they imagined in their intereſt. His diſtinction between the clerics and laics, between thoſe who aſcribed to the Pope unlimited power, and ſuch as received not that doctrine, made them fear the advantages they had promiſed themſelves in this new reign would be very inconſiderable. The Preſbyterians were inraged to ſee James ſo openly prefer the Papiſts before them. All the Proteſtants in general heard, with grief, the advances he made to the Papiſts; but, more particularly, his offer of meeting them half way, and his affectation of condemning only a ſingle tenet, gave room to believe he had in reality the ſentiments he was ſuſpected of in Scotland. "What means "(ſaid they) his offer to the Papiſts of meeting "them half way, on their renouncing the doctrines "repugnant to regal authority? Where is this "half way to be? Does it relate to the hierarchy? "But if the Pope's authority is not received, there "will be no longer any difference between the "Engliſh and Romiſh churches. Does he reckon "the Catholics will have come half way, "when they have renounced the Pope's exorbi-"tant power? If ſo, we muſt, in order to go "the other half, yield them the reſt of thoſe arti-"cles which occaſioned our ſeparation." In ſhort, it was a queſtion, how far his offer was to extend, or where to ſtop, ſo obſcure and dubious was this expreſſion, tho' he had declared, he would uſe no other eloquence than plaineſs and ſincerity. Moſt of the prelates and the church of England zealots, were alone pleaſed, becauſe James ſeemed determined not to tolerate the Puritans, who were no leſs odious to them than the Papiſtical bigots. It is certain, their zeal for the church of England was carried ſomewhat too far, and the King, by ſo plainly declaring himſelf a ſworn enemy to the Puritans, bred a mutual enmity between the two parties, which was but too much cheriſhed, and which, at another juncture, proved fatal to the eſtabliſhed church. The Puritans were ſo offended at this uncharitableneſs for them, and the great condeſcenſion for the Papiſts, that they ſcrupled not charging the King, the biſhops, and the zealous epiſcopalians, with being ſo many agents for the Romiſh Pontif. Amidſt theſe diviſions, the Popiſh emiſſaries had but too many opportunities to foment the animoſity of theſe factions, and carry it to the utmoſt height, knowing they could not better execute their deſigns than when the realm was torn with diſſenſions. It is pretended that, at this juncture, many Jeſuits, with their ſuperiors permiſſion, were received, ſome as Preſbyterian miniſters, others as church of England prieſts, and that, under theſe diſguiſes, they ſo ſtretched the principles of both parties, in their writings and ſermons, that the breach was rendered irreparable.

Artifice of the Jeſuits to foment diviſions. Annals of James I. Pref.

At the ſame time, thoſe who approached the King's perſon, both Engliſh and Scots, ſtudied only how to make their court, in order to obtain his good-graces and favors. The jealouſy between the two nations helped to ſtrain the flattery uſed by the whole court to his Majeſty. All labored to keep in his eſteem by whatever was to him moſt agreeable, and nothing was more ſo, than to be extolled for his abilities and learning, and to hear the royal authority talked of according to his own principles. It was ſome time before the people had a clear knowledge of this Prince's genius and character; but when he was once well known, the eſteem at firſt entertained of him very ſenſibly diminiſhed, whereto he himſelf greatly contributed by his unaccountable conduct, as in the ſequel will appear.

James a lover of flattery. Oſborn.

He aſſumes the title of King of Great-Britain. Wilſon, p. 673. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 603.

The main affair for which James had ſummoned the parliament was, the union of both kingdoms, tho' he pretended, his ſole motive was to expreſs his grateful acknowledgment to the Engliſh. He had ſuch opinion of his eloquence, that he queſtioned not the ſucceſs of this affair, and the nominating commiſſioners for that purpoſe confirmed his belief: ſo, whether thro' impatience, or to ingage the parliament to unite the two kingdoms with more readineſs, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King of Great-Britain, without waiting for the parliament's deciſion. From thenceforwards he would hear no more of a diſtinction of the two kingdoms. St. Andrew's croſs was quartered with St. George's in the flags, and by proclamation the Scotiſh coins were made current in England. This evidenced James's not doubting but the union buſineſs would ſucceed to his wiſh: but he was yet a ſtranger to the genius and character of the Engliſh. Such as had no ſhare in his bounties, loudly murmured to ſee his Scotiſh attendants ſuddenly grown ſo rich, that the Engliſh could not imitate their ſplendor without ruining themſelves (3). On this occaſion were daily made abundance of Paſquinades not much to the Scots advantage, nor conſequently to the project of uniting the two kingdoms.

of their new Sovereign's conduct. This was a diſcontent given the houſe of commons, and which it will be neceſſary to mention, in order to ſhew this Prince's idea of the Engliſh conſtitution, and the juſt cauſe he gave the commons to apprehend he deſigned to invade their privileges. Immediately on opening the parliament, the commons as uſual examining the conteſted elections, there was a debate in the houſe about the return of ſir Francis Goodwin, and ſir John Forteſcue, for knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks, and, on a full hearing, ſir Francis was declared duely elected. Three days after, the lords ſent to the commons, requiring a conference concerning Goodwin's election. The commons, ſurpriſed at ſo extraordinary a meſſage, replied; they did not think themſelves obliged to give account of their proceedings, and therefore could not grant the conference demanded. The peers anſwered; his Majeſty having been informed of what had paſſed in Goodwin's caſe, deemed himſelf in honor ingaged to have the affair re-debated, and had ordered them to confer thereon with the commons. Upon this, the commons, by their ſpeaker, gave the King their reaſons, why they could not admit this innovation: but all they could obtain was that, inſtead of a conference with the lords, James commanded them to confer with the judges. This pleaſed them no more than the other. They ſet down their reaſons in writing, and delivered them at the council-chamber, to deſire their lordſhips to intercede for them to his Majeſty not to violate their privileges. The anſwer was, the King abſolutely commanded them to have a conference with the judges. At this order, ſo very arbitrary, the commons were extremely ſurpriſed: nevertheleſs, fearing to be accuſed of too promptly ingaging in a quarrel with the King, they judged it properer to yield than ſtand out, fully bent however to adhere to what had been determined concerning the conteſted election. Certainly, James had ingaged in a very nice affair, and probably would not have come off with honor, had he not been diſingaged by Goodwin's moderation. That knight chuſing to forfeit his right rather than occaſion a quarrel between his Majeſty and the commons, deſired the houſe to order the county of Bucks to elect another repreſentative. Both King and commons willingly accepted this expedient, which prevented their proceeding to extremities; but James was hence convinced, that no great account was made of his proclamation on calling the parliament, whereby he pretended to be maſter of the elections.

The commons addreſs to James. June 16. Coke, p. 54.

This buſineſs ſatisfied the commons, that the King's intention was to ſound them, and that hereafter ſuch incidents might frequently be revived: for which reaſon, on the ſixteenth of June, addreſſing him concerning certain grievances, they took occaſion to repreſent their privileges, of which they ſuppoſed him not yet fully informed. This addreſs ſo diſpleaſed James, that, on the ſeventh of July, he prorogued the parliament, to have time for conſideration how he might humble the commons.

The clergy countenance James's principles touching arbitrary power. Coke, p. 60. Oſborn.

Moſt certainly, the majority of thoſe who approached the King, labored to inſpire him with the deſign of rendering himſelf abſolute, or rather to confirm him in his reſolution, by which they made their court completely; beſide, arbitrary power is no leſs advantageous to miniſters and courtiers, than detrimental to all other people. Diverſe writers charge the prelates with having been of the number of thoſe flatterers. Perhaps matters have been ſomewhat agravated: nevertheleſs, ſundry particulars give occaſion to believe, that the church of England clergy were inclined to aſcribe to the King more power than his predeceſſors had hitherto injoyed; at leaſt, it is certain that, from the reign of James I, to this preſent time, many members of that body have ſtrugled hard to convince the people, that they ought to acknowledge in the Sovereign unlimited authority, and have extended paſſive obedience as far in England as in the moſt deſpotic monarchies.

Archbiſhop Bancroft's attempt in the King's favor. Ibid.

Bancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a moſt zealous aſſerter of the prerogative-royal, was one of the firſt who attempted to paſs the uſual bounds, by cauſing to depend on the King's will ſuch matters as were undeniably within the parliament's juriſdiction. He exhibited to the King and council twenty-five grievances of the clergy, which were deſired to be reformed in granting prohibitions, that his Majeſty's courts might not have cognizance of what concerned theſe articles. It is ſaid, his view was to direct others the way to apply directly to the King, without regarding parliament or convocation: but James was told that, if he came into this prelate's meaſures, he would be ingaged in inextricable difficulties, becauſe redreſſing grievances had ever belonged to the parliament. This intimation induced James to conſult the judges, who unanimouſly anſwered, he ought to refrain from all deciſion touching the archbiſhop's motion.

Treaty of peace with Spain. Du Cheſne. Weldon. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 579. — 596. Stow. p. 845, &c. Weldon. Oſborn.

A pacific treaty with Spain ſoon followed the parliament's prorogation. Taxis having informed his Catholic Majeſty how the court of England ſtood affected, the conſtable of Caſtile was diſpatched to the Netherlands, with orders to paſs into England and conclude peace: but the conſtable, being by ſome affairs detained in Flanders, transfered his power to Taxis and Richardot. Theſe two deputies, arriving at London, agreed on a treaty, which however was not ſigned 'till the eighteenth of Auguſt, after the conſtable of Caſtile's arrival. Some affirm, that this embaſſador purchaſed peace with large ſums of money, diſtributed among King James's miniſters: but this can only be ſaid conjecturally, thoſe who are intruſted with ſuch ſort of intrigues not being accuſtomed to make them public (1). Howſoever this be, James's treaty with Spain was double, there being one wholly relating to commerce.

" By the IVth article of the firſt treaty, it was " agreed, that neither the Kings of England nor " Spain ſhould, directly or indirectly, give aid to " the enemies or rebels of the other party, of what " nature or condition ſoever they were.

" By the Vth, they renounced all former leagues, " confederacies, capitulations. and intelligences " contrary to that treaty.

Coke, p. 57.

" In the VIIth, King James excuſes the delivery " of the cautionary towns to his Catholic Majeſty, " and promiſes to enter into a treaty with the ſtates, " wherein he will aſſign them a competent time to " accept and receive terms for a pacification with " the archduke; which if they refuſed, he would " thenceforth think himſelf freed from all former " conventions with them."

(1) Weldon (p. 26, 27,) ſays, there was not one courtier of note but taſted of Spain's bounty, either in gold or jewels, and among them not any had ſo large a proportion as the counteſs of Suffolk, who ſhared in her lord's intereſt, being then a potent man, and in that intereſt which ſhe had in being miſtreſs to that little great ſecretary (little in body but great in policy) the ſole manager of ſtate affairs. So it may be ſaid, ſhe was a double ſharer: and in truth, Audley End, that famous great ſtructure, had its foundation of Spaniſh gold. He ſays, all Chriſtendom has ſince felt and ſeen the lamentable effect of this diſadvantageous peace.—— A peace, ſays Oſborn, more deſtructive to England than a war. He alſo obſerves, that the earl of Northampton was, by the Spaniſh gifts, inabled to build a noble houſe in the Strand; and there were many others in the kingdom had their foundation, if not their walls and roofs, plaiſtered with the ſame mortar. §. 4, 5.

Theſe

JAMES I. AN' 1604.

These are doubtleſs the articles which have given occaſion to ſay, the Spaniards bought peace. It does not however appear that, after this treaty, James withdrew his troops from the ſtates ſervice, as he ſhould have done by virtue of the fourth article, nor that he fixed a time for the ſtates to make a peace, purſuant to the ſeventh. On the contrary, it will be ſeen, that he delivered to them the cautionary towns for a much leſs ſum than was agreed on with Elizabeth. Moreover, André du Cheſne, in his hiſtory of England, touching on this treaty, gives us only four articles, whereof the fourth is directly contrary to the above-ſaid fourth article. According to that hiſtorian the article ran:

Du Cheſne.

"That, as to the ſtates of Holland and Zealand, "things ſhould remain as they were, as well with "reſpect to the cautionary towns, as to the other "articles of the treaties between Elizabeth and the "ſaid ſtates, without the King of England's being "obliged to recall his troops from the Netherlands; "or to forbid his ſubjects to ſerve the ſaid ſtates. "Moreover, that the commerce, trade and navi- "gation between the Engliſh and the ſaid ſtates "ſhould continue upon the ſame foot as in Eliza- "beth's days."

This contrariety makes me conjecture, that James, to pleaſe the Spaniard and archduke, was perſuaded to agree, that the fourth article ſhould be inſerted in the treaty in the manner firſt mentioned, in order to induce the ſtates to haſten a peace, and that this ſame article, as related by Du Cheſne, was a reſtriction of the firſt, or a ſecret article, which was alone to take place. This is ſo common in treaties, that this conjecture cannot be conſidered as groundleſs, eſpecially as it is confirmed by the event.

A company erected for a trade with Spain and Italy. Coke, p. 59.

Peace being thus concluded with the Spaniard, King James was prevailed on to grant a monopoly of the trade with Spain and Italy to a company of merchants, and to prohibit all his ſubjects, except ſuch as were authoriſed by this company, to traffic in either of thoſe countries. But in the parliament's next ſeſſion, the commons taking into conſideration how deſtructive to trade ſuch a monopoly was, repreſented ſo plainly to his Majeſty its pernicious conſequences, that the company's patent was revoked, and the trade with Spain and Italy declared free to all his ſubjects as before.

James in great tranquillity.

During the remainder of 1604 nothing remarkable paſſed in England. King James led a peaceable life amidſt the flatteries of his court, moſt laviſhly diſtributing bounties among his favorites. But this profuſeneſs highly diſguſted thoſe who had no ſhare in it, and yet deemed themſelves no leſs deſerving than thoſe minions. Queen Elizabeth took a very different method, but James was no way diſpoſed to be her imitator. Never were honors beſtowed with leſs diſcretion and more profuſion than in this reign. Accordingly, they were no longer conſidered as the reward of merit, but of adulation only.

Profuſe of titles and honors.

Oſtend taken. Thuanus. Stow. Winwood's Memoirs Vol. II. p. 29.

Oſtend, beſieged now three years by the Spaniards, was finally, on the twentieth of September, conſtrained to capitulate. By reducing this place, the conquerors gained only heaps of ruins, which had coſt them immenſe ſums, and the loſs of numberleſs officers and ſoldiers. Before James concluded the peace with Spain, he ſeemed inclinable to interfere in the preſervation of Oſtend: but when peace was made, he thought only of corroborating his new friendſhip with his Catholic Majeſty and the archduke, by ſending them embaſſadors.

AN' 1605. The lord admiral's embaſſady to Spain. Weldon. pag. 42. Baker.

James pitched on his high-admiral, the earl of Nottingham, for embaſſador extraordinary to Spain. The earl departed in March 1605, with a very numerous retinue, conſiſting according to ſome of no fewer than ſix hundred and fifty perſons (1).

And the earl of Hertford's to Bruſſels. *Sir W. Monſon.

At the ſame time, the earl of Hertford was ſent in embaſſy to Bruſſels. While he was at ſea, a Holland ſhip of war ſailed by, and refuſing to ſtrike, the Engliſh captain * prepared to compel him; but to this the embaſſador would not conſent. This was the firſt affront of that kind England had received from the Dutch, whoſe ſovereignity was not yet even acknowledged by any Potentate in Europe. Had James demanded reparation, doubtleſs, he might eaſily have obtained it, conſidering the then circumſtances of the United-Provinces. But, according to appearances, he judged it not worth his while to make a noiſe about what to him ſeemed of ſo little importance. The Engliſh however murmured at it, and many took occaſion to compare the King's indolence with Elizabeth's ſpirit, who moſt certainly would not have been ſo eaſy at ſuch inſults. James gave himſelf no trouble about it, believing that to avoid all occaſion of rupture with his neighbors was a more effectual way to procure his own and the nation's welfare, than to ingage in a war for ſo trifling a matter.

Jealouſies between the Engliſh and Scots. Wilſon. Weldon. Oſborn.

The jealouſy the Engliſh began to receive of the Hollanders, was nothing in compariſon of that cauſed by James's prodigal diſtribution of his favors among the Scots (2). Moſt writers tax the Papiſts with cheriſhing this jealouſy between the two nations, to make advantage of their diviſion. But, without being forced to recur to ſo remote a cauſe, I am of opinion, that the ancient enmity between the two kingdoms, and King James's inclination for the Scots, were much more natural cauſes of it. The King was no ſtranger to this jealouſy, and uſed ſome indeavors no allay it. He this year, in England, cauſed Thomas Douglas, a Scot, to be hanged, for counterfeiting his privy-ſeal on letters to diverſe Princes of Germany. This man falling into the hands of the elector Palatine, who diſcovered the fraud, was ſent over to England, where he had his due reward.

James's happy ſtate. Oſborn. Coke.

Hitherto King James was undiſturbed and ſurrounded with plenty, whereas he had in Scotland paſſed the firſt years of his life in confuſions and penury. Since his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, he had not been obliged to aſk money of his parliament, becauſe at his arrival he found the deceaſed Queen had not yet touched the laſt ſubſidy granted her, amounting to three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, the whole of which he had received. This, with the ordinary revenues, inabled him to be liberal to his favorites, of both nations, who ſoon grew very rich. On the other hand, he took delight in raiſing to honors and dignities ſeveral perſons who durſt not have aſpired to them in Elizabeth's reign. He moreover ſaw himſelf inceſſantly flattered by his courtiers, who neglected not any occaſion of ſhewing how much they admired his wiſdom and all his virtues: this was a neceſſary method to acquire his favor. To ſay all in a word, he paſſed his days very peaceably, in the midſt of plenty and effeminacies to which ſome pretend he was ſomewhat too much addicted (1). But this Prince has had the misfortune to have for hiſtorians ſuch as loved him not, as on the other ſide, he had the good fortune to have ſome who have indeavored to illuſtrate all his actions: ſo, there is danger of being greatly miſtaken, if the idea of his character be formed upon the commendations or invectives of his hiſtorians. It is better to keep ſolely to the examination of his actions and conduct.

(1) The Spaniards were aſtoniſhed at the magnificence of this embaſſy, and the handſome gentlemen; for it ſeems the Jeſuits reported our nation to be ugly, and like devils, as a puniſhment for caſting off the Pope; and they pictured ſir Francis Drake generally half a man half a dragon. So eaſy is it, ſays Wilſon, for thoſe jugglers, when they have once bound up the conſcience, to tie up the underſtanding alſo. Weldon, p. 42. Wilſon, p. 673.

Wilſon. Coke.

While all ſeemed concurring to procure King James a quiet and pacific reign, the devil, envying the happineſs of the Engliſh, inſpired ſome of his agents with one of the moſt horrible plots ever heard of. I mean the Powder-plot, which has made ſo much noiſe in the world, and of which I ſhall relate the particulars, without the leaſt exageration.

Occaſion of the powder-plot. Wilſon. Diſcourſe of the treaſon. Du Cheſne. Howes Contin. Stow. Speed. Coke, p. 61. &c. Oſborn. Winwood's Mem. Vol. II. p. 49. &c.

Whatever foundation the Papiſts might have for the hopes they entertained on beholding King James aſcend the throne of England, it is certain they expected from him great matters, and at leaſt a full toleration, with liberty of publicly exerciſing their religion: and on this toleration they grounded their hopes of reſtoring gradually their creed in England: but James's ſpeech to his parliament diſcovered two particulars. The firſt, that this toleration, which 'till then had been ſcarcely doubted, was not yet in any viſible readineſs. The ſecond, that tho' they ſhould obtain it of his Majeſty, it would not be for ſuch as acknowledged the Papal authority in its utmoſt extent. Theſe however were the people who were moſt active and eager to re-eſtabliſh their religion in England. They little regarded a bare liberty of conſcience for the moderate Catholics, to which James ſeemed to confine his favors; ſurmiſing it to be his Majeſty's meaning to divide the Catholics, and make of them two ſects, whereof one, renouncing the doctrine of the Pope's ſupremacy, ſhould be tolerated in the kingdom, and the other expulſed. This diviſion appeared to them ſo deſtructive to the Catholic religion, that they imagined the King, by this artful and politic conduct, intended to reconcile to the church of England ſuch as ſhould imprudently reject the Papal authority, as was the caſe under Henry VIII.

Account of the Powder treaſon. Diſcourſe of that treaſon in King James's Works. Speed. Thuanus. p. 135.

To prevent the execution of this imaginary project, which might be highly prejudicial to the church of Rome, ſome of theſe zealots conſulted together, and formed a horrible plot, which others afterwards approved. The chief of theſe wicked men was Robert Cateſby, a gentleman of Northamptonſhire, deſcended from the Cateſbies mentioned in the reign of Edward V. This perſon, having gained Thomas Percy, the earl of Northumberland's near kinſman, John Grant, Ambroſe Rookwood, John and Chriſtopher Wright, Francis Treſham, Guy Fawkes, ſir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes, choſe five of them to conſult how to reſtore the Romiſh religion in England. Percy, one of the moſt zealous, propoſed killing the King, and offered to perform it. To this Cateſby replied, "tho' the King was dead, their cauſe would not "be advanced, ſince he would leave ſons, who "perhaps would not be more favorable to the "Catholics: nay, ſuppoſing the King and his "children were removed, there would remain ſo "many of the nobles and gentry, that probably "it would be very difficult to accompliſh their "deſign." He added, "he had deviſed a "method inſtantly to deſtroy in a manner all the "Catholic religion's chief adverſaries, and to "throw England into ſuch a conſternation, "that not a man would be able to take proper "meaſures to oppoſe the execution of their de-"ſigns." This was by blowing up the parliament houſe, while the King ſhould be uttering his ſpeech from the throne to the lords and commons. Then he ſhewed them in what manner the project might be executed, and was by all applauded. However, as ſo monſtrous a conſpiracy could not but create ideas frightful and naturally ſhocking to conſcience, ſome moved to have the legality of the project examined by their divines. It is affirmed that Henry Garnet, Oſwald Teſmond and John Gerrard, on being conſulted, approved of the plot as juſt and lawful, ſince it was againſt excommunicated heretics. This I cannot warrant, not having ſeen their trials: but thus much is certain, they ſuffered death for not diſcovering the combination whereof they had ample notice, and the King in his apology, publiſhed ſome time after, aſſerted, that Garnet was legally convicted, and had confeſſed his crime.

JAMES I. AN' 1605.

Proceedings againſt Garnet. &c. in State-Try. Vol. I. Winwood's Mem. Vol. II. p. 170. Ibid.

Howſoever it be, the buſineſs being determined, they ſwore ſecreſy, the oath being, as it is ſaid, adminiſtered by father Garnet. Then Percy, being one of the gentlemen-penſioners, was appointed to hire a houſe, adjoining to the upper-houſe of parliament. This paſſed in November or December 1604, and the King was to make his ſpeech in parliament on the ſeventh of February. Percy having hired the houſe, the conſpirators began to dig in the cellar thro' the partition wall which, being very thick, gave them no ſlight imployment.* But as the parliament was prorogued to the third of October, they had as much time as was neceſſary to finiſh their work. In the begining of February 1605, they were got almoſt thro' the wall, when on a ſudden they heard a great noiſe on the other ſide. This threw them into a terrible panic, being apprehenſive of a diſcovery; but their courage reviving, Guy Fawkes, who paſſed for Percy's lackey, was ſent to ſee what had occaſioned their terror. He ſoon returning told them, that the place from whence the noiſe came, was a large cellar under the upper-houſe of parliament, full of coals, which were now under ſale, and the cellar offered to be lett. As nothing could be more favorable to their deſign, Percy immediately hired the cellar, and bought the remainder of the coals. Then he ſent for thirty-ſix barrels of powder from Holland, and lodging them at Lambeth, cauſed them to be conveyed in the night into the cellar, and covered with coals and faggots.

Fawkes's Confeſ.

The plot being thus in a fair way, it was conſidered what was to be done, when the King, Prince Henry his eldeſt ſon, the lords and commons, ſhould be buried in the ruins of the parliament-houſe. The duke of York, his Majeſty's ſecond ſon, being yet very young, was not to be preſent at the parliament, and his ſiſter, Princeſs Elizabeth, was educated at a houſe of lord Harrington's in Warwickſhire. It was therefore concluded, that Percy, who had free admitance into his Majeſty's palace, ſhould undertake diſpatching the duke of York, and that others, under color of a hunting-match, ſhould meet on the ſame day, near lord Harrington's houſe, and ſecure Princeſs Elizabeth. As all this could not be effected without money, Treſham offered two thouſand pounds ſterling,

Digby fifteen hundred, and Percy promiſed to furniſh four thouſand. Some moved for foreign aid beforehand; but the motion was rejected. It was reſolved only to demand aſſiſtance of France, Spain, and the archduke, when the buſineſs ſhould be executed. Then, after ſome conſultation, they agreed to ſave Princeſs Elizabeth, and proclaim her Queen. To this purpoſe, a proclamation was drawn up, wherein care was taken not to inſert any thing touching religion, for fear of alarming the people, 'till they ſhould be powerful enough to execute all their deſigns. Finally, they concluded on ſpreading a report, after the blow ſhould be given, that it came from the Puritans.

Winter's confeſſ.

The parliament being farther prorogued to the fifth of November, the conſpirators expected it with the utmoſt impatience, not one being touched with remorſe of the horrible treaſon they were about to perpetrate. But the Almighty, abhorring ſo deteſtable a villany, inſpired one of the conſpirators with a deſire to ſave lord Monteagle, lord

Octob. 26.

Morley's ſon. This nobleman returning home about ſeven in the evening, a letter was given him by his ſervant, who received it from a perſon unknown, with a charge to deliver it into his maſter's own hand. The letter was without name (1), and ran thus.

Diſcourſe of the Treaſon.

My LORD,

"OWT of the love I beare to ſome of your friends, I have a care of your preſervation. Therefore I would adviſe you, as you tender your life, to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance at this parliament. For God and man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſſe of this time. And thincke not ſlightly of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into your countrey, where you may expect the event in ſafetie. For though there be no appearance of any ſtirre, yet I ſay, they ſhall receave a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they ſhall not ſee who hurts them. This council is not to be contemned, bicauſe yt may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is paſt ſo ſoone as you burne the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good uſe of yt: to whoſe holy protection I commend you."

This letter was delivered to lord Monteagle ten days before the parliament's aſſembling. Tho' it was unintelligible to him, nay, tho' he imagined it only a trick to frighten him, he carried it that very evening to the earl of Saliſbury, ſecretary of ſtate. The earl ſhewed it to ſome privy-counſellors, who were as much at a loſs to comprehend its meaning as himſelf: nevertheleſs, they reſolved not to do any thing 'till the return of his Majeſty, then at Royſton.

Diſcourſe of the Treaſon. Winwood's Memoirs. Vol. II. p. 170, &c.

James returning to London the laſt day of October, the earl of Saliſbury read the letter to him, and concluded that it was written by ſome fool or madman. To convince the King, he repeated this ſentence, "The danger is paſt ſo ſoone as you burne "the letter." For, ſaid he, if the danger be paſſed when the letter is burned, what ſignifies this warning? But the King ordering the letter to be read again, explained the words otherwiſe, and ſaid, "ſo ſoon as you burne the letter," was to be interpreted, "in as ſhort a ſpace as you ſhall take to "burn the letter." Then comparing this ſentence with the foregoing, "That they ſhould receive a "terrible blow this parliament, and yet ſhould "not ſee who hurt them," he concluded that ſome ſudden blow was preparing by means of gun-powder (2). This interpretation being deemed very plauſible, it was reſolved, that all the rooms and cellars adjoining to the parliament-houſe ſhould be ſearched, to ſee if any powder was there concealed. However this ſearch was defered 'till the day before the parliament ſhould have met, in a belief, that the nearer the execution was, the more ſigns would be found. The earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, went himſelf to ſearch, without noiſe or hurry. When he came to the cellar where the powder was, and ſaw the coals and faggots with which it was covered, he aſked the wardrobe-keeper *, who attended him, to what uſe he had put the cellar? Whyneard anſwered, Mr. Percy had hired it, and the coals and wood were ſeemingly that gentleman's winter fuel. At this very inſtant, the lord chamberlain, perceiving in a corner a man ſtanding, and ſeemingly deſirous not to be ſeen, aſked who he was; and being told he was Mr. Percy's ſervant, ſeemed not to take any farther notice (3). This affected negligence made the conſpirators imagine there would not be any narrower ſcrutiny, ſince nothing was found in the cellar to create ſuſpicion, and they made ready to perpetrate their villany on the morrow.

Powder found hid under the houſe of lords. Diſcourſe of the Treaſon.

The earl of Suffolk having made his report to the council, it was judged that if any powder was concealed, it lay in the great cellar under the coals and faggots. But as the parliament was to meet next day, it was reſolved not to ſearch under the wood 'till midnight, in hopes to find in or about the cellar ſome perſons from whom information might be gathered. Purſuant hereto, ſir Thomas Knevet, gentleman of the privy-chamber, and juſtice of peace for Weſtminſter, going to the cellar about mid-night, found at the door a man, cloaked and booted, whom he inſtantly ſeized (4). This was Guy Fawkes, who paſſed for Percy's ſervant (5). Then cauſing the wood and coals to be removed, they under them met with thirty-ſix barrels of powder. On this diſcovery, Fawkes being ſearched, they found upon him a dark-lantern, tinder-box, and three matches (6). This villain, inſtead of being diſmayed, boldly told them, if he had been taken within the cellar, he would have blown up himſelf and them together. His Majeſty, having notice of this diſcovery, ordered the priſoner to be examined concerning the circumſtances of this combination. He confeſſed the deſign was to blow up the King and parliament, and expreſſed great ſorrow that it was not effected, ſaying, it was the devil and not God who was the diſcoverer. He all that day obſtinately refuſed naming any of his accomplices; but, on the morrow, being ſhewed the rack, confeſſed all he knew.

Diſcourſe of the Treaſon.

to ſecure Princeſs Elizabeth. Theſe latter were ready to execute their deſign the moment they learned the ſucceſs of their mine at Weſtminſter. As they queſtioned not its ſucceeding to their wiſh, and believed they had nothing more to manage, they had the night before broke open a ſtable, and conveyed away ſeveral horſes. This action alarmed the county-ſherif *, who had amaſſed ſome ſtrength in order to purſue and ſeize the robbers. Preſently after arrived thoſe conſpirators who fled from London, and informed their aſſociates of the plot's miſcarriage. Thereupon they reſolved on keeping together, to indeavor raiſing the Catholics, and then to head them: but all their efforts ended only in raiſing near a hundred horſe.

Some taken, others ſlain. Ibid.

Mean while, the ſherifs of the adjacent counties, having ſent each other notice, called the people to arms, and purſued the conſpirators from place to place, 'till the traytors were finally conſtrained to take harbor at Holbeach †, where the ſherif ſummoned them to ſurrender. They anſwered, he had not a ſufficient force to compel them; and prepared to defend themſelves, or fight their way thro' the ſurrounding multitudes: but in opening a barrel of powder to load their arms, it took fire and blew up part of the houſe. This accident forced them to open the gate, and attempt eſcaping. Some were inſtantly killed. Cateſby, Percy, and Winter, ſtanding back to back, fought deſperately, 'till the two firſt were killed with one ſhot, and the other taken alive, after receiving ſeveral wounds. Digby, Rookwood, Grant and Bates yielded, or were taken in indeavoring to eſcape. Treſham, who remained at London with Robert Winter, brother of Thomas Winter, and Littleton, was diſcovered and apprehended, with his two companions. All the priſoners were ſent to the Tower, and ſtrictly examined. Thomas Winter owned himſelf guilty, and even wrote down his confeſſion. Digby ſtrove to extenuate his crime, by alledging that, having expected the King would grant a free toleration to the Catholics, and not ſeeing any likelihood of their obtaining it, he was driven by deſpair to ingage in this treaſon. Treſham at firſt ſaid, that father Garnet, the Jeſuit, was privy to the conſpiracy, but afterwards denied it, and, as was pretended, by his wife's inſtigation, affirmed he had not ſeen him in ſixteen years. But Garnet, who was apprehended after Treſham's death, confeſſed he had frequently confered with him within ſix months. The earl of Northumberland was ſent to the Tower, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in the affair. This ſuſpicion was grounded on his being captain of the band of gentlemen penſioners, and admiting into it his couſin Percy, without adminiſtering to him the oath of ſupremacy, tho' he knew him to be a Romaniſt. This matter being afterwards brought into the ſtar-chamber, the earl was fined in thirty thouſand pounds ſterling, deprived of all his poſts, and impriſoned during his Majeſty's pleaſure.

James's ſpeech to his parliament to excuſe the Papiſts. K. James's Works.

The parliament ſat not 'till the ninth of November, tho' it was fixed to the fifth. The King made a long ſpeech, repreſenting the heinouſneſs and conſequences of this horrible plot, and magnifying God's mercy in the diſcovery. But withal he took great care to clear the Catholic religion, and to obſerve, that this abominable treaſon was to be aſcribed to ſuch only as were truly Papiſts, and imdued with the deteſtable principles ſpecified in his firſt ſpeech to the parliament. He affirmed, there were not many of theſe, and it would be extremely injurious to accuſe the Catholics in general of following ſuch extravagant maxims.

"For (added he) altho' it cannot be denied, "that it was only the blind ſuperſtition of their "errors in religion, which led them to this deſpe- "rate deviſe; yet doth it not follow, that all pro- "feſſing the Romiſh religion were guilty of the "ſame: for as it is true, that no other ſect of "Heretics, not excepting Turk, Jew, nor Pa- "gan, no, not even thoſe of Calicut, who adore "the Devil, did ever maintain, by the grounds "of their religion, that it was lawful, or rather "meritorious (as the Romiſh Catholics call it) "to murder Princes or people for quarrel of reli- "gion; yet it is true, on the other ſide, that "many honeſt men, blinded peradventure with "ſome opinions of Popery, as if they be not "found in the queſtions of the real preſenſe, or in "the number of their ſacraments, and ſome ſuch "ſchool-queſtion, yet do either not know, or at "leaſt not believe, all the true grounds of Po- "pery, which is indeed the myſtery of iniquity. "And therefore do we juſtly confeſs, that many "Papiſts, eſpecially our fore-fathers, laying their "only truſt upon Chriſt and his merits, at their "laſt breath, may be, and oftentimes are ſaved; "deteſting in that point, and thinking the cruelty "of Puritans worthy of fire, that will admit no "ſalvation to any Papiſt."

And then concluding that part of his diſcourſe, he declared, "As upon the one part, many honeſt "men, ſeduced with ſome errors of Popery, may "yet remain good and faithful ſubjects; ſo upon "the other part, none of thoſe who truly know "and believe the whole grounds of Popery, can "ever prove either good Chriſtians, or faithful "ſubjects."

The peoples reflections on James's ſpeech.

This ſpeech was highly applauded by the courtiers, who admired its wiſdom, juſtice, and equity, and made remarks on this greatneſs of ſoul in his Majeſty, who at the very time he had ſo much reaſon to complain of the Papiſts, took care to juſtify their religion, and hinder the innocent from being confounded with the guilty: but no others were of the ſame opinion. They conſidered, with grief and aſtoniſhment, the tender regard their King expreſſed for the Catholics in general, under pretenſe of a diſtinction which was thought imaginary, or at leaſt very uſeleſs, by reaſon of the difficulty of diſcerning thoſe who held the maxims he condemned, from thoſe who were willing to renounce them. They obſerved alſo the difference his Majeſty put between the Romiſh perſuaſion and that of the Puritans. The firſt hindered not its profeſſors from being faithful ſubjects, but the latter was not to be tolerated in any well-governed common-wealth, as he expreſſed himſelf in his former ſpeech. Here, to turn the hatred of the good Proteſtants upon the Puritans, he is not content with deteſting opinions indifferent in themſelves, and which had no relation to the ſtate, but even thinks it worthy of fire, either temporal or ſpiritual, for he does not ſay which, while he calls the dogma of tranſubſtantiation a mere ſchool-queſtion. It was alſo ſaid that if, on this ſame opinion, he had been pleaſed to diſtinguiſh the Puritans who did not, from ſuch as did damn all the Catholics, this diſtinction would have been as well-grounded as that between Catholics and Papiſts. In ſhort, it was obſerved, that he affected to aſcribe to the Puritans alone this opinion meriting flames, which he might much more juſtly have imputed to the Papiſts, as was known univerſally. It cannot be denied that, throughout the whole courſe of his reign, this Prince ſhewed exceſſive tenderneſs for the Roman Catholics. This will ſtill more evidently appear in the ſequel, ſince what has hitherto been advanced being ſeemingly capable of admiting a favorable, or at leaſt a dubious conſtruction.

James, having ended his ſpeech, prorogued the parliament parliament to the twenty-firſt of January; manifeſting thereby his aſſembling them for a ſingle day was purpoſely to ſhew his ſentiments of the conſpiracy, and the manner wherein he would have it examined, that is, with reſpect to ſuch only as were actually concerned.

Lords Mordant and Sturton, ſuſpected of being privy to the plot, were fined, the firſt ten thouſand marks, the other ſix thouſand, tho' there was no other proof againſt them, but their not coming to the parliament. They were ſentenced by the ſtar-chamber, which was then the grandees terror, condemning the parties accuſed, even of the ſlighteſt offenſes, in exorbitant fines to the King's profit (1).

AN' 1606. Coke, p. 61.

The powder-plot diſcovery was univerſally aſcribed to the penetration of his Majeſty, who alone unriddled the letter to lord Monteagle (2): nay, ſome of his flatterers ſcrupled not ſaying, he could never have dived into that myſtery without immediate aſſiſtance from the Holy Ghoſt (3).

Affected joy of the Spaniſh and archduke's embaſſadors. Howes.

His Catholic Majeſty's and the archduke's embaſſadors teſtified their joy for this deliverance, by bonfires before their doors, and fountains of wine for the populace. This was not perhaps a very proper method to remove the ſuſpicions of the Engliſh, who were apt to believe the Spaniards were concerned in this deteſtable plot (4). It was remembered that, when the conſtable of Caſtile was in England, he ſaid publicly, in caſe King James refuſed toleration to the Catholics, there would be found perſons capable of any attempt: nay, after the plot was diſcovered, the archduke refuſed ſurrendering ſome of the traytors who had eſcaped into the Netherlands (5), and ſent the chief of them to Spain, where he had a very good reception. It is however certain, theſe embaſſadors were not accuſed by any of the criminals in their depoſitions: nay, the King publicly declared, he was ſure no foreign Prince was privy to the conſpiracy. Indeed, all the Potentates, as well Popiſh as Proteſtant, expreſſed their abhorrence of ſo diabolical a deſign, and congratulated him on his deliverance.

Eight conſpirators executed. State Trials. Vol. I.

The parliament meeting the twenty-firſt of January, King James appointed commiſſioners to try the conſpirators. He had hitherto delayed giving his people the ſatisfaction to ſee theſe villains puniſhed: but perceiving, if he did it not of himſelf, the parliament would not fail petitioning him, he reſolved to give them over to juſtice. Eight only were executed the thirty-firſt of January, tho' the number of the guilty was much greater.

Alſo Oldcorn and Garnet, Jeſuits. May 3. Du Cheſne. State-Trials. Oſborn. Sect. 12. Howes. * Provincial of the Engliſh Jeſuits.

Some time after Oldcorn, a Jeſuit, ſaying openly, that the plot's ill ſucceſs rendered not the intention leſs equitable, was ſent to priſon, condemned and executed. Garnet, * being likewiſe apprehended, was ſentenced to die as a traytor, on the depoſitions of thoſe already executed. Some pretend, he only confeſſed he had heard of a project to reſtore the Catholic religion in England, but was ignorant of the circumſtances. Others affirm, the buſineſs was revealed to him only in confeſſion, wherefore he was not obliged to diſcloſe it, but the contrary. The King, as I obſerved, publicly declared afterwards, that Garnet was legally convicted. The Jeſuits have been pleaſed to honor theſe men with the title of martyrs, as if they had ſuffered only in hatred to their religion: but King James's humor and character will not admit its being ever ſuppoſed, that he took away peoples lives merely for being Papiſts.

JAMES I. AN' 1606.

While the parliament was conſidering the powder treaſon, it was ſuddenly rumored that the King was killed at Oking †. This rumor inſtantly threw the people into very great conſternation, imagining it was the effect of ſome freſh conſpiracy: but the alarm was ſoon over. Two hours after, came certain advice that his Majeſty was alive; and he even returned to London that very day, and publiſhed a proclamation to quiet the people. The Spaniſh embaſſador diſtinguiſhed his affection for the King, by preſenting ſir Lewis Lewkenor with a gold chain §, for bringing him news of his ſafety.

Mean while, the parliament ſeriouſly applied themſelves to prevent the deſigns of Popiſh recuſants, that is, of ſuch as refuſed to acknowledge his Majeſty's independent authority. For the readier detection of ſuch, the two houſes agreed to draw up a formal oath, which the ſubjects ſhould be obliged to take, none excepted. This oath was termed the oath of allegiance, that is, of ſubmiſſion and obedience to the King, as Sovereign, independent of all other earthly power. It differed from the oath of ſupremacy, as it concerned only his Majeſty's temporal ſovereignty, and his independence of the Pope; whereas the other, inacted in Henry VIII's time, obliged the ſubjects to acknowledge the King for ſupreme head of the church of England; ſo, every Catholic could ſafely take this new oath, except he was one of thoſe who thought that, to be a true Catholic, it was neceſſary to believe the Roman Pontif had power to depoſe Kings, and give away their dominions: nay, James was ſtrictly careful not to have the leaſt clauſe inſerted in the oath which might give the Papiſts any juſt offenſe. The commons having, in the rough draught of this oath, ſaid, "That the Pope has not power to excommunicate the King:" he urged that theſe words might offend his good Catholic ſubjects, and it ſufficed to aſſert, the Pope's excommunication could not authoriſe ſubjects to riſe againſt their Sovereign. Here follows the oath, which has been, and ſtill is talked of by many, without well knowing what it is.

Remark on this oath. King James's Works, p. 250.

Any one may readily perceive this oath contains nothing repugnant to the eſſential articles of the Romiſh creed, and concerned only the unlimited power which, by ſome, is aſcribed, and by others denied, to the Roman Pontifs. Accordingly, moſt of the Engliſh Romaniſts, with the arch-prieſt Blackwel their ſuperior, made no ſcruple to comply therewith: nay, when Urban VIII ſent them a brief, dated October, 1606, inhibiting their taking this oath, they deemed the brief forged by their adverſaries, to draw them into a non-compliance. But his Sanctity, next year, expreſſed himſelf in plainer terms, and by a ſecond brief flatly aſſured them that, if they took the oath, they forfeited all hope of ſalvation. At the ſame time, cardinal Bellarmine, under the borrowed name of Tortus, wrote a book againſt this oath, and a letter to the arch-prieſt Blackwel, admoniſhing him to repent, as if, in taking the oath, he had perpetrated one of the moſt horrible crimes. This occaſioned King James's apology, publiſhed ſome time after, addreſſed to all Chriſtian Princes, wherein he cleared himſelf from the falſe imputation of being a perſecutor of Catholics. He begins his ſaid apology with juſtifying Queen Elizabeth's conduct to the Romaniſts; and then proceeds thus.

" But now, having ſacrificed (if I may ſo ſay) " to the Manes of my late predeceſſor, I may next, " with St. Paul, juſtly vindicate mine own fame, " from thoſe innumerable calumnies ſpread againſt " me, in teſtifying the truth of my behavior to- " ward the Papiſts: wherein I may truly affirm, " that whatſoever was her juſt and merciful go- " vernment over the Papiſts in her time, my " government over them ſince hath ſo far exceeded " hers, in mercy and clemency, as not only the " Papiſts themſelves grew to that height of pride " in confidence of my mildneſs, as they did directly " expect and aſſuredly promiſe to themſelves liberty " of conſcience, and equality with other of my " ſubjects in all things; but even a number of the " beſt and faithfuleſt of my ſaid ſubjects were caſt " in great fear and amazement of my courſe and " proceedings, ever prognoſticating and juſtly " ſuſpecting that ſoure fruit to come of it, which " ſhewed itſelf clearly in the Powder-treaſon. And above all, how frankly and " freely did I free recuſants of their ordinary pay- " ments? beſide, it is evident, what ſtrait order " was given out of my own mouth to the judges " to ſpare the execution of all prieſts (notwith- " ſtanding their conviction) joining thereunto a " gracious proclamation, whereby all prieſts who " were at liberty, and not taken, might go out of " the country by ſuch a day: my general pardon " having been extended to all convicted prieſts in " priſon; whereupon they were ſet at liberty as " good ſubjects: and all prieſts who were taken " after, ſent over and ſet at liberty there. But " time and paper will fail me to make enumeration " of all the benefits and favors which I beſtowed " in general and particular upon Papiſts: In re- " counting whereof, every ſcrape of my pen would " ſerve but for a blot of the Pope's ingratitude " and injuſtice, in meeting me with ſo hard a " meaſure for the ſame."

Every ſyllable of what his Majeſty ſet down in this part of his apology was exactly true: but it is ſurpriſing that, ſince he thought proper to make a long apology to clear himſelf, to foreign Princes, from the aſperſion of being the Papiſts enemy, he ſhould never think of excuſing to his own ſubjects his too great condeſcenſion to theſe ſame Papiſts, and his extreme care to hinder the execution of thoſe laws inacted againſt them. There is alſo in this apology another very extraordinary particular. King James evidently manifeſts, that cardinal Bellarmine in his book confounds the oath of allegiance with that of ſupremacy, whereby it is very plain he underſtood not the point in diſpute: but enough has been advanced on this topic. I ſhall only, to conclude what relates to the Powder-plot, ſubjoin, that the parliament appointed the fifth of November to be a public thankſgiving-day for ſo ſignal a deliverance, which day has, even 'till now, been conſtantly ſolemniſed.

Remark on this apology.

Fifth of November appointed to be kept as a holy-day. Wilſon. Statut. 3 Jac. c. 1.

The common danger, which threatened the whole kingdom ſtifled, for a time, the variance between King and commons, which aroſe in the parliament's firſt ſeſſion. The commons were ſo far from meditating its revival that, on the contrary, to gain his Majeſty's good graces, they granted him one of the largeſt ſubſidies had ever been given to his predeceſſors in the moſt urgent occaſions of the ſtate, tho' he was then in profound peace, and only wanted money to inrich his minions. ing both kingdoms was defered to next ſeſſion: ſo James, having no farther occaſion for his parliament, prorogued it from the twenty-ſeventh of May to the eighteenth of November.

It is prorogued. Journ. Parl. Howes.

The conſternation cauſed, both at court and throughout England, by the Powder-plot, was finally converted into a ſweet tranquillity. King and people were alike pleaſed with being delivered from ſo terrible a danger; and King James had the more reaſon to be ſo, as he had brought the parliament to be of his moderate ſentiments towards Papiſts, of all whom ten only had been left to the law's rigor: neither was their burden any way agravated, except the obligation of ſwearing allegiance to their Sovereign, or departing the realm, was to be deemed agravation. On the other hand, James was able to gratify his favorites, by means of the ſubſidies granted by parliament, and the whole court were full of joy, every one expecting to partake of his Majeſty's bounties.

Great tranquillity in England.

James receives a viſit from the King of Denmark. July 11. Weldon. Howes.

This money came very ſeaſonably to inable King James to give a ſplendid reception to his brother-in-law, the King of Denmark, who ſoon after arrived, purpoſely to make the Queen his ſiſter, and her royal conſort a viſit (1). No coſt was ſpared, on this occaſion, to demonſtrate their Majeſties affection for this Prince, and to ſhew him the opulency of the crown they had acquired. During his ſtay in England, there was one continued tho' various ſcene of diverſions, as plays, ſights, entertainments, balls, maſquerades, hunting, and in ſhort whatſoever was judged proper to give him agreeable entertainment.

and from the Prince of Vaudemont. Sept. 23. Howes.

Some time after, the Prince of Vaudemont, the duke of Lorrain's third ſon, made King James another ſuch viſit, attended by ſeven counts, ten barons, forty gentlemen, with a hundred and twenty menials. He ſtayed fifteen days with his Majeſty, by whom he was, with his whole train, royally entertained. Theſe two viſits conſumed good part of the money lately granted by parliament.

The union of England and Scotland debated in parliament. Wilſon. Journ. Parl.

The ſeſſion of parliament, which began the eighteenth of November, was chiefly imployed in the union affair, which James ſollicited moſt ſtrenuouſly. Sir Francis Bacon, his Majeſty's ſollicitor-general, was ordered to move and ſupport it with the ſtrongeſt arguments he could deviſe: but tho' he was learned and eloquent, he met in the houſe of commons with perſons able to withſtand him, and to alledge as ſtrong reaſons againſt as he did for the union. The chief objections were, the inequality between the ſtate and riches of the two kingdoms; the difference of laws and cuſtoms; and Scotland's perpetual alliance with France: but the moſt prevailing argument, tho' it was not publicly inſiſted on, was the jealouſy of the Engliſh, which bafled all Bacon's rhetoric (2).

AN' 1607. James's ſpeech to the parliament in favor of the union. K. James's Works. Wilſon.

James, finding this affair was not likely to ſucceed in the parliament, ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, and indeavored, in a long ſpeech, to ſhew the neceſſity of ſuch union, and the common advantage it would procure. He anſwered the objections alledged in the two houſes, ſpeaking one while very mildly, another while in a menacing tone, and turning and winding every way to attain his ends. He urged its being not reaſonable, the Engliſh and Scots ſhould conſider each other as enemies, while ſubjects of the ſame King, and conſequently it was neceſſary all hoſtile laws ſhould ceaſe; meaning the laws made, from time to time, upon the frequent invaſions of the Scots on the borders of England. He added, it was no leſs reaſonable, there ſhould be between both nations community of traffic, ſince he was no ſtranger, but deſcended from the ancient Kings of England, and could not be natural liege-lord to both, while they were ſtrangers to each other. Finally, it was againſt nature, for people who lived under the ſame domination, to be no leſs diſunited than French and Spaniards.

JAMES I. AN' 1607.

He next proceeded to a point ſomewhat tickliſh, as he had himſelf determined a matter properly appertaining to the parliament's cogniſance. He ſaid, he was informed by the judges, there was a difference between the Ante-nati, and Poſt-nati, of each kingdom, that is, between ſuch as were born before, and ſuch as were born after his acceſſion to the Engliſh crown. That therefore he had iſſued a proclamation, declaring all thoſe to be naturaliſed in both realms who were born ſince his acceſſion: that indeed he confeſſed the judges might err; but admoniſhed both houſes, "to beware to diſgrace, "either his Proclamations or the Judges, for ſo "they might diſgrace both their King and the "laws, who have power, when the parliament "is done, to try both their Lands and Lives."

He ſpeaks of his proclamation in favor of the Poſt-nati.

In anſwering the objection taken from the perpetual alliance between France and Scotland, he affirmed, the alliance was not between the two nations, but only between their Kings. I know not whether this was really fact.

He concluded his ſpeech with ſaying, "What "is now deſired, hath oft before been ſought, and "not obtained; wherefore to refuſe it now were "double iniquity. And for their ſecurity in ſuch "reaſonable points of reſtriction, which he ſhall "agree to, they need not doubt his inclination; "for (added he) I will not ſay any thing which I "will not promiſe; nor promiſe any thing which I "will not ſwear; what I ſwear, I will ſign; and "what I ſign, I ſhall with God's grace ever per-"form."

The union rejected. Wilſon. Statut. 4. Jac. c. 1.

The earneſtneſs James expreſſed for a union, between the two kingdoms, was not capable of prevailing with the parliament; ſuch were the ſuppoſed inconveniencies. All he could obtain, was a revocation of the hoſtile laws. Thus was the union rejected, without any mention of the proclamation concerning the Poſt-nati: but, by not approving it, the parliament did in reality reject it, ſince in England proclamations are not conſidered as laws. Nevertheleſs, two years after, James cauſed this ſame affair to be decided by the judges of the realm, tho' ſuch deciſion was of no more validity than the proclamation.

Coke, p. 62.

James was greatly nettled at the ill ſucceſs of this buſineſs. In his firſt ſpeech to the parliament, he called ſuch as were againſt uniting Scotland with England, blind, ignorant, reſtleſs, diſaffected, &c. and affirmed no honeſt ſubject whatever was leſs glad of this union than himſelf: but he now found the lords and commons averſe to it, and this caſt a ſort of ridicule on his too precipitate judgment. From that time, he always appeared very much to diſlike parliaments; as, on the other hand, the people began to be as much diſguſted with him. They could not, without grief, behold ſo many proclamations, which ſeemed to ſuppoſe his Majeſty's will to be the ſole ſtandard of government. His unneceſſary expenſes were another cauſe of complaint, becauſe weighed againſt Queen Elizabeth's frugality and good management. It was conſidered, the three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds James had received at his arrival, with what was lately granted by the parliament and clergy, ſerved only to inrich his favorites and miniſters. All this began to gather a cloud, which

Before the parliament's prorogation, happened ſome commotions in Northamptonſhire, where the country people roſe in arms, under conduct of one * who ſtiled himſelf captain Pouch; but theſe troubles were ſhort-lived: the ſherif of that county, without the aſſiſtance of any regular troops, found means to diſperſe thoſe revolters.

The earl of Tir-oen quits Ireland on pretenſe of religion. Sept. Howes.

Tir-oen, the famous Iriſh rebel, pardoned by Queen Elizabeth, was early in this reign brought to London, by lord Montjoy, and preſented to his Majeſty, who gave him a gracious reception. Shortly after, he returned home, where he could not keep himſelf quiet. He not only re-attempted raiſing a rebellion in Ireland, but alſo applied to foreign Potentates for aſſiſtance. His ſecret practiſes not ſucceeding to his expectation, he feared being apprehended, and choſe to leave Ireland, taking with him the earl of Tirconnel, whom he had allured into his plots. When got to a place of ſafety, he gave out, that the outrages commited in Ireland upon the Catholics had conſtrained him to forſake his eſtate and country. But James briſkly repelled this aſperſion by a ſort of apology, publiſhed on this occaſion, not induring to paſs in the world for a perſecutor of Catholics.

The King's apology. Novem. 15. Du Cheſne. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 664.

In the begining of this year, the archduke and the Infanta his conſort, ſent into Holland father Ney, provincial of the Franciſcans, to propoſe a peace with the ſtates of the United-Provinces. Ney, lying concealed for a time at Ryſwick, was finally admited to audience by Prince Maurice, who flatly told him, no peace muſt be hoped, except the United-Provinces were owned for a free and independent ſtate. This declaration obliged his paternity to retire to Bruſſels, whence he returned ſome time after, with a writing ſigned by the archduke and Infanta, wherewith the ſtates were content, provided it was ratified by his Catholic Majeſty, which ratification Ney undertook to procure. Henry IV, hearing what was tranſacting at the Hague, diſpatched preſident Jeannin, to offer the ſtates his mediation, which was accepted. But as they feared to create jealouſy in King James, if France alone was concerned in the affair, they wrote to him for his advice and aſſiſtance, and ſoon after ſent an embaſſador to inform him more particularly of the ſituation of their affairs. Mean while, the King of Spain's ratification arriving, the ſtates found it replete with ambiguous and captious expreſſions, which gave them occaſion to require explanations. This prolonged the negociation, the ſucceſs whereof ſhall be touched on elſewhere (1).

James's exceſſive profuſeneſs. Coke. Wilſon. Oſborn.

The miniſtry's chief concern was to ſee that his Majeſty wanted not money. He ſtood in need of vaſt ſums, being exceſſively liberal, or rather prodigal (2), and it may well be imagined that, in procuring money for the King, his miniſters did not forget themſelves: but this is ſo cuſtomary with favorites and miniſters, that it would be wrong to charge them with it in particular. As to foreign affairs, they were not, during this whole reign, very much regarded.

Monopoly of cloths; Coke, p. 69, 70.

One of the propereſt methods deviſed to procure money for his Majeſty, was monopoliſing the ſale of cloths, at the ſollicitation of a certain merchant, who, in all appearance, dearly purchaſed his patent. At this time, the Engliſh were not ſkilled in the art of dreſſing and dying Engliſh woollen manufactures. They ſent them white over to Holland, and the Hollanders having dyed them, returned them back to England in order for ſale. The ſaid merchant, intimating to King James and his miniſtry, that a great profit would accrue to England if the cloths were dreſſed at home, obtained a patent to dreſs and dye them, excluſive of all others. Thereupon the King iſſued a proclamation, forbiding all perſons to export any cloths undyed. This induced the Hollanders to prohibit the importation of dyed cloths from England. So the merchant who obtained the patent, not being able to vend his cloths any where but in England, was obliged to dreſs and dye only a ſmall quantity. This raiſed ſuch clamors among the cloth-weavers, that the King was forced to permit the exportation of a certain quantity of white cloths. At length, the court by degrees connived at the offenders, and the woollen-trade was re-eſtabliſhed on its former footing.

The ſame year, James ingroſſed the vending of allum, which had been lately found out in England, and prohibited by proclamation the importing foreign allum.

Diſpute between James and the Hollanders about the fiſhery. Coke.

Whether King James was diſpoſed to be revenged on the Hollanders for breaking his meaſures with reſpect to the woollen manufactures, or only to draw money from them, a proclamation was publiſhed, prohibiting all foreign nations to fiſh on the coaſts of Great-Britain. This occaſioned next year a treaty, whereby the Hollanders ingaged to pay a yearly ſum for leave to fiſh. James wanted afterwards to break this treaty, and would have recalled the licenſe he had granted them; bu', ſpite of him, they maintained their privilege by guarding their fiſhing-boats with warlike ſhips. James, being a pacific Prince, deemed not this a ſufficient motive for a rupture.

Bancroft perſecutes the Puritans.

Archbiſhop Bancroft never ceaſed plaguing the Puritans, to force their conformity to the church of England. This induced great numbers of theſe people to determine on ſettling in Virginia, diſcovered in the late reign by ſir Walter Ralegh. In effect, ſome departed for that country; but the archbiſhop, finding abundance more were ready for the ſame voyage, obtained a proclamation, injoining them not to go without his Majeſty's expreſs permiſſion. The court grew apprehenſive this ſect would finally become too numerous and powerful in America. This very year, the archbiſhop made a freſh attempt, concerning the twenty one articles formerly mentioned: but ſo ſtrenuous was the judges oppoſition, that James, how deſirous ſoever he was to humor that prelate, durſt not proceed.

treaties, the firſt whereof was concerning the payment of what was owing him. The other contained an alliance, which was not to take place 'till after they had concluded a peace with Spain (1). Then he ſent ſir Robert Spenſer to the Hague, to aſſiſt at the pacific negociations, jointly with ſir Ralph Winwood, his embaſſador in ordinary. Numberleſs difficulties occurred in this affair, the chief whereof was, his Catholic Majeſty's refuſing to ſpeak plainly with reſpect to the ſtates liberty. He had ratified the archduke's declaration on that head, but it was on condition, peace ſhould be concluded, and the ſtates would treat only on the foot of free ſtates: beſide, in the King of Spain's ratification were certain ambiguous expreſſions, wherewith the ſtates were not ſatisfied. They were likewiſe ſenſible that while they were negociating at the Hague, the Spaniſh court was indeavoring to gain the King of England, and, for that purpoſe, had ſent to him Don Fernando de Girona, a nobleman of great diſtinction, as his extraordinary embaſſador. This gave the ſtates great uneaſineſs, and the more, as James affected on all occaſions to intimate, that he regarded them as rebels. He applied to their caſe the general maxims of ſovereignty, and firmly believed, what he would have had univerſally thought, that ſubjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their Prince on any account whatſoever: whence may be judged what effect this mediation could produce; accordingly his embaſſadors made a very inconſiderable figure throughout the whole negociation. Jeannin managed all, the Engliſh embaſſadors acting but faintly, and ſhewing little or no deſire that the treaty ſhould ſucceed.

James openly blames the ſtates. Welwood.

What efforts ſoever Jeannin might uſe, he could not poſſibly procure the parties conſent to a pacification; and therefore he finally propoſed a twelve or fifteen years truce, during which both ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of what they held, without prejudice to their rights and pretenſions: but this the ſtates rejected, except their liberty was clearly and effectually eſtabliſhed. Thereupon the embaſſadors of Spain and the archduke withdrew, as ſeeing no probability of either peace or truce. Nevertheleſs Jeannin continued his inſtances to perſuade the ſtates to accept the Spaniard's ratification as it was, and agree to ſome other articles whereon there had been great debates. At length, by reiterated repreſentations he obtained of the United-Provinces (Zealand excepted which ſtood out 'till the inſuing year) what he deſired to accompliſh for concluding the truce.

Teſtimony of preſident Jeannin. Lettres de Jeannin.

King James gained not much credit by this negociation. Beſide his leaving all to the King of France, he acted not with ſincerity, if we may believe preſident Jeannin, who, in a letter to the King his maſter, on this occaſion, ſpeaking of King James, ſays, "He pretends a willingneſs to procure a peace, and yet obſtructs it, by publicly ſaying, he cannot forbear condemning the ſtates for rebelling againſt the King of Spain their Sovereign." In effect, Richardot ſcrupled not owning, in a letter to Jeannin, that the Catholic King's firmneſs was intirely owing to the King of England's promiſe, that the liberty of the ſtates ſhould not be mentioned in the treaty of truce. Henry IV had no great opinion of James, as appears from his writing to Jeannin, "that he knew "what that----was capable of; but however it did "not break his reſt."

Zealand, finally reſolving to follow the ſentiment of the other provinces, the conferences were renewed at Antwerp, where a twelve years truce was ſigned, April the ninth, 1609. By this truce, the ſtates obtained that the King of Spain and archduke owned them as free and independent, and even avoided renouncing the navigation and trade to the Indies, which had been a principal obſtacle to the negociation.

JAMES I. AN' 1609.

A twelve years truce in the Netherlands. Grotius. Howes.

James expreſſed not any ſatisfaction at the advantages obtained by the ſtates, becauſe he conſidered it as a precedent very dangerous and prejudicial to the ſovereign authority of Kings, wherewith he was ever ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed. This evidently appeared at preſent, by his licenſing two books, which maintained the moſt extravagant maxims of deſpotic power. The firſt, written by Cowel, doctor of civil law *, laid down theſe three principles:

James diſcovers more and more his principles concerning the regal power. Books on that ſubject. Coke, p. 63. * Not divinity, as in the French.

1. That the King was not bound by the laws, or his coronation-oath.

2. That the King was not obliged to call a parliament to make laws, but might do it alone by his abſolute power.

3. That it was a great favor to admit the conſent of ſubjects in giving ſubſidies.

The other book was compoſed by Blackwood, a divinity doctor, who laid down this principle, that the Engliſh were all ſlaves, by reaſon of the Norman conqueſt.

The parliament, which aſſembled in the inſuing year, took this affair to heart, and would have ſeverely puniſhed the authors of theſe books; but James interpoſed, and fruſtrated the parliament's deſign, by iſſuing a proclamation, to forbid reading thoſe books, and to order all copies being delivered to the magiſtrates. But commonly ſuch proclamations are ill-obeyed, eſpecially when it is not the Sovereign's intereſt to ſee them ſtrictly executed (2).

He diſappoints the juſtice of the parliament. Ibid. Howes, p. 898.

James's proceedings increaſed the diſcontent of moſt of the Engliſh. The proclamations which daily came out, and whereof ſeveral were on ſubjects never decided by preceding Kings without the parliament's concurrence, and the indiſcreet diſcourſes of the courtiers, who paſſed ralleries on the peoples privileges, bred ſuſpicions and jealouſies which James was not ſufficiently careful to ſtifle in their birth. On the other hand, his condeſcenſion for the Roman Catholics, whoſe cauſe he eſpouſed on all occaſions, their acceſs and credit at court, admitance into the moſt important offices, nay even into the miniſtry, created fears in the people, and cauſed them to ſuſpect ſome plot was formed againſt the Proteſtant religion. The miniſters, no ſtrangers to theſe diſpoſitions, were juſtly apprehenſive of meeting great difficulties in the parliament, which was to ſit the ninth of February. The King intended to procure money, of which he was in great want, tho' he had no war upon his hands, nor any affair which ſeemed to require extraordinary ſubſidies. It was therefore neceſſary to give the parliament at leaſt fair words, and try to palliate his profuſe expenſes ſince his acceſſion to the crown. But James, deeming it derogatory to the dignity of a Sovereign to make a perſonal apology to his ſubjects, ordered the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury to do it for him.

Having thus indeavored to procure his Majeſty the good-will of both houſes, by ſuch a ſtrong argument of their Sovereign's regard for them, he demonſtrated, " it was not without juſt " reaſons that the King demanded money, ſince " what he had received had been laid out in very " neceſſary expenſes. Firſt, as for the three hun- " dred and fifty thouſand pounds due in the late " Queen's time, he no ſooner received the money " with one hand, but he paid it away with the " other, in redeeming the crown-lands ſhe had " mortgaged to the city of London (1). Secondly, " he was forced to keep on foot, for ſome time, " an army of nineteen thouſand men in Ireland, " not deeming it proper to make peace with Spain " without the ſword in his hand. 3. He was " obliged to bury Queen Elizabeth, whoſe obſe- " quies were very expenſive (2). 4. His own " journey from Edinburg to London could not be " performed without money; for it would not " have been decent for a King to come the firſt " time to his kingdom like a private perſon, and " without a numerous train. 5. Neither was it " fit that his royal conſort, with his children, the " kingdom's future hopes, ſhould be expoſed to " robbers, without a guard and retinue, and con- " ſequently their journey muſt have been very " chargeable. 6. The King of Denmark's viſit " was ſo honorable to his Majeſty, that he could " not diſpenſe with giving him a futable and " magnificent reception. 7. The embaſſadors " who came from all parts to congratulate him " on his acceſſion to the crown of England, could " not be ſent back without preſents, for the honor " of the Engliſh nation, beſide the charge to en- " tertain them during their ſtay (3). 8. The King " was obliged to ſend embaſſadors to the Princes " by whom he was congratulated, and to return " their civilities (4).

Theſe were, according to the orator, the cauſes of his Majeſty's wants, and not, as ſome affected to give out, his indiſcreet bounty to his ſervants. " But, added he, how could a bounty " ſo worthy of a King be blamed? If he did not " give to his ſervants, they would be miſerable in " a country abounding with riches. As for the " Scots, it muſt be remembered, that tho' they " were not born in the kingdom, his Majeſty " was born among them; and not to have them " taſte of the bleſſing he had attained, was to have " him change his virtue with his fortune. Upon " all theſe accounts, his Majeſty deſires the com- " mons to ſupply his wants, which mark of eſteem " could not be denied to a King, who is not only " the wiſeſt of Kings, but the very image of an " angel, who has brought good tidings to the " Engliſh, and ſecured them in the injoyment of " perfect happineſs; to a King who, by his vaſt " knowledge and noble indowments, deſerves the " title of Defender of the Faith; to a King who " has ſhut the back-door by which England was " liable to invaſions, and who only ſeeks that " every man may live happy under his own olive. " That none will wonder or ſtartle at the King's " deſiring a ſupply, but ſuch as ſtudy to ſerve " their own turns, and believe nothing but what " they find written in the ſtories of their own " ignorance. Among whom are to be reckoned " thoſe, who hearing of an order to bind up the " printed proclamations in a book, that the better " notice may be taken of the things contained in " them, have ſpread a report, that the King in- " tended * to make proclamations equal to the " laws, which never entered into his thoughts. " That ſo far is he from governing by will and " pleaſure, that he is ready to hearken to any " motion from the two houſes, provided they " keep a juſt proportion, and obſerve what is due " to a great and gracious King."

James I. An' 1610.

* During this very parliament.

This ſpeech produced not the effect hoped by the King and his miniſters. Some of the commons loudly complained of the King's prodigality, and exceſſive bounty to the Scots (5). They ſaid, the whole wealth of England would not ſerve to ſatiate their greedineſs; that, ſince the King's acceſſion, gold and ſilver were as common in Edinburg as ſtones in the ſtreets; and that all the riches of England flowed thither, where they were ſwallowed up as in a gulph, and never returned. Others ſaid, it was viſible, the King was gradually undermining the nation's privileges by continual incroachments: that he deſigned to eſtabliſh the civil law inſtead of the common law, and had droped ſome expreſſions to that purpoſe at his own table: finally that he had approved of a book lately written, the deſign whereof was to render the common law contemptible.

Complaints againſt the King in the houſe of commons; Wilſon. p. 681.

But what made moſt noiſe in the lower houſe was the high commiſſion, which exerciſed in the kingdom a kind of inquiſition for matters of religion and ſtate. For the better underſtanding this cauſe of complaint, it muſt be remembered that, when Henry VIII was declared ſupreme head of the Church of England, he appointed Cromwell for his vicegerent in religious affairs, with power in his name to exerciſe the ſupremacy. After the tragic cataſtrophe of this firſt and ſole vicegerent, this office was executed by commiſſioners: and this is what was termed the high commiſſion, which continued during the lives of Henry VIII and Edward VI, and, ceaſing in Mary's reign, was revived by Elizabeth. In her reign, the high commiſſion exerciſed its authority with great moderation: but the caſe was otherwiſe under James I. This Prince, as I have frequently obſerved, mortally hated the Puritans, and after his proclamation for uniformity, it was the high commiſſion's buſineſs to ſee his injunctions executed. It may eaſily be gueſſed that the commiſſioners who were all named by the King, were not favorable to the Puritans: accordingly, they exerciſed their power with the utmoſt rigor. Had they ſtoped there, this ſeverity upon a ſet of obſtinate people, as they were reckoned, and whoſe number was ſmall in compariſon of the Epiſcoparians, would not have excited the commons complaints. But they puſhed matters abundantly farther. I have obſerved that, becauſe the Puritans were againſt the hierarchy, James infered they were alſo againſt monarchy, and there were but too many who labored to confirm him in this notion. For this reaſon, all who were not extremely ſubmiſſive to his Majeſty's orders, or were ſtrenuous aſſertors of the peoples privileges, were affectedly ſtiled Puritans. Under this pretenſe, the high commiſſion proceeded againſt them, and wanted not means to prove vexatious. Thus to be a true Proteſtant and member of the Church of England, communicating in that church, and complying with its external worſhip ſufficed not, the King's authority muſt alſo be acknowledged as extenſive as his flatterers were pleaſed to make it. Such as preſumed to cenſure his conduct, and queſtion his unlimited power, were deemed infected with Puritaniſm, and to reaſon upon Puritanical principles: ſo, there were then two ſorts of Puritans, Church-Puritans, and State-Puritans; but the high commiſſion affected to confound the one with the other, in order to exerciſe authority over both. This occaſioned thoſe complaints made in the houſe of commons.

James, having notice of what was diſcourſed in parliament, ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, and indeavored to ſhew he was charged very unjuſtly: but withal he intimated, by certain expreſſions which plainly diſcovered his ſentiments, that if he did not rule with a deſpotic ſway, it was not for want of power, but intirely owing to his equity.

The King's ſpeech to both houſes. Wilſon, p. 682.

He told them, "Tho' the King's heart be in "the hands of the Lord, yet he will ſet it before "the eyes of the people; aſſuring them, that he "never intended to govern by any law but the "law of the land; tho' it be diſputed among them, "as if he had a deſign to alter the law, and govern "by the abſolute power of a King. He knew, "he ſaid, the power of Kings, reſembling it to "the power divine: for as God can create and "deſtroy, make and unmake at his pleaſure, ſo "Kings can give life and death, judge all, and be "judged of none. They can exalt low things, and "abaſe high things, making the ſubjects like men "at cheſs, a pawn to take a biſhop. And when "he had raiſed the King's power to the height, "with, 'Ye are Gods,' he brings them down again "with, 'They ſhall die like Men:' and that all "Kings, who are not tyrants or perjured, will "bound themſelves within the limits of their laws; "and they who perſuade them the contrary, are "vipers and peſts both againſt them and the "commonwealth. Yet as it is blaſphemy to diſ-"pute what God may do, ſo it is ſedition in "ſubjects to diſpute what a King may do in the "height of his power: and as he will not have "his ſubjects diſcourſe of what he may, ſo he will "do nothing but what ſhall be conſonant to law "and reaſon. Then he ſtrives to mitigate the "ſharpneſs of the words droped from him at his "table, in diſparagement of the common law, "whereon he beſtows very high encomiums; but "recalling himſelf, he points out ſome corruptions "in it(1).

"He next addreſſes himſelf to the houſe of "commons, and not only thanks them for the "bonfire they made of certain papers, which "were preſented as grievances from ſome diſ-"contented murmuring ſpirits; inſtructing them "how to receive grievances hereafter: in which he "would have them careful to avoid three things.

"Firſt; that they meddle not with the main "points of government, that is his craft: to "meddle with that were to leſſen him, who hath "been thirty years at the trade in Scotland, and "ſerved here a ſeven years apprenticeſhip.

"Secondly; he would not have ſuch ancient "rights as he hath received from his predeceſſors "accounted grievances; that were to judge him "unworthy to injoy what they left him.

"And laſtly; that they ſhould be careful not to "preſent that for a grievance which is eſtabliſhed "by a law; for it is very undutiful in ſubjects to "preſs their King wherein they are ſure to be "denied. Complaints may be made unto them "of the high commiſſioners, let the abuſe appear "then, and ſpare not; there may be errors among "them: but to take away the commiſſion, is to "derogate from him; and it is now in his thoughts "to rectify it in a good proportion.

"Then he ſhews the emergent cauſe of his great "expenſes, ſince his coming to the crown, which "makes him deſire a ſupply from them: and if "they refuſe to grant it him, his reputation will "ſuffer at home and abroad; for the world will "think it want of love in them, or merit in him, "which both leſſened their hearts, and tied up "their hands towards him."

The commons diſſemble their reſentment.

There needs no great penetration to diſcover in this harangue the maxims whereon James pretended to have a right to govern the Engliſh nation, and his idea of monarchy in all countries, indiſcriminately. He expreſſed himſelf in ſuch plain terms, that it would have been difficult not to have comprehended his meaning. If it was ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute the extent of regal power, it neceſſarily followed, the King might do whatever he pleaſed; and if he ruled not like a tyrant, it was not for want of power, but intirely owing to his juſtice and clemency. In ſhort, if the whole ſpeech be examined, there is ſcarce a word but what tends, either plainly or ambiguouſly, to eſtabliſh in the King a deſpotic and abſolute power. The Engliſh had not been accuſtomed to hear their Kings talk thus. Henry VIII, the moſt arbitrary of all, managed his parliaments, in order to procure acts in favor of the Sovereign, but never pretended to eſtabliſh his authority on ſuch principles. So the commons, evidently perceiving what James had in view, determined ſtrenuouſly to oppoſe his deſigns; but it was not yet a proper ſeaſon to begin: ſuch great bodies require time to form and execute their projects. They feigned therefore to take no notice of the maxims the King would have eſtabliſhed, and granted a ſubſidy, tho' a much more moderate one than he expected. This done, the parliament, having ſat 'till the twenty-third of July, was prorogued to the ſixteenth of October. Jour. Parl.

Before the ſeſſion ended, James created his eldeſt ſon Henry, Prince of Wales, and ſettled his houſhold, ſo that the young Prince kept his court at St. James's, while the Queen kept hers at Somerſet-houſe, to which ſhe gave the name of Denmark-houſe; but it was called ſo only during her life, and among her own people. Thus King James had three courts to maintain, which were very expenſive.

so gained him the love and esteem of the English, that James could not but be jealous. His court was well regulated, no extravagancies or indecencies were seen there, except perhaps the too frequent masquerades, which were then much in vogue, because the Queen passionately affected those diversions. As for the King, it is said, he imployed not much of his time in state-affairs, but intirely trusted to his ministers. This is possibly somewhat exagerated, tho' it is not very improbable that a Prince who was in peace with all the world, and a great lover of books, and hunting, should leave common affairs to his ministers.

War about the duke of Cleves's succession. Grotius. Wilson.

While James lived in profound tranquillity, the eyes of all Europe were fixed on Henry IV's grand project to humble the house of Austria. This house daily grew so formidable, that it might very justly excite a jealousy in other Powers. What had lately happened, on account of the succession of John William, duke of Cleves, was a clear evidence how attentive the house of Austria was to agrandise itself on all sides. The duke of Cleves dying the twenty-fifth of March 1609, his four sisters, or their heirs, claimed his inheritance, containing the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, and the earldoms of La Marc, Bergh, Ravensbergh, and Ravestein. The chief competitors were, Wolfgang-William, the duke of Newburg's son; John duke of Deux-ponts, both of the Palatine family; John Sigismond, elector of Brandenburg; Christian II elector of Saxony, and Charles of Austria, marquis of Burgaw. While these Princes contended about the succession, the Emperor Rodolphus II pretended it was to be commited to his trust, 'till the affair was decided. To that purpose, he sent his orders to Leopold of Austria, bishop of Strasburg who, entering the duchy of Juliers at the head of an army, took the capital city, and left therein a garison. This procedure convincing the elector of Brandenburg, and the duke of Newburg, that while they were contending about the duke of Cleves's succession, they both ran the risk of losing it, they joined in a league, and taking possession of the deceased duke's other dominions, requested the aid of France and Holland to support them. Henry IV, who had now made great preparations against the house of Austria, promised to assist them personally. At the same time, he ordered the troops he had in Holland to be ready to join him in the duchy of Cleves, and desired the states to send thither also Prince Maurice, with part of their own forces. But while he was preparing for this expedition, he was by Ravaillac assassinated in his own coach, in the midst of Paris (1).

The murderer's confession (2) discovered, that this regicide was perpetrated in consequence of that Romish dogma which was so disagreeable to King James, and the Jesuits were universally believed deeply concerned: wherefore James, finding how much it behoved him to remove from his person men who held so detestable a doctrine, issued a fresh proclamation, commanding all Jesuits * to depart the kingdom, and all recusants not to come within ten miles of the court. Then he caused his subjects to take the oath of allegiance, which the parliament, still siting, had first taken.

James desirous of matching his eldest son with Spain. Wilson. Winwood's Memoirs Vol. III. p. 291.

The court of Spain was generally suspected of contriving the King of France's murder, because that Prince was known to be making great preparations against the house of Austria, and that house was not seen to prepare to oppose his designs. Mean while, whether James did not believe it, or judged it advisable to gain the friendship of a house so formidable to the Protestants, he sent to sir Charles Cornwallis (3), his embassador, to negociate a match between the Prince of Wales and his Catholic Majesty's eldest daughter (4).

Bancroft's death. Wilson.

Richard Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, the Puritans capital enemy, died about this time. He had procured the King's patent to found a college at Chelsea, for the maintenance of a certain number of able controversists who, with their sermons and writings, were to combat the church of England's adversaries, as well Puritans as Papists; but his death put a full stop to the project (5). George Abbot, who succeded him, was of a very different character: nay, he was even suspected and accused of being a Puritan, bacause he would not, like his predecessor, persecute those sectarians, nor blindly follow the court's maxims with respect to government.

Parliament dissolved. Journ. Parl. Wilson. Howes. p. 909.

The parliament meeting the sixteenth of October, the commons were in a humor which pleased not his Majesty; and therefore he determined to dissolve the parliament by proclamation, the thirty-first of December, having before prorogued it. His ministers finding, by certain motions made in the lower-house, that a resolution was taken to use the most effectual methods to redress grievances, judged it not either the King's or their own interest to suffer the commons to execute this project. The pretenses for dissolving the parliament set forth in the proclamation, were;

" That his Majesty had proposed many things Coke, p. 64.
" far differing from and surpassing the graces and " favors of former times, both in nature and value,
" in expectation of a good conclusion of some " weighty cause, which had been there in delibe-
" ration, not only for supplying the necessities of " his Majesty's estate, but for the ease and freedom
" of his subjects: but these being, the two last " sessions, little taken notice of; and that the mem" bers, by reason of the length of the parliament,
" were debared from the hospitality they kept in " the country, and that diverse shires, cities and " boroughs had been burdened with expense of " maintaining their members; for these reasons he
" dissolved them". This parliament, being the first of this reign, had sat seven years. From its dissolution, to the year 1614, it was the ministry's business to devise ways and means to supply his Majesty's necessities.

His death, which happened about this time, rather than Bancroft's, as M. Rapin says, put an end to the project. The court diverſions. Wilſon. p. 685.

James thus releaſed from the incumbrance of a parliament, and reſolving never to call another, the courtiers highly applauded his reſolution. Abſolute government was abundantly more for their advantage than a government bounded by laws, where the Sovereign is in ſome meaſure depending on the people. His whole court was overjoyed at their maſter's ſhaking off the troubleſome yoke of parliaments. The three courts were a continued ſcene of mirth and diverſions, and eſpecially the Queen's, where ſcarce any thing elſe was regarded. She had her favorites, as the King had his, that is, perſons whoſe thirſt after riches was to be ſatisfied. James indeed had not as yet any favorite, according to the uſual ſenſe of that word, tho', while he reigned in Scotland, he had plainly ſhewed he could ſcarce live without one: poſſibly, the ill offices the Engliſh and Scots did each other, had 'till now prevented his Majeſty's fixing; beſide, this Prince's taſte was very different from that of moſt others. Neither virtue, nor merit, nor eminent qualities, had any charms for him: he was to be captivated only by ſomething external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulneſs of perſon, pompous apparel, and the like. Never was Prince ſo much taken with theſe kinds of outſide accompliſhments. I ſpeak on the teſtimony of lord Clarendon (1), and ſeveral others, and on the characters of this Prince's favorites, as well in England as Scotland, in whom no other merit was ever aknowledged. Howſoever this be, among the Engliſh and Scots who approached this Prince's perſon, not one had hitherto appeared poſſeſſed of the qualities requiſite to become his favorite. He wanted a youth without experience whom he might mould as he pleaſed. The Engliſh and Scots, accounting it a ſort of miracle that he could live ſo long without abandoning himſelf to ſome perſon, ſtrove with emulation to give him a favorite, without his preceiving it, by bringing into his preſenſe all the youths of their reſpective nations whom they thought moſt capable of gaining his heart: as yet neither could ſucceed. It was not 'till 1611 that the Scots at length found means to gain the advantage of their rivals, by giving the Monarch a favorite of their nation.

Carr becomes the King's favorite. Wilſon. p. 685. Spotſwood. Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 4. Weldon. p. 61, &c.

Robert Carr, a young Scotiſh gentleman, aged about twenty, juſt come from learning his exerciſes in France, going to court to wait on his compatriot lord Hay, his ſaid lordſhip, to whom he was recommended, no ſooner beheld him, but he imagined him a fit perſon to fix the King's affection. With this view, he reſolved to ſhew him at court, and ſurpriſe the King, by preſenting to him this new object, as if accidentally. One day at a tilting, he choſe Carr to preſent his ſhield and device to the King, according to cuſtom. His Majeſty, being on horſeback, and Carr advancing to perform his office, his horſe chancing to ſtart, threw him down and brake his leg. James, ſorry for this misfortune, aſked who the young man was, and hearing his name was Carr, remembered he had a page of that name in Scotland, who proved to be the ſame. This made him ſtill more concerned for his fall, and occaſioned his ordering him to be lodged in the palace, and all poſſible care to be taken of him. The tilting was no ſooner over, but he viſited Carr in his chamber. On the morow he returned; and, in ſhort, while Carr kept his bed, the King paſſed with him at leaſt an hour or two every day. He found not in this young Scot any learning, or experience, yet ſuch a calm outſide, as made him think there might be a fit harbor for his moſt retired thoughts: wherefore he reſolved to fix his inclination upon this object, hoping, by his inſtructions, to render him equal if not ſuperior to his ableſt miniſters. No ſooner was Carr recovered, but his Majeſty made him a knight, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, and took the pains himſelf to teach him Latin. In a word, Carr became a perfect favorite: all ſuits, all petitions were addreſſed to him, and no favors granted but thro' this new courtier. Happily for him, the earl of Dunbar *, a Scot, who was highly in his Majeſty's good-graces, died about this time: ſo Carr injoyed the King's favor without a rival, and was raiſed to the office of lord treaſurer of Scotland, vacant by the death of Dunbar.

JAMES I. AN' 1611.

* George Hume.

James's new inclination hindered him not from interpoſing in the diſputes cauſed in Holland by the diverſity of opinion on certain religious points, between the Gomariſts and the Arminians, or Remonſtrants. Theſe diſputes are ſo well known, that it would be loſing time to explain them: it will ſuffice to relate the occaſion of this Prince's interpoſition without being applied to, and even with a very extraordinary zeal for the preſervation of orthodoxy in this church, tho' Foreign and Preſbyterian.

James ſides with the Gomariſts againſt the Arminians. K. James's Works.

Franciſcus Gomarus and Jacobus Arminius, both divinity-profeſſors in Leyden univerſity, had ſome years ſince diſcovered a oppoſite opinions concerning abſolute predeſtination, inamiſſibility of grace, and ſome other theological points. They began their diſputes near the cloſe of laſt century; but the war at that time not admiting much attention to their controverſy, it was confined to their ſchools 'till the year 1608. Gomarus followed the ſentiments of the firſt Reformers, and Arminius took a quite contrary courſe. At length, the ſtates of Holland, perceiving a ſchiſm was forming in their church, indeavored to prevent it by means of a conference, which ſerved only to inflame their animoſities. The diſputes continued; each ſtrengthened his party; and the ſtates, being then imployed in the important affair of the truce, could not attend to this, and prevent its conſequences. Arminius dying in 1608, his diſciples and followers continued the diſpute. Finally, they preſented to the ſtates a petition, containing the articles of their faith; and as, inſtead of the term Petitioners, they uſed that of Remonſtrants, they were ſo termed, and gloried in the name. The Gomariſts preſented likewiſe their petition, ſtiling themſelves Contra-Remonſtrants. For ſome time, the two parties were known by no other denomination: but afterwards that of Contra-Remonſtrants was ſcarce heard of, while the followers of Arminius are ſtill named Remonſtrants or Arminians.

Arminius's profeſſorſhip was filled by Conrade Vorſtius, divinity-profeſſor at Steinfort, in the county of Bentheim. This theologian had publiſhed a treatiſe concerning God, which had ſo excited the Gomariſts againſt him, that he was obliged to juſtify himſelf by a printed apology from their imputations: nevertheleſs, before he came to Leyden, he was repreſented as a confirmed Socinian. In 1611, he was attacked by ſome divines, who offered to point out ſeveral damnable errors, both in his treatiſe concerning God, and in his Apology. Theſe two books being ſent to England, King James read them, and preſently after ſent to ſir Ralph Winwood, his embaſſador at the Hague, a liſt of the errors he had remarked, ordering him withal to aſſure the ſtates, that he was reſolved in print to publiſh his deteſtation of ſuch abominable errors, and of their allowers and tolerators. This was directly falling upon the ſtates, who had acquitted Vorſtius. The embaſſador preſented therefore on this occaſion a memorial, to which the ſtates returned a very modeſt reply, tho' they had reaſon to complain of the haughtineſs wherewith James was pleaſed to treat them. Before his ſaid Majeſty received the anſwer, he had ordered ſome of Vorſtius's books to be publicly burned at London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Notwithſtanding all this, Vorſtius was received at Leyden, and King James wrote againſt (1) him, to the ſtates, with ſo much vehemence, that in his opinion, burning was too good for him: nay he threatened, that in caſe they continued to tolerate this profeſſor, he would cauſe the churches of England and Scotland to withdraw from the communion of that of Holland, and exhort all other reformed churches to follow the example. Winwood, on delivering this letter, made to the ſtates a ſpeech wherein he intirely well ſeconded the intentions of his maſter.

K. James's Works. P. 355.

Tho' the ſtates of Holland thought it very ſtrange to be thus ſchooled and reprimanded, they nevertheleſs judged it was proper to ſhew a regard to the King of England, tho' without complying with what he required. To this end, they anſwered the embaſſador, that they had proviſionally ordered, that Vorſtius ſhould forbear the functions of his office 'till the next aſſembly upon this affair, and in the mean time remain at Leyden only as a ſojourner. Winwood took this anſwer for a denial, and complained in very haughty terms of their little reſpect for the King his maſter. Not long after, James publiſhed a declaration againſt Vorſtius, wherein he treats the ſtates of Holland very roughly. Then the ſtates, who were unwilling to quarrel with him, ordered Vorſtius to remove from Leyden to Gouda, where was provided for him another ſettlement.

Winwood's Mem. Vol. III. p. 316, 323.

Remark on this ſubject.

It is not eaſy to gueſs the true cauſe of King James's extraordinary zeal on this occaſion. It ſeems, on the contrary, that on many accounts he ought not to have interpoſed in a theological diſpute, about which the ſtates had not aſked his advice, and which concerned a church over which he could not challenge the leaſt juriſdiction. How could he, who in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, termed the queſtions about tranſubſtantiation, and the number of Sacraments, mere ſchool-queſtions, how could he, I ſay, account the queſtions concerning grace in Holland, to be of ſo much greater moment? Moreover, he who was of opinion, that Papiſts might be tolerated in England, provided they behaved like good ſubjects, could not bear that Vorſtius ſhould be tolerated in Holland, or even ſuffered to exiſt. Theſe are contradictions which I can only venture to explain by three conjectures. Firſt, as he pretended to be deeply learned in divinity, he imagined that, having declared for one of the opinions, he was bound in honor to ſupport it. Secondly, looking on himſelf ſtill as protector of the ſtates, he had a mind to exert his authority on this occaſion, and oblige them to do as he required. Thirdly, he was willing to favor Prince Maurice, who had declared for the Gomariſts, againſt the Arminians, who had at their head penſionary Barnevelt. I return to the affairs of England.

AN' 1612.

Carr made viſcount Rocheſter. Wilſon. Camden's Annals Howes. Weldon. May 13.

James's affection for his new favorite continually and ſwiftly increaſed. The favors heaped on him by his royal patron ſeemed to exceed all bounds. Having made him knight, gentleman of the bedchamber and lord-treaſurer of Scotland, he created him, the twenty-fifth of March 1612, baron of Branſpeth, and viſcount Rocheſter. A month after, he made him privy-counſellor, and then knight of the garter. All affairs at court paſſed thro' his hands, and whoever deſired any favor from his Majeſty was firſt to make viſcount Rocheſter his friend. The infinite bounties wherewith this favorite was loaded, convinced the miniſters and courtiers, it would be in vain to think of ruining him; and even to attempt it would be very dangerous: wherefore every one reſolved to pay his adoration to the perſon whom his Majeſty vouchſafed to honor. The earl of Saliſbury was not however greatly pleaſed at being noſed by this adventitious minion, and continually obliged to imploy his whole art to find money, in order to ſee it ſhowered on a ſtripling whoſe ſervices were yet ſo very inconſiderable. All hiſtorians agree, that James was immeaſurably profuſe in the preſents he made his young favorite, as if he had been poſſeſſed of inexhauſtible fountains of treaſure, tho' he was ever neceſſitous. It is ſaid, that his Majeſty having, one day, given him orders under his own hand, to receive twenty thouſand pounds at the Exchequer, lord treaſurer Saliſbury, ſurpriſed at the greatneſs of the donative, conſidering the treaſury's then ebbing condition, ſucceſsfully uſed a ſtratagem to convince the donor of his exceſſive liberality. He ordered the money to be laid on four tables in a chamber of the houſe, and inviting his Majeſty to a collation, cauſed him to paſs thro' that apartment, as by accident. James, as the lord-treaſurer foreſaw, failed not inquiring, for what all that money was deſigned; to which Saliſbury careleſly anſwered; It was for viſcount Rocheſter, purſuant to his Majeſty's command. Whether the King underſtood his meaning, or had not conſidered the largeneſs of his gift, he ſaid, it was too much for one man, and ordered the treaſurer to give him five thouſand pounds only (2).

The treaſurer's artifice to limit James's bounty. Coke. Oſborn. Hiſtoric. Narat. c. 6. *All in ſilver.

It is agreed by all hiſtorians, that Carr behaved very prudently on his firſt becoming a favorite. He was neither greedy nor inſolent; he did every one what ſervice he could, and eſpecially the Engliſh, whoſe friendſhip he prefered before that of his countrymen. He had but one Scotiſh ſervant, and one friend of that nation, a couſin-german. This conduct rendered him agreeable to the Engliſh. The Prince of Wales alone affected ſometimes to mortify him, becauſe they were both inamoured of the counteſs of Eſſex, who gave preference to the favorite. This was ſufficient to gain him the enmity of his Highneſs, who nevertheleſs ſought not revenge. He choſe rather to turn into contempt his love for the lady, who, as we ſhall ſoon find, little merited ſuch a lover. Except this amour, which proved his ruin, the favorite's deportment was very prudent, being guided by the counſels of ſir Thomas Overbury, a man of great wiſdom and abilities, who took care to keep him clear of thoſe rocks whereon favorits ſeldom fail ſpliting.

Earl of Saliſbury's death. May 24. Camden. Ann.

The King, to his great misfortune, loſt in the ſucceeding May, 1613, the earl of Saliſbury, who was perfectly acquainted with the ſtate's affairs, and genius of the Engliſh. He was a check to the other miniſters, and hindered them from runing upon precipices, the danger whereof they knew not ſo well as he. Moreover, he had a wonderful art of diverting the King from hurtful reſolutions, tho' he did not always ſucceed (1). The earl of Suffolk was made lord treaſurer: but he was widely different from the perſon he ſucceeded, both for qualifications and probity: beſide, he had a wife inſatiably ravenous, and who made no ſcruple to take money with both hands.

During the felicitous tranquillity James injoyed, he removed to Henry VII's chapel at Weſtminſter, the remains of Queen Mary, his mother, from Peterborough, where ſhe was originally interred, and had ever ſince continued.

About the middle of this year, lord Sanquir*, a Scotiſh nobleman, was condemned to be hanged, for cauſing a certain fencing-maſter to be murdered (2). In vain the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and diverſe other grandees, interceded in his behalf. No interceſſion availed to obtain his pardon from James, who thought this example neceſſary to curb the inſolence of his Scots, who had already been guilty of many outrages in England. His clemency to ſome had produced ſuch ill effects, that he judged it not at all proper to continue the ſame courſe, leſt it ſhould finally produce a general quarrel between the two nations, which muſt needs have been to the Scots diſadvantage (3).

Sir Robert Sherley embaſſador from the King of Perſia. Camden. Ann. Howes.

Soon after arrived in England a very extraordinary embaſſy. Sir Robert Sherley, a native of England, who had many years ſerved the King of Perſia in his army, deſirous of reviſiting his native ſoil, obtained of that Monarch the character of his embaſſador, and a letter of credence to King James. His inſtructions were only to pay his compliments to the King, with the offer of a free trade to the Engliſh throughout the Perſian dominions. This embaſſador had paſſed thro' the Hague, where he demanded audience of the ſtates, to propoſe to them a treaty with the King of Perſia: but becauſe he came from Spain, where he had made ſome ſtay, the ſtates ſuſpecting he might have other deſigns, aſked to ſee his inſtructions, and upon his ſcrupling to ſhew them, he was required to withdraw. As he had been alſo at other courts, it was believed, he had put the King of Perſia in hopes of ingaging all the Chriſtian Potentates in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had eſpouſed a Perſian woman, who was delivered of a ſon in England, to whom the Queen ſtood godmother, and Prince Henry godfather. After a year's continuance in England, he returned into Perſia †.

The arrival of this embaſſador made not ſo much noiſe as did that of Frederick V, elector Palatine, who came over in October to eſpouſe Princeſs Elizabeth, his Majeſty's daughter. He was received with all imaginable honor, and for ſome time nothing was ſeen at court but diverſions and feſtivities on his account. But amidſt the univerſal joy for theſe nuptials, the Prince of Wales was ſeized with a diſtemper, which at firſt was not judged dangerous. It began on the tenth of October, a few days before the elector Palatine's arrival: but he himſelf believed it of ſo little conſequence, that he for ſome days, every where accompanied the elector. He was not obliged to take to his bed 'till the twenty-fifth of the ſame month, and died the ſixth of November (4), aged eighteen.

He was one of the moſt accompliſhed Princes ever ſeen, I will not ſay in England only, but throughout Europe, if we may credit what is related of him by hiſtorians. He was ſober, chaſte, temperate, religious, and abounded with honor and probity. He was never heard to ſwear, tho' the examples ſet him by his father, and the whole court, were but too apt to corrupt youth. He greatly delighted in the converſation of men of worth; and thoſe who were not reckoned as ſuch were looked on with a very ill eye at his court. He had naturally a greatneſs of mind, noble and generous thoughts, and was as much diſpleaſed with trifles, as his father was fond of them. He frequently ſaid, if he ever attained the throne, his firſt care ſhould be to indeavor reconciling the Puritans to the church of England. As this could not be done without conceſſions on either ſide, and as ſuch a condeſcenſion was directly contrary to the temper of both court and clergy, he was ſuſpected to countenance Puritaniſm. His natural diſpoſition was mild and affable, yet had in his carriage a noble ſtatelineſs, without affectation, which commanded eſteem and reſpect. He ſhewed a warlike genius, in his paſſionate fondneſs for all martial exerciſes. A French embaſſador coming to take leave of him, found him toſſing a pike, and aſking him, "what "ſervice he would command him to his maſter?" The Prince bid him tell him, "what he was do-

Some time after, the King of France aſked him, "How he loſt his eye?" And Sanquir telling him, "it was done with a ſword." The King replied, "Does the man live?" This queſtion made ſuch impreſſion on him, that at his return to England, he cauſed Turner to be piſtoled, at his houſe in White-Friers, Wilſon, p. 688. But this had like to have cauſed warm blood; not only Grey's-Inn ſociety, but all the gentry in London, thought themſelves concerned in the affront, and Hawley threatened to kill Maxwell wherever he met him, if he refuſed to fight; which ſo frighted the King, that he ſent for the benchers, and made up the quarrel. One Murray, a Scot, killed a ſerjeant who came to arreſt him; which things, with Sanquir's piſtoling Turner, and other inſolencies, occaſioned the following verſes on the Scots;

I paſs over in ſilence many particulars ſaid upon this occaſion, more eſpecially what ſome authors would inſinuate, of the King's cauſing him to be poiſoned. In ſuch a caſe the proofs ought to be clear as the ſun, and I find, even in the moſt virulent writers againſt King James, only bare ſuſpicions and naked conjectures, which poſſibly were mere effects of the blackeſt malice. Others are contented with accuſing viſcount Rocheſter of this crime, but without any manner of proof. Some ſlight preſumptions, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere, may have helped to breed this ſuſpicion, which indeed was ſpread immediately on the Prince's deceaſe. Wherefore his head and body were laid open in preſenſe of many phyſicians and ſurgeons, who gave their opinion upon oath, that no marks of poiſon appeared. But what reflected moſt upon the King, was his commanding that no perſon ſhould appear at court in mourning; whether he was deſirous of removing from his ſight all lugubrous objects, which would be a conſtant renewal of his grief, or thought not proper to interrupt the diverſions prepared for his daughter's marriage. Decency however obliged him, to defer the nuptials a few weeks, as Prince Henry's obſequies could not be ſolemniſed 'till the ſeventh of December.

Some days after, his Majeſty held a chapter of the garter at Windſor, whereat the elector Palatine, and Prince Maurice, ſtadt-holder of Holland, were admited knights-companions of that moſt honorable order. An' 1613. The Elector's marriage with Princeſs Elizabeth. Howes. Wilſon. p. 690. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVI. p. 724, 736.

The begining of 1613, paſſed wholly in preparations for the Princeſs's matrimonials, celebrated the fourteenth of February, having been, a week before, proceded by the Elector's inſtalment. No coſt was ſpared to render the entertainments, on theſe occaſions, as magnificent as poſſible. To this purpoſe, James demanded aid-money of his ſubjects, according to the ancient cuſtom, obſerved on the Kings marrying away their eldeſt daughter. Tho' it was now a hundred years ſince this cuſtom had been uſed, there having been no occaſion ſince the reign of Henry VII, yet few or none durſt refuſe complying with his Majeſty's demand. By this method were raiſed very large ſums, all which were expended on theſe nuptials. The Elector and Princeſs ſtayed in England 'till April, all which interval was one continued ſcene of feaſting, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions. The city of London gave the new married couple a ſplendid entertainment; after which, the lord-mayor (4) preſented the bride with a chain of oriental pearl, worthy the greatneſs and opulency of that metropolis.

See Howes, p. 1003, &c. Wilſon.

By the Elector's and his conſort's departure, the court was ſomewhat quieter as to public rejoicings, which had held ſeveral months uninterruptedly; yet at the ſame time, a private ſcene was acting, the intrigues whereof began now to ſhew themſelves, but were not quite laid open 'till two years after. I mean, diſſolving the earl of Eſſex's marriage; his counteſs's ſecond matrimonals with viſcount Rocheſter; and the violent death of ſir Thomas Overbury. As theſe three accidents occurred not all at once, and by accident, but were gradually brought in by diabolical practiſes, it will be requiſite to introduce a few paſſed tranſactions, which were poſtponed purpoſely not to interrupt the thread of this narrative.

James I. An' 1613.

Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, was, as I obſerved, the late earl of Eſſex's mortal enemy, and one of the chief inſtruments of his ruin. This unhappy nobleman left a ſon who, being only nine years old, gave not Cecil much uneaſineſs, tho' the King, at his coming to England, reſtored him to his eſtate and honors. Mean while, as this able miniſter could not be ignorant of his Majeſty's affection for the father, he was apprehenſive of being, ſooner or later, made accountable for all the artifices he had uſed to effect that earl's deſtruction. It was chiefly on this account that, in order to preſerve the King's favor, he judged it proper to unite cloſely with the Howard family, by his ſon's marriage with the earl of Suffolk's eldeſt daughter. That done, and perceiving the earl of Eſſex grew up, and fearing he might one day prove a thorn in his ſide, he believed it for his intereſt to be reconciled to him, and to confirm the reconciliation with a marriage between this young peer and the earl of Suffolk's ſecond daughter, his own daughter-in-law's younger ſiſter. Beſide his own advantage by this alliance, he gave King James the pleaſure to ſee in ſtrict union three families he beſt loved of any in all England, viz. thoſe of Howard, Devereux, and Cecil. Theſe nuptials were accompliſhed in 1606, the earl of Eſſex being then in his fifteenth, and his bride, Frances Howard, in her thirteenth year. As the married couple were yet very young, their relations thought fit the earl ſhould travel into France and Germany, 'till they were both ſomewhat maturer. While he was abſent, his counteſs became a complete beauty, and eclipſed all the court ladies.

The earl of Eſſex returned to England in 1610. He found his lady in the prime of her age and beauty: but withal, thro' the encomiums univerſally given her, highly prepoſſeſſed in favor of her own merit. For his part, he was perfectly charmed with her, but met not with that return he expected. She daily deviſed freſh excuſes to retard conſummation of her marriage, and ſhewed as much reluctance as he did eagerneſs. He for ſome time bore all patiently, being unwilling to uſe compulſion, for fear of incurring his bride's averſion. Not long after, he fell ſo dangerouſly ill of the ſmall-pox, that his life was deſpaired of: but the goodneſs of his conſtitution overcame his diſtemper, tho' his intire recovery was not very ſpeedy.

It was during this interval Robert Carr became the King's favorite. On gaining his Sovereign's affection, he alſo made a conqueſt, almoſt at the ſame time, over the heart of lady Eſſex, who ſuffered herſelf to be captivated with the charms of this youthful Scot, and abſolutely abandoned herſelf to this new paſſion, yet without daring to reveal it to him who inſpired it. Mean while, the earl of Eſſex, finding his health compleatly reeſtabliſhed, preſſed his counteſs's conſent to the conſummation of their marriage: but, as ſhe was become inamored of another, he found in her a ſtill ſtronger reluctance. imaginable means to prevail on her, without being able to ſucceed, he had recourſe to his father-in-law the earl of Suffolk, and intreated his paternal mediation to vanquiſh his daughter's obſtinacy. Suffolk, ſurpriſed at his ſon-in-law's requeſt, ſharply reprimanded the young lady, and told her in a tone of authority, that ſhe muſt abſolutely determine on conſummating her marriage. The counteſs thereupon, not daring directly to diſobey her father, deſired only ſome ſmall reſpite. She was of opinion that, provided conſummation with the earl of Eſſex could be any way evaded, it would not be impracticable to procure a divorce, and ſhe might then marry viſcount Rocheſter. In reality, Rocheſter was yet a ſtranger to her paſſion: but ſhe had too much reliance on her charms, not to hope a conqueſt, whenever ſhe ſhould have occaſion to make the diſcovery. On the other hand, Rocheſter's, Suffolk's and Northampton's great credit admited not her queſtioning that, if the favorite undertook aſking her in marriage, he would eaſily ſucceed. But ſhe wanted ſome time to lay her meaſures, wherein however ſhe met with great oppoſition both from her huſband and father.

Wilſon: Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 7, 9. Coke.

In this dilemma, not knowing how to extricate herſelf from the preſent perplexity, ſhe addreſſed the widow of one Dr. Turner, a phyſician, a woman of diſſolute life, and capable of the vileſt actions. As this pernicious female had not any good counſel to give the lady, ſhe perſuaded her to apply to one Foreman, who paſſed for a conjurer. He had perhaps ſome ſecrets of nature, but was not ſorry to be thought ſkilled in magic, becauſe abundance of women crouded to conſult him, and gave conſiderable fees for his advice. To this man the counteſs of Eſſex imparted her ſecret, and deſired of him two things: firſt, to manage it ſo, that the earl of Eſſex ſhould be incapable to conſummate his marriage. Secondly, to make Rocheſter in love with her. Foreman very confidently promiſed both, and gave her certain powders for her huſband to take, and to be put among his linen, with inſtructions how ſhe ſhould behave to him. As for Rocheſter, he himſelf undertook to perform upon him the neceſſary operations.

Mean while, the counteſs could no longer diſobey her father's command, ſo was forced at laſt to cohabit with her huſband: but tho' they lay together, the marriage was not conſummated; whether it was owing to Foreman's powders, or to ſome other more effectual means uſed by the counteſs to fruſtrate her conſort's attempts. However this be, the earl of Eſſex imagined, that his living in London and at court might contribute to his miſfortue, and therefore reſolved on conveying his lady to a ſeat * of his about a hundred miles from London. The counteſs could not be excuſed from going with him; but, during the whole time of her being there, ſhe ſhut herſelf up in a chamber, and would not even ſuffer the light of the ſun to enter, giving herſelf over to exceſſive melancholy, whether thro' vexation or policy the better to avoid unwelcome importunities. After this manner ſhe paſſed ſome time in the country with her huſband, who little comprehended the meaning of this ſtrange behavior. Mean while, ſhe wrote letters to the widow Turner and Foreman, telling them, "She was afraid "Foreman's powders were not ſtrong enough: her "huſband was as luſty as ever: it would be very "difficult for her to hold out for ever, and if ſhe "ſhould chance to yield, ſhe ſhould become the "moſt unfortunate woman in the world: ſhe in"treated them to free her from her miſery, and "they ſhould have what money they deſired." Theſe letters were found in Foreman's ſtudy, and read in open court, on a certain occaſion which I ſhall mention preſently.

James I. An' 1613.

At length, the earl of Eſſex, ſeeing himſelf in ſo uneaſy a ſituation, reſolved on re-conducting his lady to London, and leaving her at full liberty to live as ſhe pleaſed. He began to be ſenſible there was ſomething extraordinary in her carriage, which he choſe rather to be ignorant of than attempt penetrating.

The counteſs being returned to court, and miſtreſs of herſelf, no longer delayed acquainting Rocheſter with what ſhe indured for his ſake. There was no neceſſity for uſing magic to produce the deſired effect. He was young, and ſhe the fineſt lady in England: ſo, any advances from the counteſs were more than ſufficient to kindle a flame in this favorite's breaſt. As ſoon as they began to underſtand each other, aſſignations became frequent. This was at firſt carried on very privately: but after ſome time theſe lovers uſed ſo little caution, that no one courtier was a ſtranger to their amours. Very ſeemingly, his Majeſty was informed of it, ſince nothing more delighted him than to hear of the love-intrigues of his courtiers. The earl of Eſſex, who had alſo notice of it, choſe to ſhut his eyes, and contemn a woman ſo unworthy his affection.

Wilſon: Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 13.

(1) At this juncture, viſcount Rocheſter was at the very ſummit of favor with his royal patron. He officiated as ſecretary of ſtate, tho' Winwood, who had been embaſſador in Holland, held the commiſſion. He opened all pacquets, and returned anſwers, without communicating them to the council, and even frequently without the King's knowledge: yet all he did was approved. It was one of King James's weakneſſes to ſuffer himſelf to be governed by his favorites. But as viſcount Rocheſter governed the King, he himſelf had alſo a favorite by whom he was wholly directed. This was the already-mentioned ſir Thomas Overbury, who greatly aſſiſted him in bearing the too ponderous burden, yet to him left the whole honor.

The counteſs of Eſſex's ſchemes to get her marriage diſſolved. Wilſon.

Lady Eſſex having ſucceeded in her purpoſed conqueſt, and finding herſelf ſure of her paramour's heart, would not allow his paſſion time to cool. All things ſeemed to favor the execution of her deſigns, that is, her divorce from Eſſex, and marriage with Rocheſter. Eſſex ſaw her no more, and ſeemed to concern himſelf very little about her, and Rocheſter was ſo beloved by the King, that, in all appearance, nothing would be impracticable: ſo ſhe let her lover know her deſires, and without much difficulty brought him to ſecond her projects. But as he was wont to impart his moſt ſerious affairs to Overbury, he believed he ought not to conceal this from him, and the more, as he expected from him ſome good advice to accompliſh it. But ſo far was Overbury from approving ſuch a project, that he uſed his utmoſt indeavors to diſſuade him from it. He repreſented to him the injuſtice and indignity of the action, nay his danger of being ruined by it; and laſtly, the little value he ought to have for a woman, who, tho' married, ſcrupled not throwing herſelf into the arms of another: that ſhe had already loſt her reputation in the world, and when ſhe ſhould be his wife, the whole diſhonor would reflect upon him. Rocheſter, who expected not oppoſition from his friend, could not forbear ſhewing ſome reſentment. He had however the addreſs to contain himſelf ſo far, as not to give him room to think he would proceed notwithſtanding his advice, and continued, as uſual, to communicate to him his other affairs. The counteſs was in a violent paſſion when ſhe heard Overbury's advice, and from that moment ceaſed not exciting her gallant to vengeance. She was the more inſenſed againſt Overbury, as ſhe dreaded that, being acquainted with the deſign, he would labor to render it abortive. In ſhort, Rocheſter was ſo blind and complaiſant as to promiſe her to ſacrifice his friend. He might eaſily have diſmiſſed him: but it would have been too dangerous not to ruin him intirely, after truſting him with the ſecret. It is pretended that, to ſtrike with greater ſureneſs, he conſulted the earl of Northampton, the counteſs of Eſſex's uncle, and by his advice uſed this artifice to ruin him. He extolled to the King Overbury's abilities; but intimated withal, that he was too aſſuming, and was become inſufferably inſolent; and therefore he ſhould be very glad to have him removed by ſome honorable imployment, praying his Majeſty to ſend him embaſſador to Ruſſia (1). James, approving the propoſal, inſtantly nominated Overbury for the embaſſy. Rocheſter, having proceeded thus far, acquainted Overbury with his Majeſty's deſign, and, pretending he could not live without him, intreated him to refuſe the imploy, promiſing to procure him at court a better ſtation. He added, that indeed he believed it would not be in his power to prevent his Majeſty's being angry at firſt, and probably he would reſent his refuſal; but he doubted not appeaſing him in a few days. Overbury fell into the ſnare, and when the King ſent for him, to acquaint him with the imployment deſigned, he moſt humbly beſought his Majeſty to make choice of another.

No ſooner was he retired, but Rocheſter agravated his pride and inſolence, in daring thus to refuſe his Sovereign's gracious offer, adding, it was requiſite to chaſtiſe him. In a word, thro' Rocheſter's inſtances, the King commanded Overbury to be arreſted (2). Some days before, the favorite had cauſed ſir Gervaſe Elways, his creature, to be made lieutenant of the Tower. Overbury was there cloſely confined in a room, and not ſuffered to retain one of his ſervants, or receive any viſits from his relations and friends; a rigor not uſed even towards the moſt notorious criminals. He was now where Rocheſter and the counteſs of Eſſex wiſhed him, in order to diſpatch him with greater facility: nevertheleſs, they had ſtill ſome difficulties to incounter. They could not effect it with a dagger, becauſe the lieutenant of the Tower, who was to be anſwerable for his priſoners, would not have ſuffered it; and beſide, a murder openly commited in one of his Majeſty's priſons, would have made too much noiſe abroad. It was reſolved therefore to poiſon him. To that end, Turner provided a truſty agent, one Weſton, who had been her huſband's menial; and this fellow was, by ſir Thomas Monſon, recommended to the lieutenant of the Tower, to attend the priſoner as lackey: but even this was not ſufficient. What was brought Overbury to eat being dreſſed in the lieutenant's kitchen, there was a kind of neceſſity to ingage him in the plot. Some ſay the earl of Northampton diſcourſed him about it, intimating that all was done with the King's concurrence. Others affirm, the lieutenant refuſing to be concerned in the crime, and yet not daring to diſcover it, by reaſon of the parties great credit and quality, took care to ſeize whatever eatables were ſent from time to time by viſcount Rocheſter to the priſoner, and throw them into the privy (3); and this is moſt likely, ſince otherwiſe Overbury would have been ſoon diſpatched. Notwithſtanding all the lieutenant's care, Weſton found means to give Overbury a certain jelly, ſent by ſir Thomas Monſon, which almoſt deſtroyed him: hereupon the lieutenant was ſtill more diligent, that Overbury ſhould be ſeen by Weſton only. This was a great check upon Weſton, ſeeing none could be accuſed but himſelf; and therefore he durſt not be ſo expeditious in the affair as Overbury's enemies deſired. However, one inconveniency aroſe from this delay, namely, a general ſurpriſe to ſee the King uſe ſuch exceſs of rigor on a friend of viſcount Rocheſter, and for ſo trivial a crime, if humbly intreating to be excuſed from going in embaſſy to Ruſſia may properly come under that denomination. It could not be conceived, and it was vainly indeavored to penetrate the real cauſe of this extreme ſeverity wherewith Overbury was treated.

While the unhappy priſoner languiſhed under his rigid durance, viſcount Rocheſter and the counteſs of Eſſex were meditating how to execute their project of annulling Eſſex's marriage, that his lady might afterwards eſpouſe the viſcount. To effect this, without Rocheſter's appearing to be concerned, the earl of Northampton, who was in the two lovers ſecrets, undertook ſpeaking to his Majeſty. Some ſay, Rocheſter had already acquainted the King with the counteſs's deſign to be divorced, and ſollicited his procuring him the lady when her marriage ſhould be diſſolved; but I am not certain this report was well atteſted. However, the earl of Northampton gave his Majeſty the counteſs of Eſſex's petition, which was to this purport (4): that the earl her huſband being incapable of conſummating their marriage, ſhe beſought his Majeſty to let her complaint be examined, and if found well grounded, to have liberty of re-marrying. On this petition, James commiſſioned the archbiſhop, diverſe other prelates, and ſome laics, to hear and determine the matter. The ſaid court proceeded very gravely to the trial of this cauſe, and entered into ſuch particular and ſecret examinations as did not greatly ſuit the eccleſiaſtical function. The earl of Eſſex being examined, briefly replied, that he had never conſummated his marriage, neither did he think he ſhould ever be able; but found not a like inability with regard to other women. Tho' this acknowledgment greatly favored the counteſs's cauſe, the court deemed it proper to be certain of the truth by another method, and ordered the counteſs to be inſpected by a jury of matrons, aſſiſted by ſome midwives. This inſpection being made, the matrons declared ſhe was a virgin: but it is pretended, the counteſs, under color of modeſty, was permited to appear in a veil before the matrons, and that miſs Fines, a young gentlewoman of her age and ſtature, was introduced in her apparel (5). Decency forbids my inſerting many circumſtances of this trial, which are to be met with in diverſe writers. It ſuffices to ſay in Rocheſter marries the counteſs of Eſſex. Wilſon.

Had this lady, after her divorce, married any other than viſcount Rocheſter, her conduct might have been eaſily juſtified: this was not the firſt marriage annulled on a like account: but ſcarcely was the ſentence publiſhed, when Rocheſter openly made to her his addreſſes, and the match was ſoon concluded. James not only gave his favorite leave to marry the counteſs, but likewiſe created him earl of Somerſet, on the fourth of November, that the ſecond huſband might be of equal rank with the firſt. Their nuptials were ſolemniſed, a month after, with ſuch extraordinary rejoicings, that there could not have been greater doings even at the matrimonials of a ſon of his Majeſty's. The city of London ſignaliſed itſelf on this occaſion, by a ſplendid entertainment which the lord-mayor and aldermen gave the new-married couple, and to which the King, Queen, and whole court were invited. For ſome time, nothing was ſeen or heard of but banquets, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions, in honor of the nuptials.

All this furniſhed the diſaffected with matter to talk of James very freely. They reported, that in Scotland the earl of Arran, formerly his Majeſty's favorite, married the earl of Athol's daughter, having by like means, and on the ſame account, procured a diſſolution of that lady's marriage with the earl of March. It was thereby inſinuated, that James had taught his favorite the way to attain his miſtreſs: but theſe inſinuations reached not the King's ear, thoſe about him being better courtiers than to acquaint him with ſuch aſperſions.

Violent death of Overbury. Wilſon. p. 692. Weldon, p. 74.

While lady Eſſex's marriage was annulling, the unfortunate Overbury languiſhed under a rigid confinement, without the comfort of ſeeing any of his friends, as if guilty of the moſt heinous of crimes. He had been reduced to the laſt extremities by the poiſon given him, without knowing the cauſe of his ailments: but when he heard what was tranſacting, he no longer doubted whence derived his miſery. In this lamentable ſtate, he ſaw no other remedy than writing to Somerſet, to implore deliverance from his wretched condition (2). The favorite replied, that his Majeſty being ſtill highly inſenſed, he had not yet been able to ſpeak in his behalf, but hoped to do it in a few days: nay, ſome report, that he ſent a certain powder in this letter, as a ſure remedy to cure his diſtemper; but Overbury was ſo wiſe as not to take it. In ſhort, the two lovers, impatient to ſee ſurvive one who might effect their ruin, cauſed a poiſonous clyſter to be adminiſtered by one Franklin, apprentice to a certain apothecary, which at once terminated his miſeries. Some ſay, that Weſton and Franklin, ſeeing the extraordinary effects of the clyſter, and fearing, if they ſuffered the poiſon to operate any longer, it would leave on the body ſuch tokens as would riſe in judgment againſt them, ſmothered him with the bed-cloaths. When dead, he was ſpeedily buried, without any ceremony, and a report ſpread, that, dying of the pox, he was ſo rotten he could not be kept any longer. This was the earl of Northampton's account, in his letter to the favorite, to acquaint him with Overbury's death, admiring withal God's juſtice on ſuch wicked inſtruments (3).

The favorite wholly ruled by the earl of Northampton. Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 36.

The earl of Somerſet thought it a great advantage to have diſpatched Overbury. But, on the other hand, he found himſelf much more imbaraſſed in the management of affairs, ſince he was no longer aſſiſted by that faithful counſellor. As his ſmall experience rendered all things difficult, he was forced to chuſe another friend; and it was the earl of Northampton who ſupplied Overbury's place; but there was a vaſt difference between theſe two counſellors. Overbury's ſole view was to procure his friend honor and advantage; whereas Northampton's chief aim was to uſe his credit to countenance the Papiſts. Ever ſince his being in favor, he had always protected them to the utmoſt of his power, as was univerſally obvious: but when he came to rule the favorite, he acted without the leaſt reſerve. As he was warden of the Cinque ports, the Jeſuits and Romiſh prieſts could ſafely land there without being examined at their arrival; by which means their number ſo increaſed in a very ſhort ſpace, that the people loudly murmured at it, and caſt the whole blame on Northampton. Wherefore, to ſilence thoſe who talked too freely, he took out againſt ſome of them a writ of Scandalum Magnatum. He fancied it not poſſible to convict him of what was grounded only upon common report, and, that, ſuch evidence not being valid in law, he ſhould by chaſtiſing ſome of the moſt forward to ſpeak againſt him, abſolutely ſilence all his adverſaries. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury broke his meaſures, by producing a letter, under the earl's own hand to cardinal Bellarmine, wherein he ſaid, "That however the ſituation of the affairs of England, and the inſtances of the King compelled him to be a Proteſtant in ſhew, nevertheleſs his heart ſtood firm with the Catholics, and he would be ever ready to countenance them to the utmoſt of his power." Upon this letter, the parties accuſed were diſcharged: nay, his Majeſty ſo reprimanded the earl, that he retired to his country-houſe, where he died ſoon after. He declared, in his laſt will and teſtament, that he had always been a Catholic, and would die in that religion. Thus ſeveral hiſtorians ſpeak of him: but the anonymous author of the Annals of King James I, and Charles I, who indeavors to vindicate theſe Princes, their miniſters, and government, in every point without exception, forgets not to juſtify alſo the earl of Northampton. He ſays, among other particulars, that the charge of being concerned in Overbury's murder was merely a rumor ſpread after his deceaſe; as if that were a certain proof of his innocence. As to the earl's religion, the ſame author ſays, "He died ſuſpected more Catholic than ſome will think reaſonable, tho' in the form of a Church-Papiſt."

JAMES I. AN' 1611.

The court was not ſo well diſpoſed toward the Puritans as Papiſts. The Puritans were conſidered as enemies to both King and monarchy, but the Papiſts as hearty wiſhers that the King might meet with no oppoſition to his will. This was ſufficient to induce the court to countenance the latter, and make the former undergo continual mortifications. Towards this year's ſpring, certain Preſbyterian families determined on repairing to the Engliſh plantations * in America, there to injoy that quiet which they could not find at home. The author I juſt mentioned concerning the earl of Northampton, ſays, theſe people were notorious Schiſmatics of ſeveral ſects, known by the general name of Puritans, which term included good and bad in their diſtinct kinds, truly and ingeniouſly diſtinguiſhed into the Puritan-knave, and the knave-Puritan. As it was not impoſſible, by the increaſe of Preſbyterian families, the Engliſh plantations might become nurſeries for Non-Conformiſts, the court gave orders not to let them depart: but afterwards, ſuch as deſired to remove beyond ſea, being examined, ſome were allowed to purſue their voyage, and others were detained as ſureties for thoſe who went abroad.

* New-England. Annals of James I.

Four years had now paſſed ſince James had called a parliament. It was to him a ſingular ſatiſfaction not to have diſputes with the houſe of commons, ever ready to complain of grievances, and take occaſion to examine the conduct of the Sovereign or his miniſters. To command abſolutely and without controul, was abundantly more to his liking: but this was attended with great inconvenience. He was obliged to be perpetually inventing new methods to raiſe money, and theſe methods, grounded on abſolute authority, occaſioned loud clamors among his people: neither did theſe methods bring in ſums ſufficient for the neceſſities of his Majeſty, who was a paſſionate lover of magnificence, and always ready to give. Hence aroſe his wants, which continually augmented, his revenues, both ordinary and extraordinary, not ſufficing for his expenſes. He however ſeemed poſſeſſed of a fund inexhauſtible, ſo profuſe was he, without conſidering whence to reimburſe himſelf of what was thus needleſly laviſhed. The following inſtance of his liberality may ſerve to ſhew his character. Being one day in his gallery †, and none with him but ſir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, and James Maxwell §, ſome paſſed by with three thouſand pounds, going to the privy-purſe. Rich, ſeeing the money, whiſpered Maxwell. The King obſerving that, aſked what he ſaid? Maxwel told him, Rich ſhould think himſelf very happy if thoſe bags were in his coffers. Hereupon the King, calling to the porters, ordered them to carry the money to Rich's lodgings, ſaying, "You think "you have a great purchaſe; but I am more de-"lighted in giving you the money, than you can "be in receiving it."

§ Of his bedchamber.

Had King James been thus liberal out of his abundance, or his ſavings, his generoſity would certainly have been truly laudable. But unhappily, in order to be thus profuſe to a few private perſons, he gained the ill-will of all his other ſubjects, and was, to raiſe money, forced to uſe various extraordinary methods, which were looked on as ſo many grievances, and loudly exclaimed againſt. Moreover he was obliged, either not to call a parliament, or to quarrel with the houſe of commons. Yet was James the Solomon of the age, the wiſeſt, moſt prudent, and juſteſt of Kings. Theſe are at leaſt the epithets generally given him, and which are to be found in diverſe hiſtories written even ſince Charles II's reſtoration.

Remark on this ſubject.

JAMES I. AN' 1614.

Coke, p. 78.

This King's exceſſive munificence reducing him to perpetual ſtraits, he finally had recourſe to a project, formed by the late earl of Saliſbury; namely, to create knights-baronets, a ſort of mid-nobility, between barons and knights. Their number was not to exceed two hundred: but James, at their firſt promotion, made only a hundred (1). To purchaſe this honor, which was to be hereditary, each baronet was to pay his Majeſty a thouſand pounds: but, in order to give ſome color to this new inſtitution, every baronet was, by his patent, obliged to maintain thirty foot ſoldiers in Ireland, for three years, at eight-pence a day each ſoldier (2). Afterwards it was hinted to them that, if they would compound, and pay down the whole ſum at once, part ſhould be abated, and the King would himſelf maintain his troops in Ireland; which offer was generally imbraced. The author of the before-mentioned Annals affirms his Majeſty to have received only about a hundred thouſand pounds of the baronets, and that the maintenance of the troops in Ireland coſt him abundantly more: ſo, according to him, this new order was inſtituted merely to eaſe the ſubjects.

Creation of baronets. Annals of K. James. p. 8. Wilſon. p. 695.

Beſide this method, James made uſe of others to repleniſh his empty coffers, without being obliged to have recourſe to parliament. I ſhall only mention them, without pretending to determine whether this Prince did or did not exceed his prerogative. 1. The King, by his letters-patent, granted monopolies to private perſons, excluſive of all others, and raiſed great ſums by theſe ſorts of favors. 2. He iſſued commiſſions for reviving obſolete laws, for making men who could expend annually forty pounds, to compound for not being knighted. In former times, land to the yearly value of forty pounds was conſiderable: and therefore the owners of ſuch eſtates were deemed proper to be made knights, and as ſuch to ſerve the King in his wars, or find ſoldiers. But in James I's days, ſuch a revenue was inconſiderable: there were infinite numbers who had more, but, not deſiring to be knights, choſe rather to part with a ſum than be obliged to receive a feather in their caps, which rendered them very dependant. 3. He created a certain number of knights of Nova Scotia (3), and each paid him a ſum of money. 4. The dignities of baron, viſcount, and earl, were rated at a fixed price: his Majeſty received for making a baron ten thouſand pounds, for a viſcount fifteen thouſand, and twenty thouſand for an earl; thus, whoever had money, might be made a peer of the realm. 5. The ſame honors were rated likewiſe in Scotland and Ireland, tho' at lower prices. 6. Thoſe who had defective titles, were obliged to compound with the King for rectifying them, otherwiſe they were declared null and void. 7. The ſtar-chamber condemned in exceſſive fines, to the King's uſe, ſuch as were cited thither: I have already related ſome inſtances, and ſhall have occaſion to take notice of ſome others

He would have had alſo a good means of raiſing money, if he had demanded of the United-Provinces the ſums due to him: but, if we credit certain hiſtorians, he durſt not claim his debt, for fear of ingaging in a war, in caſe of their refuſal. A more probable reaſon might be given, by ſaying, the places he held in Holland and Zealand kept the ſtates in a ſort of ſubjection, if he had not ſhewn, two years after, that this was not the true reaſon, by receiving his money when offered him by the ſtates.

James calls a parliament. Wilſon. p. 696. Coke.

In ſhort, the King's revenue not anſwering his expenſes, recourſe muſt be had to a parliament. The earl of Somerſet, having with him neither Overbury nor the earl of Northampton, was at a loſs how to find the King money, and the lord treaſurer, his father-in-law, was no leſs imbaraſſed. All extraordinary means ſeeming to be exhauſted, they propoſed calling a parliament. To induce James to it, they put him in hopes that, by their intereſt and management, the majority of the commons ſhould be at his devotion. The King was very loth to conſent: but at length was perſuaded, and a parliament was ſummoned to meet the firſt of April *.

The King demands money. Coke, p. 79.

This parliament conſiſted not of ſuch members as the King was made to expect. The people, who were diſcontented, inſtead of being gained by the court, choſe repreſentatives of a quite different character from thoſe the miniſters deſired. The very firſt day, James demanded money for the marriage of his daughter, and told the commons, after diſpatching that affair, he would give them leave to examine the nation's grievances. But the commons thought proper to invert the method preſcribed them, and begin with the grievances. Inſtead therefore of granting the money firſt, as the King expected, they examined to what uſes he had applied the crown-revenues. The reſult was, that the King had beſtowed on the Scots exceſſive grants, both in land and money, and that the Scots, having ſold theſe lands to the Engliſh, had conveyed the money into Scotland, to the great detriment of England. If what King James gave the Engliſh had been as ſtrictly ſcrutiniſed, it would have been found ten times more, even by the hiſtorians confeſſion (1): but herein appeared not the like inconvenience.

The commons examine grievances.

Then inquiry was made into the cauſes of the increaſe of Popiſh recuſants; ſince it ſhould rather ſeem that the laws inacted after the Powder-plot ſhould have greatly diminiſhed their number. A ſecond was, the negociations abroad for matching the late Prince Henry and Prince Charles with Popiſh Princeſſes.

2. Grievance. Increaſe of Papiſts.

Next the commons took into conſideration the monopolies authoriſed and licenſed by the King's letters-patent, to the great prejudice of trade; and the extraordinary levies of money, without conſent of parliament. Upon all theſe grievances, it was reſolved to repreſent them in a petition to his Majeſty, and to pray him to redreſs them, and eſpecially to hinder the future ſettlement of Scots in England.

JAMES I. AN' 1607.

The commons deportment was ſo different from that of the courtiers, who never mentioned his Majeſty but with admiration, that James had not patience to bear it. So, on the ſeventh of June he diſſolved the parliament, after a ſeſſion of about two months, wherein not one ſtatute was inacted. The parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, but his Majeſty commited to priſon ſeveral members of the lower houſe, who had expreſſed themſelves with moſt freedom, without admiting them to bail (2).

The King reſolving to call no more parliaments, extraordinary means were to be deviſed to ſupply his expenſes, his ordinary revenues being far from ſufficient. To that end, certain perſons diligently ſearched into hiſtory, to diſcover what had been done by former Kings in like caſes, or when there was not time to call a parliament. Among all theſe methods, the court choſe the way of benevolence, invented by Edward IV, aboliſhed by Richard III, and once revived, if I miſtake not, by the parliament itſelf in the reign of Henry VIII. Nevertheleſs, the author of theſe Annals pretends, that James only followed the conſtant example of Annals of K. James, p. 10. Coke.

The reſolution being taken, not only to aſk extort a benevolence, all ſherifs were by the council injoined to demand of all perſons within their diſtrict a free gift, in proportion to his Majeſty's neceſſities: and at the ſame time, they were expreſly commanded to return to the council the names of ſuch as ſhould refuſe contributing, or not give anſwerably to their abilities. This evidences its not being James's meaning the benevolence ſhould be intirely voluntary: but this method however was not ſo ſucceſful as his Majeſty had expected. The more eager the ſherifs and court party were to excite peoples liberality, the more induſtrious were others to diſſuade them from it, by ſeting before them the conſequences. So, if we may believe the ſaid Annals-writer, this benevolence procured King James only 52,909 l. "which yet (continues he) madded "the ill-minded men (pillars, ſo ſome called them, "to the kingdom's liberties) always plotters to the "kingdom's miſeries, who being aſhamed to be "out-done in honeſty and honor, they juſtly drew "upon themſelves a mark of malignity.—— And "yet they would be medling, deviſing poor argu-"ments, to pretend it was againſt the ſubjects "liberties, tho' accuſtomed evermore by examples "of all foreign Sovereigns." Others ſpeak of it very differently, and repreſent this way of raiſing money upon the ſubjects as a real extortion and incroachment on the nation's liberties. Thus do King James's hiſtorians contradict each other, not in facts but in principles, ſome deeming illegal what others maintain to be the crown's undoubted prerogative.

Some ſay, ſhe inwardly grieved for the death of Prince Henry, and ſuſpected him to be the author. Others ſay only, that this favorite's greatneſs had ſo blinded him that he was wanting in his reſpect to her Majeſty (1). Howſoever this be, ſhe had conceived a very violent hatred of him, and the more eaſily to effect his ruin, ſhe thought proper to gain ſir Ralph Winwood, who was ſtill ſecretary of ſtate, but without exerciſing the office, at leaſt in important matters, becauſe Somerſet had ſeized the whole management of affairs. Winwood readily joined with the Queen to overthrow this minion, who left him only the bare name of ſecretary. This was a preparative to the revolution which occurred in the year inſuing.

An' 1615. The King's progreſs to Cambridge. Coke. Camden's Annals

King James was, twice a year, accuſtomed to take a journey into ſome county of the kingdom. Theſe journies were termed progreſſes, one whereof was made in winter, the other in ſummer. In his winter-progreſs, in the year 1615, he paſſed thro' Cambridge, where the ſcholars entertained him with a comedy, called Ignoramus, which ridiculed the common law. Nothing could be more diverting to the King. The civil law, or the laws made by the ſupreme authority of Roman Emperors, appeared to him of much greater value than the common or ſtatute law, and he ſometimes could not forbear ſpeaking contemptuouſly of theſe latter: wherefore he was ſo delighted with this play, that he cauſed it to be acted twice in his preſenſe, during his ſhort ſtay at Cambridge.

Ignoramus, a famous comedy. Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 33.

George Villiers. Coke, p. 82.

It was at this play James was ſtruck with a new object, which made the ſame impreſſion upon his mind as did Robert Carr the firſt time he ſaw him in England (3). This was George Villiers, a young gentleman who appeared before him with all the advantages of a good mien, a fine ſhape, and rich and gentile apparel. Every one perceived he beheld this youth with pleaſure, and from that moment it was judged Villiers might ſupplant Somerſet: and in reality it was with this very view certain of the nobility had taken care to place him oppoſite to his Majeſty at the repreſentation.

His extraction Wilſon, p. 699. Coke, p. 80. Welden.

George Villiers was of a ſubſtantial and ancient family in Leiceſterſhire, ſon of ſir George Villiers (4), by a ſecond wife, who bore him three ſons, of whom this George was the ſecond (5). On ſir George's deceaſe, his widow married ſir Thomas Compton, the baron of that name's brother. As George Villiers was only a younger ſon of a ſecond bed, his fortune could be but ſmall; nevertheleſs, his mother took great care of his education. After he had finiſhed his ſtudies, ſhe ſent him into France, where he made himſelf a complete maſter of that language, with all the exerciſes proper for a gentleman, and eſpecially dancing, wherein he excelled. When returned from his travels, his mother ſent him to court to make himſelf known, and indeavor to procure himſelf friends and a place. He no ſooner appeared there, but the earls of Pembroke and Bedford, with ſome other peers, enemies to the favorite, and who ſought his deſtruction, fancied this young man might be ſubſervient to their deſign. They knew the King ſufficiently to hope he would be taken with the external accompliſhment of this new-comer. To this end, they liberally ſupplied all requiſites to attract the King's eyes. The project ſucceeded to their expectation. James being at the play, looked with admiration on George Villiers, and could not help ſhewing ſome ſigns of his growing inclination. He however took care to conceal it as much as poſſible, not to alarm the earl of Somerſet: nevertheleſs he from that inſtant determined on having Villiers near his perſon, imagining he might eaſily retain both. So, to have time to manage this affair, he privately cauſed Villiers to purchaſe a cup-bearer's place, and to be inſtructed how to behave.

What

JAMES I. AN' 1615.

What care ſoever James might take to conceal his growing inclination, the courtiers failed not perceiving it. Somerſet, as moſt concerned, was harder to be deceived than the reſt. His office of lord chamberlain giving him a great authority over the King's ſervants, he wanted not opportunities to vex and mortify Villiers, who bore all with patience; and the King feigned not to perceive it: but, at laſt, a certain accident happened which ſuffered not the King to diſſemble any longer. It was cuſtomary for the cup-bearer whoſe turn it was to be in waiting, to have the firſt place at the table where the cup-bearers dined. Villiers, having begun his month, ſat at the upper end during the whole time of his ſervice, without any oppoſition: but offering to ſit in the ſame place after his month was expired, the perſon whoſe turn it was to wait rudely thruſt him thence, which greatly confounded him. Some days after, the ſame cup-bearer, carrying a glaſs of wine to the King, let it fall, accidentally or deſignedly, on Villiers, who gave him a box on the ear. It is a law of long ſtanding at court, that whoever ſtrikes in the King's palace, is to loſe his right-hand, with ſundry formalities. It is the lord chamberlain's buſineſs to ſee crimes of this nature puniſhed, and the earl of Somerſet failed not doing whatever lay in his power to have the law executed to the utmoſt rigor. But the King granted Villiers a pardon, without injoining any ſatisfaction to the party offended. This was the firſt public mark of his affection for Villiers.

Adventures which befel Villiers.

The King gives him a ſignal mark of his favor.

From thenceforward, the earl of Somerſet's enemies labored inceſſantly to ruin him in the James's favor, in which they could not better ſucceed, than by cheriſhing the King's new inclination by immoderate commendations of Villiers. The truth is that James, even before he had ſeen Villiers, began to be weary of Somerſet, who was become far leſs agreeable than when he was firſt taken into favor. Since his marriage with the counteſs of Eſſex, he had given himſelf up to a deep melancholy, whereof very probably Overbury's murder was the true cauſe: alſo in his perſon and dreſs he was grown ſtrangely negligent. He had loſt that vivacity which rendered him ſo delectable to his royal maſter, and his temper, now gloomy and ſullen, induced him harſhly to oppoſe ſome wanton tricks which were ſometimes played in the King's anti-chamber, and wherein his Majeſty took a ſingular delight: nay, he was become ſo intereſted, that he did nothing for any one without a preſent. His enemies neglected not acquainting the King with all this, either directly, or by broad hints, knowing how much it might conduce to make him forfeit his favor, ſince there was no vice more contrary to James's humor than avarice. The Queen for her part miſſed no opportunity to do him ill offices: ſo that, in all appearance, the project of making Villiers the King's favorite was formed upon the plain appearances of Somerſet's decline.

James diſguſted with Somerſet. Coke, p. 82.

Weldon, p. 92.

The whole court perceived the alteration in his Majeſty ſince he had Villliers about him, and all labored to puſh the tottering favorite down the precipice. To effect it, the readieſt way was to ingage his patron to declare for Villiers: but one very great obſtacle was firſt to be removed. James, thro' a groſs ſort of artifice, would have no favorite but of the Queen's recommending, that in caſe ſhe complained of him afterwards, he might ſay, he had received him at her hands. This was one of the turns of policy of his ſaid Majeſty, who fancied, by ſuch a deviſe, to impoſe on his Queen and the whole court. The buſineſs was therefore to prevail with her Majeſty to recommend Villiers to the King: but ſhe was already prejudiced againſt this young man, and not ſeeing with the ſame eyes her conſort did, perceived nothing in him worthy ſuch exaltation. Poſſibly likewiſe ſhe had turned her own eyes towards ſome other, to procure him this advancement. Somerſet's adverſaries, knowing how the Queen ſtood affected to Villiers, judged the archbiſhop of Canterbury alone able to perſuade her to what they deſired. This prelate, who neither loved nor regarded that favorite, readily undertook ſpeaking to Queen Ann; but his firſt attempt was fruitleſs. Her Majeſty, who was perfectly acquainted with King James's temper, told the prelate, that neither he, nor they who ſet him on, knew what they did; adding, "I know the King better "than you all; for if this young man be once "brought in, the firſt perſon he will plague, muſt "be you who labor for him: yea, I ſhall have my "part alſo. The King will teach him to deſpiſe "and hardly intreat us all, that he may ſeem to "be beholden to none but himſelf."

JAMES I. AN' 1615.

Ruſhworth, p. 456. Edit. 1721. Coke, p. 83.

For this time, the archbiſhop could not prevail with the Queen; but afterwards he ſo preſſed her that at length ſhe deſired the King to receive Villiers as a favorite. James, who waited for nothing elſe, inſtantly ſent for Villiers, knighted him with the Prince of Wales's ſword, and ordered him to be ſworn gentleman of the bed-chamber. Somerſet, having notice, came inſtantly, and intreated the King to make Villiers only a groom; but the archbiſhop and other grandees intreated her majeſty to compleat the work; and at laſt Villiers was admited to the poſt firſt ordered him by his royal patron. Immediately on his quiting the King's preſenſe, he waited on the archbiſhop, and acknowledging himſelf indebted to him for his good fortune, deſired his inſtructions how to behave. The prelate told him, he had three leſſons to give him: Firſt, to pray without ceaſing for the King's proſperity, and for grace to ſerve his maſter faithfully. Secondly, to labour continually to preſerve a good union between the King, Queen, and Prince. Thirdly, to tell the King nothing but truth. Then he cauſed him to repeat theſe three leſſons before him, to know if he retained them. The King hearing this, was extremely well pleaſed with it, and ſaid, theſe leſſons were truly worthy a biſhop. The Queen's prediction proved but too true, with regard to the archbiſhop, who was one of the firſt who taſted of the new favorite's ingratitude. Mean while, as Villiers came to court without a great ſtock of wealth, the King eaſily gueſſed he wanted a ſupply. Had it been in his power to follow his inclination, this ſupply would have been very conſiderable: but he was himſelf ſo deſtitute of money, that a preſent of a thouſand pounds was the utmoſt he could ſpare him at that juncture.

After Villiers was made gentleman of the bed-chamber, diverſe courtiers ſided with him, in hope he would ſoon ſupplant his competitor. Others continued firm to the earl of Somerſet, whether thro' gratitude, or for fear of ruining their fortune by a wrong conjecture. Accordingly, two parties were formed at court, who claſhed on all occaſions. Had James at once diſmiſſed Somerſet, all would have been quiet: but he deſigned to retain both; not ſo much thro' any great regard to Somerſet, of whom he was tired, as to avoid the imputation of inconſtancy. Thus, by James's ſtill affecting to ſhew he loved his favorite as well as ever, his courtiers were ſtrangely imbaraſſed. But Villiers daily ſtole the hearts of both courtiers and petitioners from his rival, by his noble and generous way of promoting their ſuits.

Two parties formed at court. Weldon.

Coke, p. 48.

Mean while the earl of Somerſet, perceiving he daily declined in favor, before all things, thought of ſecuring himſelf from the danger to which he might be expoſed on account of Overbury's murder. Tho' he knew the King bore him not the ſame affection as formerly, he however hoped, as it was not utterly extinguiſhed, to obtain what at leaſt would free him from anxiety. Finding therefore a favorable opportunity, he caſt himſelf at his royal maſter's feet, and repreſented to him that, having ſerved him ſome years in a moſt perilous ſtation, it was difficult not to fall into ſome miſcarriages, and therefore beſought him to grant him a general pardon, which might ſecure him from the malice of his enemies. James very readily complied with his requeſt, and ordered the drawing up as ample a pardon as poſſible. This was accordingly done; but, whether thro' the ignorance or malice of the perſon who drew this inſtrument, the King was made to ſay in it, that he pardoned not only all manner of treaſons, murders, felonies, and outrages whatever, already commited, but alſo thoſe which ſhould be hereafter commited by the earl of Somerſet (1).

Coke, p. 84.

James ſigned this pardon without any ſcruple, and poſſibly without reading it: but the lord chancellor Egerton refuſed affixing the ſeal, (2) ſaying, as there had never been any inſtance of ſuch amneſty, he ſhould incur a Præmunire if he paſſed it; and when he acquainted his Majeſty with the reaſon of this refuſal, he readily ſatisfied him he could not anſwer ſealing it. Nothing was eaſier than to draw another pardon, without that clauſe which raiſed the chancellor's ſcruples: but whether the Queen oppoſed it, as ſome affirm, or Somerſet cared not to diſcover manifeſtly the occaſion he had for a pardon, or the King had already learned the circumſtances of Overbury's death, nothing more was ſaid of it. Indeed, there is a probability of James's now having ſome knowledge of Overbury's caſe, but perhaps not ſufficient to convince him of Somerſet's guilt. However this be, he commenced his ſummer progreſs before this buſineſs became public.

But the chancellor would not paſs it. ibid.

Uncertainty of the courtiers, with reſpect to the favorites. Weldon.

King James's diſſimulation, with reſpect to his two favorites, held the court in continual ſuſpenſe. Many were afraid of adhering to Villiers, leſt his credit was not yet firmly eſtabliſhed. Others declared openly againſt Somerſet, in order to make a merit of it with the new favorite. Winwood was one of theſe, and on every occaſion affected to oppoſe the earl of Somerſet, who no longer had it in his power to be revenged. During the whole progreſs, many diſputes and quarrels aroſe between the two parties, to the great diſguſt of his Majeſty. Finally, on the court's return to Royſton, the fatal blow was given.

James informed of Overbury's being poiſoned. Weldon, p. 94. Wilſon. Franklyn's annals.

Franklin, who adminiſtered the invenomed clyſter to Overbury, in compoſing it was aſſiſted by one Reeve, an apothecary's boy, who was afterwards ſent into Flanders, or poſſibly run away from his maſter. This Reeve, being at Fluſhing, whither ſome affairs had brought Sir William Trumbull, King James's envoy at Bruſſels, got acquainted with ſome of his retinue, and, whether unadviſedly, or with deſign, informed them of what he knew concerning Overbury's death (3). Thoſe ſervants imparting this to their maſter, he perſonally examined Reeve, and having drawn from him what he deſired, found means to detain him at his houſe. Then he wrote to Winwood, deſiring him to obtain the King's leave for his coming to England, as having ſome matters to reveal, which he could not truſt to paper. Leave being granted, he acquainted Winwood with what he had learned (4), and Winwood told it the King, who commanded them both to keep it private 'till farther orders.

James I. An' 1615.

He tries in vain to reconcile his two favorites. Weldon, p. 97, 98.

Some time after, the King being returned to London, wanted to reconcile his two favorites, to be freed from the inceſſant importunities occaſioned by their partiſans conteſts. He imagined to have pitched on a moſt excellent expedient, by obliging Villiers to make the firſt advances, and deſire the earl of Somerſet's favor and protection. To that purpoſe, he ordered ſir Humphrey May, Somerſet's creature, but who ſhewed great reſpect for Villiers, to tell the earl, as of himſelf, that he was credibly informed Villiers would come and deſire his friendſhip and protection, and adviſed him to receive him courteouſly, and that, by giving his Majeſty this token of his compliance, he would ſtill remain highly in favor, tho' he was not to flatter himſelf with reigning alone in the King's affection. Sir Humphrey May having diſcharged his commiſſion, and finding Somerſet not very ready to follow his advice, was at length forced to tell him in plain terms, that what he had ſaid was by the King's order, and warned him to conſider ſeriouſly the conſequence of a refuſal. About half an hour after, Villiers came to the earl, whom he thus accoſted: "My lord, I deſire to be your "ſervant and creature, and to take my court-pre-"ferment under your lordſhip's favor, and your "lordſhip ſhall find me as faithful a ſervant as ever "did ſerve you." To this ſo ſubmiſſive a compliment, Somerſet made this abrupt return: "I "will have none of your ſervice, and you ſhall "have none of my favor. I will, if I can, break "your neck, and of that be confident." This anſwer greatly inſenſed the King, who from that inſtant determined on being rid of Somerſet.

It is difficult to judge whether, ſuppoſing the earl of Somerſet had behaved with more condeſcenſion to his Majeſty, and been reconciled to Villiers, Overbury's affair would have been buried in eternal oblivion. This ſeems at leaſt to be the courſe James had reſolved to take, had the earl been inclined to do what he deſired. But howſoever it be, the King arriving at Royſton, to begin his winter progreſs, expreſſed no diſpleaſure againſt Somerſet, but carried himſelf towards him as before, without the leaſt ſign of any alienation of his friendſhip. But ſome days after, he ſent in the night a meſſenger to lord chief juſtice Coke, with a letter, ordering him to make a warrant to apprehend the earl of Somerſet at Royſton, and his counteſs at London, with Franklyn, Weſton, Ann Turner, and ſir Gervaſe Elways, lieutenant of the Tower. The meſſenger was ſent back to Royſton at four in the morning, with a judge's officer to execute the warrant. This officer, on his arrival, found his Majeſty with his arm round the neck of Somerſet, who was juſt departing for London, and affectionately ſaying to him, "When ſhall I ſee thee again, Somerſet?" At that very inſtant the officer, by ſir Edward's warrant, arreſted Somerſet. who exclaimed, that ſuch affront was never offered to a peer of the realm in the King's preſenſe. The King feigned ignorance, aſking what was the matter? and when informed ſaid jeeringly; "Nay, man, there is no remedy, "for if Coke ſends for me I muſt go." Then accompanying him to the ſteps before the door, he deſired him, as he was going down, to return ſpeedily, ſaying, "he could not live without him."

Somerſet, when got to London, was ſent to the Tower, his counteſs, and the other accomplices, having been arreſted and commited while he was on the road. The ſame day, chief-juſtice Coke going to Royſton, the King told him all he had heard from Trumbull, and injoined him to ſearch narrowly into the affair, without partiality or reſpect of perſons. Coke receiving ſuch ſtrict orders, was very active in the affair: nay, ſome pretend, he was over and above ſo, and that finding in the earl of Somerſet's papers indications of his being concerned in the death of Prince Henry, he had not the prudence to conceal them. However this be, moſt of the parties accuſed were tried in October and November, and, being found guilty, were condemned and executed (1). Sir Thomas Monſon, who was likewiſe apprehended, appeared twice before the judges, and at the ſecond time Coke received a note from the King, which obliged him to ſend back the priſoner to the Tower, with theſe words, "Take him away, we have other matters againſt "him of a higher nature." It is affirmed, Coke ſaid aloud one day, as he was on the bench, "God "knows what became of that ſweet babe Prince "Henry, but I know ſomewhat"---- and then was ſilent. This gave occaſion to ſuggeſt he had made ſome diſcovery concerning the Prince's death (2).

He had, it ſeems, thro' liquoriſhneſs, as he was carrying the tart, taſted with his finger a little of the ſyrup. This ingenuous anſwer occaſioned his acquitance: it being preſumed he would not have taſted the ſyrup, had he known it to be poiſoned.

The earl of Somerſet's trial. State Trials. Weldon. p. 115.

The trial of Somerſet and his counteſs were defered to May next year, 1616, but to avoid being obliged to reſume this affair, I ſhall relate here the particulars which there occurred. If we may credit ſir Anthony Weldon, author of a little book intitled, The Court and Character of King James, which is properly but a ſatire, the King had aſſured Somerſet he ſhould not be tried. For this reaſon, when George More, lieutenant of the Tower, came and told him he muſt prepare for his trial on the morrow, he anſwered, That poſitively he would not appear in court, except he was forcibly carried thither in his bed. The ſame author adds that James, having thereof notice, ſent him word, he could not hinder his appearing before the judges, but would prevent their paſſing on him any ſentence. By this artifice, ſays Weldon, the earl was prevailed on to appear in court, where he pleaded in his defenſe, from eight in the morning 'till ſeven at night, when, contrary to his expectation, ſentence of death was paſſed upon him, as guilty of Overbury's murder. We are likewiſe aſſured by the ſame author, that the King was terribly uneaſy all that day, neither was he at reſt 'till news came of his condemnation. This ſame writer's aim, in relating theſe and many other circumſtances, was to inſinuate, that King James was afraid the earl of Somerſet, to ſave his life, would divulge ſome ſecrets he would willingly conceal: but theſe ſecrets are not explained, and probably are only chimeras. Had this Prince been under any dread from the earl of Somerſet, he would never have brought him to a trial, or commanded the judge to be ſtrict in his ſcrutiny. Nevertheleſs, allowing Weldon's book to be really a libel, and his teſtimony not much to be depended on, ſome truth however appears in what he relates, ſince the King's conduct after Somerſet's condemnation ſhews there was in this affair ſome circumſtance which held him imbaraſſed.

James I. An' 1615.

The counteſs condemned alſo. May 24.

The counteſs of Somerſet being brought before the court, pleaded only with a ſhower of tears, which raiſed ſome compaſſion in her judges, but however hindered her not from being condemned to die as well as her lord. His Majeſty granted them a reprieve, which was often renewed 'till the year 1621, when they had liberty to take up their abode at a country-ſeat, yet without however being diſcharged from the ſentence. At laſt, in 1624, about four months before the King's death, a pardon was granted them. After the earl of Somerſet was condemned, James gave him four thouſand pounds a year in land, which rents in his ſervants names he conſtantly received. This noble preſent; the pardon granted, notwithſtanding the execration James had denounced againſt himſelf and poſterity, if ever he pardoned the guilty; his reſtleſſneſs during the trial; the note ſent to the chief-juſtice while he was trying ſir Thomas Monſon; Coke's imprudent words concerning Prince Henry, and his diſgrace which ſoon followed: all theſe particulars, I ſay, have given this King's adverſaries occaſion to inſinuate, he was conſcious of ſome guilt, and they have been pleaſed to apply the whole to Prince Henry's death. But beſide that, all theſe circumſtances could at moſt only form a bare preſumption, who can affirm them to be preciſely true? Amidſt the perpetual contrarieties in the authors who write of King James I, it is difficult to know diſtinctly the truth. Some paſs over in ſilence particulars which are chiefly inſiſted on by others, or abſolutely deny facts which the others advance as inconteſtable. Some there are whoſe aim was to give a very diſadvantageous idea of the manners and qualities of this King, while others repreſent him as a Prince of moſt conſummate wiſdom, juſtice and piety. Some penned his reign while the civil wars raged in England, or when the monarchy was converted to a commonwealth. Theſe thought to do their country ſervice, in demonſtrating that the project of inſlaving England commenced in the reign of James I, and was purſued in that of Charles I. Others wrote after Charles II's reſtoration, when the civil wars were termed a moſt impious unnatural rebellion, and when the fear of falling under a deſpotic government was treated as chimerical. Hence ariſes the difficulty of making a choice amidſt ſuch contrarieties between the hiſtorians. Unhappily, the ſame factions ſtill ſubſiſt with the ſame prepoſſeſſions: ſo that no impartial hiſtory of England, from the begining of King

James I's reign, to our time, can well be expected. Let a hiſtorian lean towards which ſide he thinks fit, he will be looked on as partial by one or other of the two parties. This is a remark abſolutely neceſſary, as well for the fact I juſt mentioned, as for the whole reign of James I, and ſtill more for the ſubſequent ones.

To have done with what concerns the earl and counteſs of Somerſet, I ſhall briefly add, that their love, which had ingaged them to perpetrate ſuch enormities, finally converted to hatred. Arabella Stuart, the King's couſin-german, died in the Tower, September 27, 1615, a little before the accomplices of Overbury's murder were brought to trial. Many ſeeing that, on occaſion of theſe trials, Prince Henry's death began to be talked of afreſh, imagined this kinſwoman of his Majeſty might alſo be poiſoned. This is what ſome hiſtorians, enemies to King James, have advanced, or at leaſt inſinuated, without any other foundation than this malicious report, grounded on the chimerical project, in the begining of the preſent reign, of ſeting Arabella on the throne. She was daughter of Charles Stuart younger brother to Henry, his Majeſty's father. Conſequently, ſhe could have but very remote pretenſions to the crowns of England and Scotland, which James injoyed not by the Stuart's title, of which family he was by the father's ſide, but by right of his mother, Queen Mary, to whom Arabella was very diſtantly related. King James muſt therefore have carried his ſuſpicions beyond all imagination, to thing on poiſoning this relation at a time when there was no commotion either in England or Scotland, and when ſhe was actually in priſon. The cauſe of her diſgrace was, her privately eſpouſing, without the King's conſent, ſir William Seymour, grandſon of the earl of Hertford, for which King James ſent them both to the Tower, whence ſome time after they eſcaped, deſigning to flee into France. Seymour had the good fortune to get off; but Arabella was taken and ſhut up in the Tower, where ſhe died (3).

Villiers rules all at court. Weldon. p. 123.

Somerſet's affair ending all diſputes between the two favorites, the court was reſtored to its priſtine tranquillity, under the management of Villiers, who ingroſſed the King's affection without a rival (4). The new favorite behaved in much the ſame manner as his predeceſſor. He ſuffered himſelf at firſt to be guided by ſuch as he thought wiſer and more experienced than himſelf: but in time he fancied himſelf the ableſt perſon in the kingdom. His firſt care was gradually to diſmiſs the earl of Somerſet's creatures, and confer their imploys on his own friends and relatives. Nothing more material was tranſacted at court, for ſome years, except thoſe two uſual affairs of this reign, wherein the new favorite's promotion made no alteration: I mean ſtretching the prerogative royal (on which James was conſtantly and zealouſly intent) and ſtudying means to raiſe money without the parliament. Of theſe two points, the firſt did this year produce between his Majeſty and the judges a ſharp conteſt, whereof this was the occaſion.

Diſpute between James and the judges concerning the prerogative. Annals, p. 17. Camden. Ann.

James deſigning to give in Commendam a vacant benefice, it was, in the court of Common-Pleas, diſputed not only whether the King might give a Commendam to a biſhop, either before or after his conſecration, but alſo whether Commendams were to be granted without neceſſity. The chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas, finding the caſe difficult to be decided, deſired to have it farther argued by all the judges, as in nice points is the uſual practiſe. King James, who was at Royſton, having thereof notice, ordered his attorney-general * to ſignify, by letters, to all the judges, that they ſhould defer determining the affair 'till his return. Notwithſtanding this order, the judges met and argued the caſe: after which, they unanimouſly ſigned a writing, declaring they could not obey his Majeſty's command, becauſe they were ſworn to have no regard to the King's orders or letters, in matters concerning private perſons. James, irritated at their procedure, wrote to them, that it was not his intent to ſtop the courſe of juſtice; nevertheleſs he would not indure that, under color of determining caſes between private perſons, they ſhould attack the prerogative royal, or "That "any perſon ſhould be allowed to diſpute or argue "on that head:" that the argument drawn from their oath was impertinent, ſince the oath was injoined by the Kings his predeceſſors, only to prevent the importunities of ſuitors †, and not to give the judges authority to determine in points of prerogative. He concluded with a peremptory injunction, not to proceed "'till they had conſulted "him."

† To the Prince.

It muſt be obſerved that, in this letter, King James ſuppoſed two or three principles, which neither the judges, nor moſt of the Engliſh did admit. The firſt, that no perſon had a right to argue concerning the extent of his prerogative, ſince the judges of the realm, being conſidered as intermediate perſons between King and people, were alone to decide, and generally did decide all queſtions on this head. The ſecond principle was, that the oath taken by the judges, at their admitance into their office, was injoined by the Kings his predeceſſors, to avoid the ſollicitations of ſuitors; whereas it was the common opinion, that the power aſcribed judges to diſobey the Sovereign's letters, was given them by the whole nation repreſented in parliament. The third principle was, that nothing ought to be decided without conſulting him; meaning that their determination was to be founded on what himſelf ſhould injoin. The generality of people thence maintained, that James's drift was thereby to eſtabliſh a new prerogative unheard of in England.

The council decides in James's favor. Annals, p. 17.

After ſome time they appointed to meet at a certain place on the Thames, in order to flee beyond ſea. He leaving his man in his bed to act his part with his keeper, got out of the Tower in diſguiſe, and came to the place appointed. She, dreſſed like a young gallant, followed him from her houſe, but happening to ſtay beyond the limited time, he went away, leaving word, if ſhe came, he was gone before to Dunkirk. She, full of tears, and lagging in her flight, was apprehended and ſent to the Tower. land, he had obſerved that the counſellors at the bar § aſſumed a liberty to argue the extent of a prerogative royal, which on that pretenſe was trampled upon, and it was the judges buſineſs to bridle this inſolence in their reſpective courts. Then touching on the order he had ſent them, he ſaid in a moſt magiſterial tone, that no reaſon whatſoever could excuſe their non-compliance. James's manner of utterance terrified the judges, who choſe rather to give way than reſiſt him to his face. Coke alone conſtantly maintained, that the King's order being contrary to law, they were not to blame for refuſing to obey it. Thereupon, with ſome emotion, the Monarch ſaid, whether they had done well or ill, he would not ſuffer his prerogative to be conteſted. In fine, the judges being withdrawn, the council unanimouſly determined the caſe in his Majeſty's favor.

§ And in the houſe of commons.

The peoples murmurs.

This affair made great noiſe among the people. They who were already prejudiced againſt the King, ſaid, It was manifeſt that he aimed at reigning deſpotically: that not only he contemned the judges deciſions, but would not even indure that his prerogative ſhould be argued, and pretended to be ſole judge of the extent of his power. But others admired his courage in maintaining the crown's prerogatives.

Coke turned out. Wilſon, p. 704, 705. Coke, p. 91. Annals.

It was not long before Coke felt the effects of his Majeſty's indignation. The chief juſtice having brought a complaint, in the ſtar-chamber, againſt lord chancellor Elleſmere, concerning an order iſſued from the court of Chancery, and having loſt his cauſe, was cited before the council, where he was accuſed, 1. Of having wrongfully attacked the lord chancellor (1). 2. Of having * concealed a ſtatute of twelve thouſand pounds due to the King from the late lord chancellor Hatton. 3. Of having ſaid in open court, that his Majeſty was laboring to overthrow the common-law of England. 4. Of having behaved very inſolently to the King, in the caſe of Commendams. Alſo the lord treaſurer reproached him before the council, for ſuffering his coachman to drive him bare-headed, a privilege not allowed even to the lord chancellor. As the King was diſpleaſed with him, this ſufficed to turn him out of his place, which was given to ſir Henry Montague. Coke was extremely well verſed in the common laws of England, of which he wrote a book highly eſteemed, and which is daily cited in the courts of juſtice, and the high-court of parliament (2). But as he was one of thoſe who ſuſpected the King of aſpiring to arbitrary power, and thought it his duty to oppoſe it, he could not be agreeable to the court.

The lord chancellor delivers up the great-ſeal. Annals, p. 20.

Very ſoon after, the lord-chancellor Elleſmere being taken ſo ill as to deſpair of being able to continue the functions of his office, deſired the King to confer it on another. But James, without granting his requeſt, ſent for the ſeal, telling him, he would himſelf be his deputy: and in effect he kept the great-ſeal 'till Elleſmere's death, which was not 'till March in the year following. After that, ſir Francis Bacon, attorney-general, was made lord-keeper, and then chancellor. He was a man of great abilities, as appears in his works, but a ſervile flatterer, cringing to thoſe in favor, and very haughty to ſuch as he believed he ſhould not want.

JAMES I. AN' 1616.

Prince Charles, the King's only ſon, was created this year (3) Prince of Wales, with the uſual ſolemnities. His father thought of marrying him, but it was not eaſy to find a Princeſs fit for him. There was not then in all Europe any daughter of a Proteſtant King, and James could not reſolve to match him with any perſon of a lower degree. Several of his predeceſſors had not been ſo difficult: but for his part, he was extremely nice on this article. According to him, it would have been a diſparagement to the Prince his ſon to eſpouſe the daughter of any German Prince. He choſe rather, contrary to all the rules of good policy, to ſeek him a wife of a houſe ſworn enemy to the Proteſtant religion, than to marry him to one of his own perſuaſion, who was not royally deſcended. This infatuation, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, is to be conſidered as the ſource of all the remaining occurrences of this reign, and of all the vexations James had to indure, as well from foreigners as his own ſubjects. It may be farther added, that this made him better known than before, and in a manner no way to his advantage. He would have matched his eldeſt ſon, Prince Henry, with Ann of Auſtria, who afterwards eſpouſed Lewis XIII, King of France: but having finally diſcovered, that the Spaniſh court carried on the negociation only to amuſe him, he deſiſted from that project. The French King's marriage being ſolemniſed this year, 1616, James ſent embaſſadors to France and Spain to congratulate both theſe Monarchs. Lord Hay, a Scot, was choſen for the French embaſſy (4), and lord Roſs for the Spaniſh. They had both orders to ſound the two courts concerning the Prince of Wales's marriage with Lewis XIII's eldeſt ſiſter, or with the Infanta Maria, daughter of Philip III. Lord Hay ſoon perceived his negociation would be fruitleſs, ſince the Princeſs of France was already promiſed to the Prince of Piedmont, ſon to the duke of Savoy.

Franklyn's Annals. Wilſon.

While theſe matters were in agitation, and before lord Roſs's arrival in Spain, ſir John Digby, King James's embaſſador to Philip III, wrote home to his royal maſter, that the duke of Lerma had made overtures of a marriage between the Infanta Maria, and the Prince of Wales, and deſired particular inſtructions on the affair. He adviſed him however not to break off the negociation with France, leſt Lerma's motion ſhould be a mere artifice to render him ſuſpected to the Proteſtants. James could the leſs doubt of Digby's ſuſpicion being well grounded, as ſir Dudley Carleton, his embaſſador at the Hague, had informed him, that to weaken the good intelligence between him and the ſtates-general, a report was ſpread, that the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta of Spain was on foot, and already in good forwardneſs. But he took no notice of this intelligence. On the contrary, he ſent ſir John Digby orders to commence the negociation with Spain. At the ſame time, count Gondemar *, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, received a commiſſion to treat with the King concerning this alliance.

conceal his extreme desire to have this match accompliſhed. Hence he gave occaſion to the Spaniard, who had then no deſign to treat ſeriouſly of this affair, to feign that he paſſionately wiſhed to conclude it to his ſatisfaction, and to draw from his readineſs conſiderable advantages for the houſe of Auſtria and the Catholic religion. By means of this ſame deſire it was, that count Gondemar, a man of great abilities, ſo inſinuated himſelf into James's good graces that, for diverſe years he made him to do in a manner juſt whatever he pleaſed, by puting him in fear that the marriage would miſcarry if the Spaniſh court was not managed. We may judge of the policy of that court, by the length of this negociation, which was made to laſt ſeven years. At firſt, the Spaniard intended only to prevent King James's interfering in the Cleves war, and aſſiſting the Proteſtant Princes: but afterwards a more important affair made it his intereſt more than ever to amuſe the King of England, and to keep him, as we ſay, with his noſe to the grind-ſtone.

James's ſtrange conduct.

Certainly, the conduct of this Prince, who in ſome people's opinion ſtill paſſes for the Solomon of his age, was very extraordinary. Under color of being at peace with all the world, he meddled not with any foreign affairs. He unconcernedly beheld France openly laboring the Hugonots extirpation, and the houſe of Auſtria forming projects to inſlave all Europe, and daily growing in power, to the juſt dread of even circumjacent ſtates, but more particularly thoſe of the Proteſtants. Moreover, he expreſſed a ſtrong deſire to be allied to that houſe, by a marriage which could not but be prejudicial to the eſtabliſhed religion of England. In ſhort, if his management at home be examined, one is at a loſs where to meet with that capacity, that vaſt ſtock of wiſdom wherewith he imagined himſelf bleſſed.

Coke, p. 85.

Without any war upon his hands, he had conſumed immenſe ſums, and alienated almoſt all the crown-lands, to inrich a dozen of Engliſh and Scotch favorites, who had never done him any ſervice of conſideration. The earl of Somerſet had, before his diſgrace, amaſſed two hundred thouſand pounds in money, plate and jewels, beſide nineteen thouſand pounds a year in land, tho' he had been only five years in favor. The earl of Saliſbury, lord Burleigh's younger ſon, who had no eſtate but what he derived from the crown, had left his ſon as rich as any peer in England. The earl of Northampton, younger brother of the late duke of Norfolk, had erected in London a moſt ſtately palace (1), ſince named Northumberland-houſe, and left a vaſt inheritance to his nephew, the earl of Arundel, tho' he had little or nothing from his family. The earl of Suffolk, the duke of Norfolk's youngeſt ſon, had builded a country ſeat, which coſt upwards of two hundred thouſand pounds; and he did not, as may be preſumed, lay out his whole ſubſtance on this ſtructure (2). The duke of Lenox, the earl of Dunbar, and lord Hay, had remited immenſe ſums into Scotland, and ſir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, tho' a younger ſon, had found means to raiſe a prodigious eſtate. Amidſt all theſe favorites ſo wealthy and powerful, the King was extremely indigent, continually giving beyond his ability, and runing into needleſs expenſes, without ever regulating his treaſury. To all this was added a new favorite, who being no leſs greedy than the reſt, was alſo to be inriched, and had a numerous kindred, whom he did not mean ſhould be left neceſſitous. Another effect of this King's great wiſdom was, to quarrel with his parliament, in ſupport of a prerogative which he would have carried higher than any of his predeceſſors, and thereby put himſelf under a neceſſity of uſing illegal methods of raiſing money, which could not but alienate from him the affection of his people. Let us finally ſubjoin his weakneſſes, in conſtantly ſuffering himſelf to be ſo ſwayed by his minions, that he either could not, or would not ſee but with their eyes. At the time I am now ſpeaking of, his cabinet-council conſiſted ſolely of the new favorite, a young man without experienſe, thro' whoſe hands never any affair of moment had paſſed, and who notwithſtanding thought himſelf the ableſt ſtateſman in the kingdom (3). The earl of Suffolk was more verſed in affairs, tho' he was never counted a great genius: but he was now on the decline of his favor, Villiers being far from ſupporting the earl of Somerſet's father-in-law. Bacon, lord-keeper, was well verſed in the national laws, and capable of giving good counſel; but he made it his whole ſtudy to adapt himſelf to the King's humor, and make his court to the favorite.

Coke. Clarendon. Weldon.

James An' 1616.

The ſole buſineſs which then imployed King James and his miniſters, was to find money, and in plenty too, otherwiſe his Majeſty would have led a ſad life: but all means ſeemed to have been exhauſted, and a parliament could not ſafely be called, the wound of the impriſoned members being ſtill too freſh to hope it was yet cloſed. Mean while, the treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta, brought James a ſeaſonable and very unexpected ſupply. Queen Elizabeth had ſettled with the ſtates of the United Provinces the arrears they owed her, amounting to eight millions of florins: this ſum was due to James, as Elizabeth's ſucceſſor. The ſtates would have paid the debt long ſince, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, becauſe they thereby ingaged that kingdom to ſupport them: but after the twelve years truce was concluded, the face of affairs was changed. The ſtates no longer needed England's protection, and beſide James held in their provinces places which gave him opportunity to treat them magiſterially, as he had done in the affair of Vorſtius. It was therefore time for them to recover theſe places, ſince they had not the ſame intereſt now to leave them in Engliſh hands, when their dread of Spain was very conſiderably leſſened by the truce: but the ſum they were to pay was ſo large, that they waited a favorable opportunity to procure them ſome abatement. Such occaſion offering not 'till the preſent year 1616, they imbraced it more eagerly, as they were under a preſſing neceſſity to withdraw their towns from the Engliſh. King James treating of his ſon's marriage with the Infanta, it was to be feared reſtitution of theſe towns, to which the Spaniards laid claim, would be one article of the marriage treaty, eſpecially as a clauſe in the treaty of 1604, between England and Spain, gave them juſt cauſe for ſuch apprehenſion. On the other hand, the preſent juncture was favorable to them, becauſe James's coffers were quite empty, and there was no likelihood of his venturing to call a parliament, by reaſon of the peoples diſcontent. The whole difficulty then conſiſted in managing ſo, that the offer of reſtoring thoſe cautionary towns ſhould come from James himſelf, becauſe, in ſuch caſe the ſtates might pretend inability to diſcharge ſo large a ſum, and that would naturally lead to a negociation for ſome abatement: ſo, to bring the King to this point, they ceaſed for a time paying the gariſons of the places in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; tho', 'till then, they had punctually executed the treaty which obliged them to furniſh their ſubſiſtence. The gariſons complained, and the ſtates, without however refuſing payment, deviſed ſeveral pretexts to defer it. This delay obliged the Engliſh forces, who were greatly neceſſitated, to addreſs their Sovereign, who was not in condition to give them ſatisfaction. He complained to the ſtates, who anſwered with great moderation, inſiſting on the ill ſtate of their affairs, by reaſon of their vaſt expenſe during the war. In a word, this affair was not ſettled, and the Engliſh gariſons ſtill remained unſupplied. At length Caron, the Dutch envoy in England, intimated as of himſelf to ſome one of the miniſters, that he believed, if his Majeſty would offer to reſtore the towns in his poſſeſſion, the ſtates would do their utmoſt to diſcharge the whole debt, by borrowing money at high intereſt. This intimation produced the wiſhed effect. James, being in great want of money, and ſeeing a near proſpect of drawing from the ſtates a large ſum, which the courtiers had already devoured in their thoughts, readily determined on ſurrendring the cautionary towns. Purſuant to this reſolution, he wrote to the ſtates, "That he knew them to be "his good friends and confederates, both in point "of religion and policy, therefore he apprehended "not the leaſt fear of difference between them: "in contemplation whereof, if they would have "their towns again, he would willingly ſurrender "them." Upon this letter, they ſent over penſionary Barnevelt, who ſo artfully managed this affair, that they were diſcharged for two millions ſeven hundred twenty eight thouſand florins, in lieu of eight millions, which they had promiſed to pay to Elizabeth, beſide eighteen years intereſt. By this agreement, the cautionary towns were delivered to the ſtates the fourteenth of June 1616.

Reflections to the King's diſadvantage.

They who were leaſt pleaſed with the court, greatly cenſured this treaty, which robbed the crown of England of the advantage of holding the United Provinces in a ſort of ſubjection. It was ſaid that, indeed Elizabeth was bound to reſign theſe places, on payment of the ſums ſhe had advanced; but there was no neceſſity to reſtore them for much leſs: that there was the leſs occaſion to haſten this reſtitution, as the gariſons were not maintained by the crown; and if the ſtates neglected performing their ſtipulation with Queen Elizabeth, his Majeſty ſhould have made them ſenſible they had not done it with impunity. Theſe reflections made not greatly for James's honor, and his proceedings on this occaſion could at moſt but confirm to him the title of Pacific (1), which he affected above all others. But it was abundantly worſe, when it was ſeen, very ſoon after, that the money paid by the ſtates was vaniſhed, without a poſſibility of gueſſing how it had been imployed. The King had not diſcharged any of his debts: the navy was ſuffered to decay for want of money to repair it; and nothing had been ſent to his army in Ireland, which had not received one penny for ſeveral years, and whoſe wants had ſerved for pretenſe to treat with the ſtates.

The lord treaſurer accuſed of miſmanagement. Wilſon, p. 705. Annals, p. 22. Coke. Camd. Ann.

It finally appeared, that the lord treaſurer Suffolk had converted to his own uſe good part of the money received from the cautionary towns. The favorite miſſed not this opportunity to ruin a man whom he could not conſider as his friend, ſince he was father-in-law to the earl of Somerſet. Suffolk was therefore accuſed, in the ſtar-chamber, of ſundry miſdemeanors in the exerciſe of his office, and eſpecially of having kept for himſelf great part of the money received from the Hollanders. Sir Edward Coke, who was reſtored to his place, or had another, was his accuſer. He agravated his miſdemeanors; his extortions; his miſmanagement of the King's treaſures; his boldneſs in applying them to his own uſe; the corruptions of his counteſs, who took bribes with both hands; the artifices of his deputy Bingley to inſnare ſuch as had buſineſs with his maſter. After that, he cited many precedents of treaſurers who, in former reigns, had been puniſhed for ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and ſhewed the dangerous conſequences reſulting from the ill adminiſtration of the treaſurerſhip, when it was not managed by uncorrupt perſons. Had the lord treaſurer caſt himſelf on the King's mercy, he would have had a cheap acquitance: but he would needs juſtify himſelf, and not doing it to the ſatisfaction of his judges, he was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during his Majeſty's pleaſure, and Bingley was fined two thouſand pounds. 'Till the King ſhould make choice of a treaſurer, that office was executed by commiſſioners, the firſt of whom was ſir Henry Montague, the favorite's creature.

James ever full of his prerogative.

The tranquillity James injoyed, might have been deemed perfect, if the fear of his pretogative's being attacked, had not continually diſturbed his repoſe. In vain did he preach and advance his principles on all occaſions, having the misfortune to be regarded by none but his courtiers and immediate dependants. For this reaſon he durſt not call a parliament, knowing the commons allowed not of his maxims. He ſeems to have thought it pure ignorance in the Engliſh, and that, by a frequent repetition of the Sovereign's prerogatives, he ſhould at length ſucceed in convincing them of the truth of his principles. This he took occaſion to do in June this year, in a ſolemn aſſembly held in the ſtar-chamber, on pretenſe of making known his deſign to correct certain abuſes in the courts of juſtice. He made a very prolix harangue, abounding with diviſions and ſubdiviſions, according to his cuſtom, and took for his text theſe words of Pſalm lxxii. 1. James I. An' 1616.

" ward, and the King and the judges downward; " the King to ſettle the law of God, and his " judges to interpret the law of the King."

Then he teaches the judges their duty in adminiſtering juſtice; and, after expatiating upon many common places, he proceeds to the limits preſcribed them: " Incroach not upon the prerogative; deal " not in difficult queſtions, before you conſult with " the King and council, for fear of wounding the " King thro' the ſides of a private perſon." Hereupon he takes occaſion to commend ſome of the judges for rebuking the popular humor of certain pleaders at the bar, who meddled with ſuch matters. " That which concerns (ſays he) the myſtery " of the King's power, is not lawful to be diſputed; " for that is to wade into the weakneſs of Princes, " and to take away the myſtical reverence which " belongs to thoſe who ſit in the throne of God " (1)."

Having run thro', and given his opinion concerning the ſeveral courts of judicature, he goes on, " It is the duty of judges to puniſh ſuch as ſeek to " deprave the King's courts, and therefore it was " a very odious and inept ſpeech in Weſtminſter-" Hall, to ſay, that a Præmunire lay againſt the " court of Chancery. I mean not that the Chancery " ſhould exceed its limits, but the King only is to " correct it, and none elſe; and therefore I was " greatly abuſed in that attempt: and for that rea-" ſon commanded, that no man hereafter preſume " to ſue a Præmunire againſt that court."

Afterwards he ſpeaks of the Star-Chamber, and ſays, " As a ſtar is a glorious creature, next in " place to the angels; ſo this court is the moſt " glorious of all courts, conſiſting of privy-coun-" ſellors, judges, peers of the realm, and biſhops, " and conſequently the learning of both divine and " human law, the experienſe and practiſe of go-" vernment, are conjoined together in the pro-" ceedings of this court." Adding; " I have la-" boured to gather articles, like an index expurga-" torius of novelties creped into the law; look to " Plowden's caſes, and if you find it not there, a-" way with it."

Next he addreſſes the auditory, and gives them advice with reſpect to the law-ſuits then carrying on in the ſeveral courts. He chiefly adviſes them in their pleas, " not to preſume to meddle with " things againſt the King's prerogative or honor: " If they do, the judges will puniſh them; and in " caſe the judges do not, he muſt puniſh both them " and the judges. Plead not (continues he) upon " new Puritanical ſtrains, which make all things " popular, but keep you within the ancient limits " of pleas."

In ſpeaking of recuſants, that is, thoſe who refuſed to be of the church of England, he ſays, " There are three ſorts: The firſt are they who " inforced by law, come now and then to church; " theſe are formal to the law, but falſe to God (2). " The ſecond ſort are they who have their con-" ſcience miſled, and therefore refuſe to come to " church, but otherwiſe live as peaceable ſubjects " (3). The third ſort are practiſing recuſants, " who force their ſervants and tenants to be of " their opinion; theſe are men of pride and pre-" ſumption (4). He adds, I can love the perſon " of a Papiſt ſo born and bred, but apoſtate Pa-" piſts I hate; ſuch deſerve ſevere puniſhment (5). " I confeſs I am loth to hang a prieſt only for his " religion, and ſaying maſs; but if they re-" fuſe the oath of allegiance, I leave them to the " law."

James I. An' 1616.

He concludes his long ſpeech with exhorting the judges to countenance the clergy againſt both Papiſts and Puritans; adding, God and the King will reward their zeal.

Remark on this ſpeech.

It is eaſy to obſerve, as well in this as in James's other ſpeeches in public, and on ſundry occaſions, three principal deſigns which he had ever in view. The firſt was, to eſtabliſh the prerogative royal according to his own principles. The ſecond, to intimate, that the Papiſts were not to be moleſted, provided they lived peaceably, and took the oath of allegiance. The third was, to expreſs his hatred of the Puritans, and to create a like averſion for them in the people. But it would be a great miſtake to aſcribe this hatred to their refuſing to allow of the ſurplice, the croſs in baptiſm, kneeling at the communion. Theſe were not the points which rendered them ſo odious in his ſight. He fancied their principles with reſpect to church-government led them to be enemies to monarchy. For this reaſon, all arguments againſt the extent of the royal prerogative ſeemed to him to be founded on Puritanical principles.

Villiers made earl of Buckingham. Howes.

An' 1617. Account of the archbiſhop of Spalato. Wilſon. p. 707. Howes. p. 1026.

Early in 1617, arrived in England Marco Antonio de Dominis (7), archbiſhop of Spalato in Dalmatia, who was come to profeſs the Proteſtant religion in the communion of the church of England. As he was a man advanced in years, and very corpulent, it was readily believed, no other motive but that of religion and conſcience could have induced him to undertake ſo long a voyage, and quit his archbiſhoprick. He preached and wrote againſt Popery, and at length was prefered to the maſterſhip of the Savoy, and deanery of Windſor. After ſome years ſtay in England, he ſuffered himſelf to be gained by count Gondemar, the Spaniſh embaſſador, with hopes of a cardinal's cap, if he would go to Rome, and publicly abjure the Proteſtant religion. This man, upon the brink of the grave, being ſeduced by Gondemar's promiſe, went to Rome, and abjured the belief he had imbraced in England, after which, inſtead of being a cardinal, he was thrown into a dungeon in the Inquiſition, where he died, and notwith-

JAMES I. AN' 1617.

James determines to compel the Scots to conform to the church of England. Spotſwood. p. 529, &c. Annals, p. 25. Wilſon, Burnet.

ſtanding his abjuration, his body was publicly burned.

I have frequently mentioned King James's averſion to the Puritans, whoſe government, which came very near the republican, was directly contrary to the principles he was laboring to eſtabliſh. Ever ſince his arrival in England, he had held theſe ſectarians ſo low, that it was not in their power to give him any diſturbance: but to his exceſſive mortification the church of Scotland was ſtill Presbyterian. Indeed epiſcopacy was not intirely ſuppreſſed in that kingdom; but it was in ſuch a ſtate, that the biſhops had no manner of juriſdiction. The ſeveral preſbyteries, and the general aſſembly of the clergy, had ingroſſed the whole eccleſiaſtical authority, and left the prelates a bare name without power. There were alſo many other points wherein the Scotiſh church differed from the Engliſh, ſo that Puritaniſm triumphed in Scotland, at the time it was in England regarded as a ſort of rebellion. James had therefore determined to put the church of Scotland on the ſame foot with that of England; but perceiving that to compel the Scots, all at once, to a perfect conformity with the Engliſh church, would be a task too difficult, he was for leading them to it gradually. Agreeably to this ſcheme, he had ſent to the general aſſembly of the kirk certain articles, which he deſired might be inſerted into the church canons. Theſe articles were:

Spotſwood. Annals.

1. For the future, the holy communion ſhould be received kneeling.

2. The euchariſt ſhould not be denied to the ſick, with three or four perſons to communicate with them.

3. Chriſtmas, Eaſter, Aſcenſion-day, and Whit-ſunday, ſhould be kept as holy-days, and the preachers ſhould make choice of texts ſuitable to the occaſion.

4. Confirmation ſhould be practiſed after this manner; when the children were eight years old, the miniſters ſhould catechiſe them, and then the biſhops in their viſitations ſhould bleſs them with prayer for God's grace, and the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt (1).

He meets with oppoſition. Spotſwood.

With regard to this latter article, James deſired not that confirmation ſhould be received in Scotland as practiſed in the church of England, becauſe he was not fully convinced of its utility: but as it concerned one of the epiſcopal functions, he would that biſhops ſhould have at leaſt ſome hand in the matter.

James's deſign being to compaſs his end by degrees, he had ſelected theſe four articles as leaſt liable to give offenſe to the miniſters, in order to leave them inexcuſable, in caſe they rejected them. The general aſſembly of the Scotiſh church, perceiving his Majeſty's drift, declared, if the churches of England and Scotland differed only in theſe four articles, they might be received for the ſake of peace; but as they were innovations incapable of producing a perfect union, there was no neceſſity of inſerting them among the canons. James, offended with this refuſal, reſolved to compel the Scots, not only to receive theſe four articles, but alſo many more which he had not thought fit to meddle with at firſt, being perſuaded he had a right, by virtue of his royal authority, to impoſe upon his people of Scotland the religion which to him ſeemed moſt eligible. With this view, he determined on taking a journey into Scotland, under color of viſiting his native country, which in fourteen years he had not ſeen.

JAMES I. AN' 1617.

His journey into Scotland. Spotſwood. Annals, p. 27, 28.

Before his departure, he ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed in Scotland, wherein he ſaid, he was going to viſit his old kingdom, "Not to alter the "civil and eccleſiaſtical ſtate, but to reform cer- "tain abuſes in the church and commonwealth." At the ſame time he previouſly diſpatched away thither ſome officers of his houſhold, all Engliſh, with orders to adorn his chapel at Edinburg in the ſame manner as that at Whitehall; nor did thoſe agents omit taking with them a ſet of church pictures, and even ſtatues of the apoſtles. As ſoon as they began to adorn this chapel, the people of Edinburg exclaimed aloud, ſaying, "Images were "begun to be introduced, and maſs would quickly "follow."

He treats the Scots imperiouſly. May. Spotſwood. p. 530. Annals.

James, being arrived at Berwick, prorogued the parliament of Scotland, to open it himſelf, as in effect he did with a long ſpeech, according to cuſtom. To conceal his real deſign, he made diverſe propoſitions, among which he did not forget the article concerning religion, the only point he was ſeriouſly laboring. He contented himſelf at firſt with requiring, that a certain number of commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to examine and regulate religious matters. The parliament concurring with this motion, James waited not the two houſes nominating the commiſſioners, but choſe them himſelf, and appointed the lord chancellor, lord treaſurer, and clerk of the rolls, who were all three his creatures. But as the parliament ſcrupled conſenting to this nomination, he broke out into exceſſive choler, thinking it very ſtrange they ſhould pretend to name others after he had made known his pleaſure. In ſhort, as they durſt not reſiſt him to his face, he obtained whatever he pleaſed.

He gets paſſed a certain article which gives him full power. Spotſwood.

Theſe commiſſioners inſtantly ſettled one article, after which there was nothing more to be examined. The article was, "That whatſoever his Majeſty "ſhould determine in the external government of "the church, with the advice of the archbiſhops, "biſhops, and a competent number of the mini- "ſtery, ſhould have the ſtrength of a law." The King himſelf had dictated this article: "Not (ſaid "he) that I am againſt the advice of the grave "and learned miniſters, but to be over-ruled, as "in your former general aſſemblies, I will never "agree; the biſhops muſt rule the miniſters, and "the King govern both, in matters not repugnant "to God's law." Thus did King James evidently manifeſt that, ſince his acceſſion to England, he claimed in Scotland a greater authority than before.

Proteſtation againſt this article. Spotſwood. p. 531.

Mean while, the miniſters in and about Edinburg, perceiving that, by the commiſſioners prevarication, their church was on the brink of ſubverſion, ſince the King was impowered to make what innovations ſoever he pleaſed, aſſembled to conſult on ſome efficacious remedy. They found no other expedient than a proteſtation againſt the article paſſed by the commiſſioners, which having drawn they gave to one Hewet, to preſent it to his Majeſty. Hewet being come into the King's anti-chamber, in order to execute his commiſſion, the archbiſhop of St. Andrews accoſted him very courteouſly, deſiring to ſee the proteſtation; which the miniſter readily ſhewed. No ſooner had the prelate hold thereon, but he was for pocketing it, when Hewet ſeized his paper; all which could not be done without making ſome noiſe. James thereupon coming out, and hearing what occaſioned the buſtle, ſpake ſo harſhly to the miniſter, that the poor man, all in a fright, fell on his knees and craved pardon, proteſting never more to meddle in the affair.

(1) There were in all five articles, the other, which is placed third, was the ſacrament of baptiſm not to be defered longer than the next Sunday, and in caſe of neceſſity to be adminiſtered in a private houſe, with public declaration of the ſame, the Sunday after, in the church.

He ſummons the miniſters, and treats them roughly. Spotſwood, p. 533. Annals.

But notwithſtanding his Majeſty had got what he wanted of the commiſſioners, he found however he ſhould never attain his ends without conſent of the miniſters, eſpecially as their proteſtation was public, and many copies, which continually increaſed, were already diſperſed. He ordered therefore the biſhops to ſummon the miniſters to meet on the tenth of July, at St. Andrews, where he would come and ſpeak to them in perſon. The miniſters obeying the ſummons, James called them all to witneſs his great care of the church of Scotland as well before as ſince his acceſſion to the Engliſh crown, adding, he expected however no thanks for his zeal for the true worſhip of God, and for maintaining good order in his church. Then he told them that before he ſet out for Scotland, he ſent them four articles to be inſerted in their canons, which were rejected, and yet he was ſilent; that having lately deſired it might be declared that, by virtue of his prerogative, he had power to make eccleſiaſtical laws, they mutined and proteſted againſt him: However, he was very willing to paſs by all theſe, with many other affronts received at their hands. "But now, continued he, the er-
"rand for which I have called you, is to know
"your reaſons, why this ſame power ought not to "be admited. I mean not to do any thing againſt
"reaſon; and on the other part my demands be"ing juſt and religious, you muſt not think that "I will be refuſed or reſiſted." He uttered theſe laſt words kniting his brows, and looking at them, ſays the author of the Annals, with a majeſtical and ſtern eye, which made them all fall down on their knees. Then continuing his ſpeech, he ſaid, "It "is a power innate, and a ſpecial prerogative
"which we who are Chriſtian Kings have, to or"der and diſpoſe of external things in the policy
"of the church, as we, by advice of our biſhops,
"ſhall find moſt fiting. And, ſirs, for your ap-
"proving or diſapproving, deceive not your ſelves,
"I will never regard it, unleſs you bring me a rea-
"ſon which I cannot anſwer."

They demand a general aſſembly. Spotſwood. Annals.

The miniſters obſerving how magiſterially the King delivered himſelf, deſired leave to confer among themſelves. Their requeſt being granted, they returned in a few hours, with a petition for a general aſſembly, that what his Majeſty propoſed might be received with common conſent. "Ay,
"ſays the King, but what aſſurance have I of their "conſenting?" Whereupon ſome of them ſaid, they ſaw no reaſon to the contrary. "But, ſays
"the King, if the general aſſembly be of another
"mind, and your reaſon now be none of theirs
"then, and the articles are rejected, my difficulty
"will be the greater; for when I ſhall hereafter
"uſe my own authority in eſtabliſhing them, I
"ſhall be pulpited a tyrant and perſecutor; ye were "wont to do ſo." Then all cried out, that none durſt be ſo mad. "Yet experience tells (ſays the "King) that it hath been ſo; therefore unleſs I be "made ſure, I will not give way to an aſſembly.

The King refuſes it.

He grants it afterwards.

It was however eaſy to comprehend that, without ſuch aſſembly, the King could not poſſibly compaſs his views. Tho' he ſhould have extorted the conſent of thoſe miniſters then preſent, it would have been to no purpoſe, ſince they were not authoriſed: and if James had cauſed theſe articles to be paſſed by any order flowing from his abſolute authority, he ſhould have been firſt ſecure of the obedience of his ſubjects, or at leaſt of a ſufficient power to compel them, both which were equally difficult, not to ſay impracticable: wherefore James, having conſidered the buſineſs more maturely, agreed, finally, that a general aſſembly ſhould be held, at St. Andrews, in November. In this interval, Symſon, the miniſter, who drew up and ſigned the proteſtation, was impriſoned in Edinburg-caſtle, and Catherwood, who carried letters to other miniſters to incourage their adherence thereto, was baniſhed. This done, James ſet out for England.

Spotſwood. Annals.

He is diſſatisfied with the aſſembly. p. 534, &c.

The general aſſembly, held at St. Andrews in November, reſolved to defer receiving the four articles, 'till all the churches of Scotland were informed of this affair; and then ſeparated. The King was extremely inſenſed, and looking on this delay as a contempt of his authority, ordered all payment of the miniſters ſtipends to ſtop for a year: But finding this only exaſperated people, and retarded his deſign, he gave leave at length that another general aſſembly ſhould be held at Perth, Auguſt the twenty-fifth, next year. Thereat, by fair or foul means, he obtained the churches conſent to thoſe four articles: but withal, he ſowed in Scotland the ſeeds of thoſe troubles which diſtracted that kingdom in the inſuing reign, and deprived the King his ſon and ſucceſſor both of crown and life. Thus, his zeal againſt the Puritans urged him to forſake thoſe principles of equity and moderation, which he deemed ſo reaſonable with regard to Papiſts: he would not force the conſcience of theſe, provided they behaved like good ſubjects; but the Preſbyterians were to ſubmit, tho' ever ſo unwilling, to what he ſhould judge requiſite. What has been advanced on this head, is taken in a manner verbatim from the ſaid Annals, whoſe author cannot be ſuſpected of repreſenting matters to this King's diſadvantage.

He grants another, wherein he obtains his deſire. Ibid. p. 537, &c. Annals.

Buckingham made privy counſellor of Scotland.

Petition preſented to James concerning recreations on Sundays. Wilſon. p. 709. Annals. p. 31. Camden. Annals.

While his Majeſty was returning to London, he received a petition from ſome ſervants, laborers, mechanics, and other vulgar perſons, complaining, that they were debared from dancing, playing, church-ales, in a word, from all recreations on Sundays, after divine ſervice. It was thereupon ſuggeſted to him, that the Puritans deſigned to perſuade the people ſuch diverſions were contrary to that regard due to the Lord's-day: that theſe men went upon erroneous principles, namely, that Chriſtians were obliged to keep the day of reſt with the ſame ſtrictneſs as the Jews, and therefore affected to call Sunday the Sabbath. This was a ſufficient inducement to make James condemn this Puritanical ſcruple, and the rather, as he himſelf was not over and above ſcrupulous in that regard. In his name therefore was publiſhed a book, wherein by various arguments he maintained, that paſtimes on Sundays, after evening ſervice, were allowable, and withal, commanded that none ſhould be hindered or diſcouraged from any lawful recreations. This book (1) made much noiſe, neither was it exclaimed againſt by the Preſbyterians alone. Many churchmen diſapproved it, and particularly the lord-mayor of London, who, notwithſtanding the prohibition, commanded the King's own carriages to be ſtayed, as they were paſſing thro' the city on a Sunday. But James, wholly regardleſs of theſe murmurs, and willing to ſupport what he had done, injoined all miniſters to read his book publicly in their churches; and ſuch as refuſed were ſeverely puniſhed by the high-commiſſion. Some pretend, this order was a ſnare to intrap certain miniſters, who, tho'

Buckingham rules all. Wilſon.

Theſe were the moſt material affairs then tranſacting in England. King James, as has been obſerved, never concerning himſelf in any foreign buſineſs, intruſted his miniſters with the whole adminiſtration. The earl of Buckingham was chief manager. He ruled with abſolute ſway both in church and ſtate, diſpoſing of all places and preferments. If we may credit ſome writers, he beſtowed nothing without money or a yearly penſion. As the King was ever neceſſitous, the favorite was obliged to find means to ſupport, and even inrich his numerous kindred, who flocked to court to partake of his prodigious affluence. To avoid returning to theſe matters, I ſhall ſay here at once, that the favorite's elder brother was made viſcount Purbeck; his younger brother, earl of Angleſey; his mother, tho' a Papiſt, was created counteſs of Buckingham, without her huſband's injoying the ſame honor. In a word, all his female relations were married into the nobleſt and moſt opulent families of England. The favorite's mother being a ſtanch Romaniſt, and governing her ſon, who was properly of no religion, with the ſame facility as he himſelf ruled the King, it was no great wonder the Papiſts conceived mighty hopes, and ſwarmed in the kingdom. The King gave himſelf little trouble on that account. Provided people took the oath of allegiance, and were not Puritans, every thing elſe was indifferent to him. He was in a manner wholly imployed in his diverſions, and as he very frequently hunted, his admirers pretended he took thoſe times to conſider of government affairs.

The Papiſts ſwarm in England.

Annals. p. 31.

I ſhall cloſe the events of the year 1617, with the deplorable cataſtrophe of ſir Walter Ralegh. He had been a priſoner twelve years, ſince his condemnation, during which tedious confinement he had imployed himſelf in compiling his Hiſtory of the World. He finally obtained his liberty, tho' without the King's pardon. As his eſtate was all forfeited, and given to the earl of Somerſet, he was greatly imbaraſſed when he came out of priſon. The court, where he was intirely unknown, was to him like a ſtrange region. On this account, he formed the project of ſeeking his fortune in diſtant climates. He had formerly traverſed the American ſeas, and knew all the coaſts, particularly that of Guiana; nay, it is affirmed he ſet up marks to direct him again to a certain place, where was a gold mine, and that Keymis (1), his old attendant, brought him thence a piece of ore, which made him think the mine was very rich. However this be, as he was utterly at a loſs how to beſtow himſelf, he found means to acquaint King James, that he knew of a noble mine in America, whence he hoped to return mountains of gold, if his Majeſty would be pleaſed to grant him a private commiſſion. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniard, it could not be ſeized without a rupture with Spain. Nevertheleſs, the Monarch, undoubtely allured with the golden hopes inſpired by Ralegh, granted him a commiſſion, directed to "Our beloved and faithful Walter Ralegh, knight, "&c". It was ſaid afterwards, that James gave him the commiſſion with this limitation, that he ſhould not injure the Spaniſh ſubjects. But how was it poſſible to bring away gold from a mine appertaining to Spaniards, without doing them injury?

JAMES I. AN' 1617.

However, by virtue of his commiſſion, Ralegh ingaged ſeveral perſons in this project. He was ſupplied with money to fit out twelve ſail, and departed in Auguſt, 1617, in ſearch of the mine. At his arrival on the coaſt of Guiana, he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought to have ſo well obſerved. He detached however his ſon, and captain Keymis, with five ſhips, to ſail up the river Oroonoco, as high as poſſible, in order to diſcover the mountain where the ſuppoſed mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the Engliſh landed, and routing ſuch Spaniards as oppoſed their deſcent, purſued them to the town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered. Sir Walter Ralegh's ſon was killed in the aſſault. Then leaving a gariſon in the place, they advanced farther into the country, without being able to find the wiſhed for mine. At length, tired with ſearching, they returned to ſir Walter, who finding himſelf diſappointed of his hope, menaced Keymis with the King's indignation, and ſome days after, Keymis was found dead in his cabin (2). The ſailors, vexed at this ill ſucceſs, loudly complained of their being drawn into a chimerical project, and conſtrained Ralegh to ſail back for England. When they arrived at Kingſale in Ireland, he would have perſuaded them to go with him into France; but inſtead of liſtening to his propoſal, they forcibly conducted him to Plymouth, where he was arreſted by the Kings orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his abſenſe, Don Diego Sarmiento, count Gondemar, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, making loud clamors concerning ſir Walter's commiſſion, which was become public (3), James found no better way to appeaſe him, than by diſowning it, or at leaſt by aſſuring, that Ralegh had expreſs orders not to act againſt the Spaniards (4). Sir Walter returning without gold, his caſe was ſo much the worſe; beſide, the embaſſador openly inſiſted on his being puniſhed, and told the King, there was no other means to continue the treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta: wherefore James determined at length to ſacrifice Ralegh to the Spaniard. But as he could not be proſecuted for his recent expedition, for which he had a commiſſion in form, it was reſolved he ſhould loſe his head by virtue of the ſentence paſſed on him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead, that his commiſſion, wherein the King ſtiled him faithful ſervant, and gave him power of life and death over thoſe under his command, was equivalent to a pardon. The judges told him, "That treaſon could not be pardoned but by "expreſs words. So, without being called to account for his late expedition, it was ordered that the former ſentence ſhould be executed (5).

Thus fell ſir Walter Ralegh, in the ſeventy ſeventh year of his age. He was a man who deſerved a better fortune, and had a large ſhare of merit. He had alſo ſome faults, which are leſſened or agravated, in order to render his execution more or leſs odious, according as the hiſtorians are for or againſt King James. Moſt certain it is, he fell a ſacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards againſt him in Queen Elizabeth's time, and to King James's unhappy deſire to accompliſh the Prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta (1).

An' 1618. The people complain of James and the adminiſtration

Since this Prince's being on the throne, the Engliſh had lived with all their neighbors peaceably, without being diſturbed by any hoſtilities from abroad. James and his miniſters pretended this was the chief point of government, and that nothing more evidently demonſtrated the capacity of rulers than the tranquillity they procure their ſubjects. Mean while the people were diſguſted. Many affirmed, this maxim was falſe when carried too far, and that war often happens to be no leſs neceſſary than peace, for the welfare of a nation. It was diſliked that the Hollanders were ſuffered to fiſh upon the Engliſh coaſt, without aſking leave of the governor of Scarborough,* as was cuſtomary before they had redeemed their cautionary towns. Nor was it thought leſs ſtrange, that the King ſhould let them brave him with a fleet to ſupport their fiſhery, as if they flatly gave to underſtand they would fiſh on his coaſt in ſpite of him; and it was openly ſaid, that to preſerve peace by bearing ſuch affronts was no great indication of ability. The Engliſh likewiſe complained, that his Majeſty deſerted the Proteſtant religion's cauſe at a juncture when France, the Emperor, Catholic King and Roman Pontif were imploying their utmoſt efforts to work its deſtruction, and had but too much hope of ſucceeding, ſince the Defender of the Faith remained inactive. James's exceſſive jealouſy, touching his prerogative, was another main ground of diſcontent. It appeared not wherein this prerogative had been infringed; but it was thought very manifeſt he intended to ſtretch it much farther than any of his predeceſſors. It was conſidered, he had impriſoned diverſe members of parliament, purely for inſiſting in the houſe on the peoples grievances; had granted ſundry monopolies; and raiſed money on the ſubject without conſent of parliament: that his ſpeeches to the houſes, to the judges, and in the ſtar-chamber, tended only to exalt the regal authority, and make it in ſome meaſure equal to God's; from whence it was infered, that he deſigned utterly to ſubvert England's conſtitution. People could not without indignation behold a youth, who had ſcarce attained his twenty-fifth year, magiſterially lording it over the whole realm; diſpoſing of all preferments in favor of his relatives and friends; inveſted with the office of lord high admiral, tho' he had never made a voyage by ſea, except from Dover to Calais; and laſtly, honored with the title of marquis of Buckingham, without having ever done the ſtate any ſervice during the two years he had been at court. Theſe two dignities were lately beſtowed on the favorite; the firſt, by reſignation of the earl of Nottingham, who had amaſſed great wealth and obtained a penſion for the reſidue of his days. But there were ſtill farther complaints. It was ſaid, the court gave a very bad example to the whole kingdom: nothing was heard there but blaſphemous oaths and execrations, the King himſelf not being free from this vice: that religion there was made to conſiſt only in not being Puritanically inclined: that one of the two ſecretaries of ſtate was a Papiſt, as was alſo the favorite's mother: that tho' it was not known what religion her ſon was of, his debaucheries were public, and gave univerſal offenſe: that number of Papiſts daily increaſed: that matching the Prince of Wales with a Popiſh Princeſs, daughter of the Reformation's moſt capital adverſary, evidenced how little his Majeſty regarded the concerns of religion: that if any one repreſented to him or his miniſters the inconveniencies ariſing from ſuch a marriage, he was ſilenced by being told, it was attempting on the prerogative royal; and that every man, who without being required pried into the ſecrets of government, was guilty of rebellion.

James I. An' 1618.

But on the other hand, James was no leſs offended with this boldneſs in cenſuring his conduct, as if a King muſt neceſſarily be guided by the caprice of his ſubjects. What moſt troubled him was, that the Puritans were not the only perſons who durſt murmur at the adminiſtration, but that even the eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy's faſteſt friends could not brook a deſpotic government in temporals. Even the parliament had ſufficiently convinced him how far they were from ſubmiting to any laws but thoſe which had been hitherto in uſage.

The King diſſatisfied with his people. Coke.

Thus were both King and people alike diſſatisfied. True it is, James ſeemed to have a great advantage, as, there not being a parliament, no man had a right openly to arraign his conduct: but then, treaſure flowed not ſo plentifully into the exchequer as under his royal predeceſſors, who knew how to manage their parliaments. Nevertheleſs, he choſe to be in want, or to procure money by ſuch means as increaſed the peoples diſcontent, rather than run the hazard of having a parliament might queſtion his prerogative, of which he was ſtrangely jealous. He however comforted himſelf with the hope of ſpeedily concluding his ſon's marriage, whence he was to receive a dowry of two millions. It is certain, the Spaniſh court had offered that ſum: but I have not been able to diſcover what ſort of money was underſtood. I imagine the Spaniard left that undetermined, to have opportunity of prolonging the negociation as much as he pleaſed, and of finally breaking it when he thought proper.

Ruſhworth. p. 8.

The Spaniard's aim in the match-affair.

When the King of Spain's proceedings with reſpect to this marriage are conſidered, it muſt be believed he deſigned not to conclude it, either at the time the negociation commenced, or long after (2). At firſt, his ſole aim was to amuſe King James, and prevent his interpoſing in the Cleves affair. The Emperor was diſpoſed either to keep that duchy for himſelf, or to give it to ſome Prince of his family, under color of holding it in ſequeſtration 'till the diſpute was decided; but the ſtates of the United Provinces, avoiding this ſnare, ſeized part of the country in queſtion, proteſting to reſtore it to the perſon to whom it ſhould be adjudged: moreover, they openly protected the elector of Brandenburg, who was one of the chief claimants, and a Proteſtant; as on the contrary, the houſe of Auſtria favored the duke of Newburg, who was turned Papiſt. On this pretenſe, Prince Maurice

(1) Weldon obſerves, that he was executed without all precedent, without any juſt cauſe, and even againſt King James's will; who in many things was over-awed by his timorous diſpoſition. But the Spaniſh faction, and Spaniſh gold betrayed his life, as they had done the kingdom before; and it was one of Gondomar's greateſt maſter-pieces to purchaſe Ralegh's head; yet, had not the earl of Briſtol, who was poſſeſſed of Sherborn caſtle, formerly ſir Walter's, co-operated, the King would never have conſented, p. 28, 29.

on the one ſide, and Spinola on the other, indeavored to become maſters of that duchy, and ſo inſued a ſort of religious war wherein England's not interpoſing was of great conſequence to the houſe of Auſtria. On this account it was that James was allured by the Spaniard with hopes of this marriage and a dowry of two millions.

Convention for the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta. Ruſhworth. Annals.

Pretexts were not wanting to prolong the negociation. The union of a Catholic Princeſs with a Proteſtant Prince required that care ſhould be taken to ſecure to the Infanta a liberty of profeſſing her religion, with the decorum ſuiting a daughter of Spain. This was the ſole article originally inſiſted on; the two courts being of opinion that, before this was ſettled, it was in vain to bring others on the carpet. As it was the Spaniard's intereſt to prolong this negociation, ſo it was neceſſary to ſatisfy King James of his ſincerity, to hold him ſtill in play. In order thereto, after a two years debate, fearing that James would be at laſt diſcouraged, he agreed with Digby and Cottington, the Engliſh embaſſadors, upon five articles, the firſt whereof facilitated the continuance or even the intire interruption of the treaty, when it ſhould be no longer his intereſt to diſſemble. The articles were as follow, viz.

Ruſhworth, p. 4. Annals, p. 36.

1. That the Pope's diſpenſation be firſt obtained by the mere act of the King of Spain.

2. That the children of this marriage be not conſtrained in matter of religion, nor their title prejudiced in caſe any prove Catholics.

3. The Infanta's family, being ſtrangers, may be Catholics, and ſhall have a decent place appointed for all divine ſervice, according to the uſe of the church of Rome; and the eccleſiaſtics and religious perſons may wear their proper habits.

4. That the marriage ſhall be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the inſtructions of the council of Trent; and after the Infanta's arrival in England, ſuch a ſolemniſation ſhall be uſed as may make the marriage valid, according to the laws of this kingdom.

5. That ſhe ſhall have a competent number of chaplains, and a confeſſor, being ſtrangers, one whereof ſhall have power to govern the family in religious matters.

James ſigns the articles.

Theſe articles being tranſmited to England, King James, in allowing and ſigning them, thus expreſſed himſelf: "Seeing this marriage is to be "with a lady of a different religion from us, it "becometh us to be tender, as on the one part, "to give them all ſatisfaction convenient, ſo on "the other, to admit nothing may blemiſh our "conſcience, or detract from the religion here "eſtabliſhed." I confeſs myſelf unable to comprehend, how this maxim agreed with the ſecond article. For the firſt, he ſuppoſed as previous, the Pope's diſpenſation, which was diverſe years expected and at length came, but abounding with additions and limitations, which we ſhall have occaſion to mention elſewhere.

King Philip's reaſons for protracting the negociation.

The Spaniard, in procraſtinating this negociation had hitherto in view only the Cleves ſucceſſion: but the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began this year to give room for apprehenſion that a religious war would be kindled in thoſe countries. This was a freſh reaſon for the Spaniard's amuſing King James, leſt he ſhould ſide with the Proteſtants, and ſend them powerful aſſiſtance. For the better comprehending what is to inſue, it will be abſolutely requiſite we examine the then ſituation of affairs in Germany and Bohemia.

Affairs of Germany. Ruſhworth. p. 4, &c. Annals, p. 38.

As for Germany, it ſuffices briefly to ſay, that for ſome time there had been ſtrong jealouſies and mutual diffidence between the Catholics and Proteſtants. Theſe latter complained; that they could not have juſtice either from the Emperor or the Imperial chamber. The Catholics complained in their turn; that the Proteſtants were inceſſantly ſtriving to extend their privileges beyond what the laws of the Empire allowed: that after pretending to be ſatisfied with a bare toleration, they had aſpired to an equality, and, not content with that, had ploted to baniſh the Catholic religion from all Germany. On this pretenſe it was the Catholics had entered into a confederacy, which occaſioned the like among the Proteſtants. Theſe being aſſembled at Hailbrun, the Emperor Matthias wrote to exhort them to diſſolve their league: but they thought not proper to ſubmit to his exhortations, by reaſon their league was only defenſive, and the Catholics offered not to break their confederacy. This was a motive for the Spaniard to amuſe King James, and prevent his uniting with the German Proteſtants. But the combuſtions which this year brake out, in Bohemia, furniſhed him with a motive of far greater conſequence, which I muſt explain here as ſuccinctly as poſſible, becauſe this affair continually influences the whole reſidue of this reign.

Affairs of Bohemia.

In Bohemia were legally authoriſed two religions; the one was ſtiled "ſub unâ," and the other "ſub utrâque." The former was profeſſed by Papiſts, who communicated in one kind only; the latter by the Huſſites, who received the euchariſt in both kinds, and ſince the Reformation, were become real Proteſtants. I have elſewhere mentioned the religious wars which afflicted that kingdom under the Emperor Sigiſmund: wherefore it here ſuffices to add, that this Emperor was forced, in order to be owned for King of Bohemia, to grant the Huſſites a certain edict, whereby, among other privileges, it was decreed, that none could be either a magiſtrate or citizen of Prague who was not of their religion. This edict, granted in the year 1435 was ſtrictly obſerved 'till 1570, when, by order of Maximilian II, a Papiſt was made citizen of Prague. Another of the ſame creed obtained a like favor in 1599, and withal, a place in the magiſtracy. Thenceforwards Sigiſmund's edict was very frequently violated, and finally Jeſuits were admited into Prague, and there erected a ſtately college. Thus, by degrees the number of Papiſts was conſiderably augmented in that city, by means of its governors and others the Emperor's officers, who were all of that perſuaſion. The more they increaſed, the higher they carried their pretenſions, and at length, if we may credit that apology which the Bohemians publiſhed afterwards, Sigiſmund's edict was never in the leaſt regarded. However, in the reign of Rodolphus II, the Proteſtants, by interceſſion of Prince Matthias, obtained of the Emperor a ſecond edict which, under color of confirming their privileges, put them on a ſort of equality with the Catholics, tho' they had injoyed the ſuperiority for a hundred and fifty years: yet this equality was as much as they could expect, conſidering the preſent juncture. But, tho' it was far ſhort of their ancient privileges, the Emperor's officers in Bohemia, deeming the ſaid edict prejudicial to the Catholic religion, refuſed to publiſh it, affirming it was extorted from his Imperial Majeſty while at war with the Turk. Very ſeemingly, they were privately countenanced by the court of Vienna.

Apology of the Bohemian ſtates. Hiſt. of the Reb. of Boh.

Rodolphus II, dying in 1612*, his brother Matthias ſucceeded him, both in the kingdom of Bohemia, and the Imperial dignity. Under this new King, the Proteſtants immunities were violated much more openly, and with greater haughtineſs than under his predeceſſor, if any credit may be given to their apology. But this was not all: Matthias, having adopted his kinſman, Ferdinand of Auſtria, was inclined to ſecure him likewiſe the crown of Bohemia. The execution of this project would would doubtleſs have been very difficult, had not Matthias uſed artifice. Sileſia, Moravia, Upper and Lower Luſatia, being annexed to Bohemia, had a right to ſend deputies to the aſſembly of the ſtates of that kingdom. But as theſe countries were Proteſtant, their deputies very probably would join with thoſe of Bohemia, of the ſame religion, and fruſtrate the Emperor's deſign: wherefore he convened the ſtates of Bohemia without ſummoning the others. The Proteſtants complained of this innovation, and not to authoriſe it, moſt of them refuſed ſending repreſentatives to the ſtates. This was what Matthias foreſaw and wiſhed: for the Popiſh deputies being the majority, Ferdinand was declared Matthias's preſumptive ſucceſſor, and not long after crowned at Prague; after which he reſided at Gratz. The defenders (ſo were termed a certain number of eminent perſons choſen and appointed by the ſtates to take care edicts were put in execution) perceiving the Imperial court's drift, ſummoned the ſtates purſuant to their power, and forgot not to cite the incorporated provinces. This aſſembly only drew a petition to be preſented to his Imperial Majeſty, wherein the ſtates demanded execution of the national ſtatutes, and a juſt reparation for the injuries done them. Mean while, as they could come to no reſolution before the Emperor's anſwer was received, they adjourned to the Monday after Rogation-week, in the year 1618.

His oppoſition ſerved only to exaſperate the ſtates, who were aſſembled on the day appointed in the college of Charles IV; they went in a body to the Chancery, and ſeizing the Emperor's officers, pitched upon three, and threw them out of the caſtle-window. This done, they drove the Jeſuits from Prague.

Matters being come to theſe extremities, the ſtates publiſhed an apology, to acquaint the public why they had puniſhed theſe officers: but as they preſumed the Emperor would not liſten to their reaſons, they ſigned a confederacy, promiſing mutual aſſiſtance againſt all oppoſers. Mean while, underſtanding Matthias was making preparations to attack them, they choſe twenty-four protectors, impowering them to raiſe forces, and lay upon the kingdom and the incorporated countries what taxes they ſhould judge neceſſary. Thus a war being unavoidable, every one took ſuch meaſures as he deemed requiſite, whether to attack or defend.

James amuſed by the Spaniſh court. Wilſon.

While the Bohemian ſtates were taking theſe reſolutions, the Infante cardinal was, in the Netherlands, preparing a force to aſſiſt the Emperor. As this army was levying, he ſent Charles de Bucquoy count de Longueval, to Matthias, who nominated him general of the army deſigned againſt Bohemia. The ſtates choſe for their generals counts Erneſt of Mansfeldt and De la Tour. This war was of ſuch importance to the houſe of Auſtria, that it is not to be wondered the Spaniard ſhould ſtill perſevere in amuſing King James with hopes of his ſeeing the projected match ſuddenly accompliſhed. According to all appearance, this would at laſt become a religious war, and in that caſe England could greatly ſtrengthen the Proteſtant party. Afterwards, the King of Spain had ſtill farther motives to cuntinue this management: but the greateſt wonder of all is, that notwithſtanding James had very ſtrong reaſons to ſuſpect the Spaniard of artifice and colluſion, he ſtill obſtinately relied on his ſincerity. "It ſeemeth unto us here in England (ſays one of his miniſters in a letter to Cottington) that Conde Gondomar hath gone but very ſlowly in his journey: and diverſe (ſeeing how long time he hath ſpent by the way) do make conjecture, that it proceedeth from the ſmall affection that he judgeth to be there, towards effecting the main buſineſs.-----But if the Spaniards act unſincerely, I ſhall judge them the moſt unworthy and perfidious people of the world, and the more, for that his Majeſty hath given them ſo many teſtimonies of his ſincere intentions towards them, which he daily continueth, as now of late, by the cauſing ſir Walter Ralegh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them ſatisfaction, when by preſerving him, he might have given great ſatisfaction to his ſubjects, and had at command upon all occaſions as uſeful a man as ſerved any Prince in Chriſtendom (1)." It is however certain that James was amuſed by the Spaniſh court. Count Gondomar undertaking to carry into Spain the articles ſigned by his ſaid Majeſty, was ſo very long on the road, that it was manifeſt he ſought only to delay the time. Notwithſtanding this, King James continued wilfully to ſhut his eyes, which will in the ſequel ſtill more evidently appear.

Ruſhworth, p. 9 Annals of James I. p. 39.

Tho' the people of England knew not the contents of thoſe articles agreed on by the two courts, they were however ſenſible the marriage was on the point of being concluded, and thought it could not but be prejudicial to religion. This occaſioned many complaints and murmurs among the Proteſtants, while the Papiſts triumphed, knowing the King of Spain would not give Prince Charles his daughter without procuring them great advantages: at the worſt, they were ſure of having in this Princeſs a powerful protectreſs, who would never forſake the intereſt of her religion. We ſhall find, in the ſubſequent years, how artfully the Spaniard prolonged the negociation, 'till he had drawn from it all poſſible benefit, as well for the houſe of Auſtria, as for the Catholic religion.

Continuation of the Bohemian affairs. Hiſt. Reb. Boh.

Matthias dies and Ferdinand proclaimed King of Bohemia.

The Emperor Matthias dying the twentieth of March 1619, Ferdinand, his couſin and adopted ſon, was proclaimed King of Bohemia, as well in conſequence of his election, as by virtue of his pretended hereditary right to that crown. Mean while, as his main drift was to acquire the Imperial dignity, and as, to effect it, he ſtood in need of the Proteſtant electors, he feigned a diſpoſition to terminate amicably a war commenced in Bohemia, by giving the ſtates a reaſonable ſatisfaction concerning their privileges; but the ſtates were not of opinion they ought to confide in his promiſes: mean while, he labored to gain the electors, and make alliances with the Catholic Princes of Germany. James, who gloried in being ſtiled the Pacific King, did as ſuch deem himſelf obliged, by his mediation, to attempt appeaſing the diſturbances of Bohemia. To this purpoſe, he made choice of viſcount Doncaſter to labor a pacification between Ferdinand and the Bohemians. Not a Prince in Europe was ſo improper as he for a mediation of this nature, conſidering his principles with reſpect to regal power. This embaſſy was extremely expenſive; the embaſſador, who was ſomewhat of a favorite, and exceſſively proſuſe, having been not a little laviſh of his maſter's money. Mean while, I am not ſure whether he could obtain even a ſingle audience of Ferdinand, who ſtill removed as his ſaid excellency approached. Thus much is certain, the embaſſy was intirely fruitleſs, and ſerved only to manifeſt the ſmall account Ferdinand made of the King of England's mediation.

The ſtates oppoſe it.

Ferdinand elected. Ruſhworth, p. 11. Wilſon.

Ferdinand was not only acknowledged for King of Bohemia and elector, but was alſo choſen Emperor, Auguſt, 1619. The ſtates of Bohemia, finding they had not been able to prevent Ferdinand's being elected Emperor, ſolemnly ſwore never to own him for their Sovereign, and withal, on the fifth of September, choſe for their King Frederic, elector Palatine, and ſent deputies to acquaint him with his election, and requeſt his haſting to Prague (1). Frederic wanted not much ſollicitation to accept a crown offered him by thoſe who, in his opinion, had a right to diſpoſe of it. He however diſpatched baron D'Aulné (2) to the King his father-in-law, for his advice; but that was all mere compliment. As he knew him to be a Prince not over and above prompt to ingage in grand undertakings, he ſtayed not for his anſwer, but aſſembling ſome troops went to Prague, where he was crowned, the fourth of November.

The Bohemian ſtates choſe the elector Palatine.

He accepts the crown. Wilſon.

Before Frederic's envoy reached England, James hearing the news of his ſon-in-law's election, called a council to debate, whether the elector ought to accept or refuſe the crown of Bohemia. The archbiſhop of Canterbury not being preſent, by reaſon of the gout which confined him to his bed, wrote to ſecretary Naunton, "That it was his opinion, "the elector ſhould accept the crown, and England "openly ſupport him: and therefore, as ſoon as "there ſhould be certain news of his coronation, "the bells ought to be rung, guns fired, and "bonfires made, to let all Europe ſee the King "was determined to countenance him." But this advice was not followed. King James, in council, maintained Ferdinand's cauſe againſt the ſtates of Bohemia, and without knowing or examining one tittle of their privileges, as he afterwards owned, decided that the Bohemian ſtates were in actual rebellion (3). As for the reaſons wherewith the archbiſhop ſupported his opinion, in his letter to Naunton, James rejected them, as grounded on Puritan principles: for, as I have elſewhere obſerved, there were in this reign State-Puritans as well as Church-Puritans, whom the court took great care to confound one with another, and this confuſion of ideas has been preſerved to this day. Hence is derived the obſcurity which ſtill occurs in the notion of the two factions of Whigs and Tories. It was therefore reſolved, that his Majeſty ſhould admoniſh the elector to refuſe the offered crown, not only becauſe it was agreeable to the King's principles, but for another and no leſs potent reaſon; viz. the King rightly judged that the elector's acceptance could not but be greatly prejudicial to the negociation of the Spaniſh match, conſidering what a ſtrict union was between the Princes of the Auſtrian family.

But the elector Palatine had already broken theſe meaſures by accepting the crown, without expecting the council of England's reſolution. James was hereat ſo irritated, that he refuſed audience to baron D'Aulné, who, ſince his departure, had received orders to excuſe the elector, from the neceſſity he was under of proceeding with all poſſible expedition. Had the ſtates of Bohemia deſigned to gain King James by electing his ſon-in-law, they found themſelves greatly deceived, ſince they never had from him the leaſt aſſiſtance. Even the embaſſadors, ſent by King James on this occaſion to the Emperor and diverſe German Princes, did great injury to the ſtates; for thoſe very agents had expreſs orders to diſavow Frederic's proceedings; and, of all the Proteſtant Potentates, James alone never ſtiled him King.

He is for perſuading him to quit the crown. Ruſhworth, p. 12. Howes.

Mean while, his Catholic Majeſty was not negligent in rendering the Emperor a very ſignal ſervice, by keeping James in his pacific diſpoſition. Nothing was diſcourſed at the court of Madrid, but the king of England's generoſity, juſtice, and equity. In fine, the better to amuſe him, the marriage negociation was renewed, having been interrupted on pretenſe of waiting for the Pope's diſpenſation: nay, it was intimated to Cottington, that in caſe the diſpenſation arrived not very ſpeedily, the match ſhould be concluded without it, or means found to oblige his Sanctity to a compliance. Cottington, well acquainted with the Spaniſh court, fell not into this ſnare. He wrote to England, that nothing more was to be expected concerning the marriage; that the King of Spain's intent was only to amuſe his Majeſty, and therefore he believed, the negociation ought to be broke off: but, inſtead of ſeeing his advice followed, he received orders he ſhould declare to the Catholic Monarch, that his maſter was not concerned in the Bohemian crown's being accepted by the Palatine: that his Britannic Majeſty's ſaid ſon-in-law had proceeded without his approbation, or even knowledge, and therefore he utterly diſowned him. Philip anſwered, he was glad to find the King, his brother, in ſo juſt and generous a diſpoſition, and that nothing could ſooner gain his eſteem and affection than the continuance of this expreſs diſowning a preſumption ſo repugnant to equity.

An' 1620. James deſires to be umpire between Ferdinand and Frederic, but cannot ſucceed. Sarmiento.

The affair of Bohemia put in motion diverſe of the European Potentates, and held the reſt in ſuſpenſe. Ferdinand and Frederic had each their friends and allies, who were preparing to aſſiſt them, while James ſtood neuter, imagining that, by making a ſhew of neutrality, he ſhould induce the two competitors to make him arbiter of their difference: but both were jealous of him; the one becauſe he was a Proteſtant, and his rival's father-in-law, the other, becauſe he had openly declared he diſapproved his conduct: ſo, without much regarding his ſollicitations, both parties prepared to decide the quarrel by arms.

Ferdinand greatly imbaraſſed. Wilſon. Annals. Ruſhworth,

Had England eſpouſed Frederic's cauſe, and with a powerful navy held in awe Spain and the Netherlands, very ſeemingly the Elector would have preſerved his crown, in ſo good a ſituation were his affairs at the begining of 1620. Sundry Princes of Germany had formed a league to ſupport him, and were already levying forces, to be commanded by the Prince of Anſpach (1). On the other hand, Bethlem Gahor, Waywood of Tranſilvania, had excited the Hungarians to rebel againſt Ferdinand, and moſt part of Auſtria had followed the example of Hungary and Bohemia. All this confounded the Emperor, and would have given him yet farther imbaraſs, had the Elector of Saxony ſtill remained neuter, anſwerably to his firſt reſolution; but Ferdinand offering him Upper Luſatia, on condition he would conquer it, he could not withſtand the temptation of acquiring a country which lay ſo convenient for him. Moreover, the duke of Bavaria, and the three eccleſiaſtical electors (2), declared for the Emperor; his Holineſs ſupplied him with money, and the Catholic King ordered his forces at Naples and in the Milaneſe to march to his aſſiſtance.

But this was not all the aid given Ferdinand by the Spaniard. He aided him ſtill more conſiderably, in preventing King James's aſſiſting his daughter and ſon-in-law, and keeping him immoveable, and, as it were, inchanted with hopes of the marriage and dowry of two millions. To hold him the faſter in his chains, Philip ſent back count Gondomar, under color of finiſhing the affair (3). He diſſembled ſo artfully that James, who had recalled Digby from Spain, ſent thither ſir Walter Aſton, to indeavor, with Cottington, to finiſh the treaty, which he judged very near a concluſion. Gondomar being returned to England with large ſums of money, he imployed it ſo to the purpoſe, and made ſuch good uſe of his talents and knowledge of the court, that he became in a manner maſter of the King, the favorite and the miniſters, and managed them juſt as he pleaſed.

Philip orders forces to be raiſed in the Netherlands to invade the Palatinate. Wilſon. p. 725. Ruſhworth, p. 14. Cabala.

To this ſuccor, far from being inconſiderable, Philip was preparing to add another more effectual, to inable the Emperor to get the advantage of his adverſary. Frederic had drawn from the Palatinate ten thouſand men, and ſent them into Bohemia. This inſpired Ferdinand with thoughts of invading him on that ſide, and to execute this project Philip and the archduke Albert levied twenty ſix thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, in the Netherlands, to be commanded by Ambroſio Spinola. The truce between Spain and the United Provinces not being yet near expired, t was evident theſe forces could be deſigned only againſt the Palatinate. Of this the Hollanders gave King James notice, and ſuch of the courtiers as were not corrupted by Spaniſh gold never ceaſed repreſenting to him the danger to which the elector's dominions would be expoſed, if he did not ſuddenly reſolve to prepare for their defenſe: but James could not prevail on himſelf to take ſuch meaſures on bare ſuſpicions. He was ſatisfied with ordering ſir Thomas Edmunds, his embaſſador at Bruſſels, to aſk the archduke his reaſons for ſuch a conſiderable armament. The archduke replied; it was by order of his Catholic Majeſty, and the reaſon might be known from Spinola, who commanded the army. Spinola, being aſked the ſame queſtion, anſwered; That indeed he was ordered by the King of Spain to raiſe forces, but knew not the intent: that his orders being ſealed, he could not open them 'till his march, and if the embaſſador would follow him, he might then be reſolved. People muſt have been wilfully blind, not to perceive the drift of this myſtery; and yet James ſtill continned immoveable, relying on the Spaniards friendſhip, and Gondomar's fair promiſes.

He is prevailed on to ſuffer a few troops to ſet out for the Palatinate. Wilſon. p. 722. Ruſhworth, p. 15.

All England was extremely ſurpriſed at the King's inſenſibility for his ſon-in-law, his daughter, and their children; but he, for his part, looked on the quarrel between the Emperor and Frederic in a quite different light. He was at the very point of being ſtrictly united to the houſe of Auſtria, by his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta, and at this very criſis his ſon-in-law, the elector, had broken all his meaſures by a raſh, unjuſt, and inconſiderate action: for ſo he termed his accepting the crown of Bohemia. "Is it reaſonable (ſaid he) I ſhould "ſuffer myſelf to be drawn by a ſon-in-law's ambition and humor into a war againſt the houſe "of Auſtria, who have done me no wrong? Muſt "I alter my projects, all my meaſures, becauſe the "elector Palatine has been pleaſed to accept the "crown of Bohemia, without ſo much as aſking "my advice?" However, by much perſuaſion, he was finally prevailed on to ſuffer a regiment of two thouſand two hundred men to be raiſed, which was done moſtly at the charge of ſome noblemen. Sir Horatio Vere, who had long ſerved in Holland, where he had acquired great reputation, commanded this regiment, having under him Burroughs and Herbert for major-generals. The earls of Oxford and Eſſex accompanied him, and commanded each a company of gentlemen volunteers.

Thoſe ſuccors are commanded by ſir Horatio Vere.

This regiment being raiſed with extraordinary promptneſs, was tranſported to Holland. Then they paſſed the Rhine below Wezel, to avoid Spinola, who was at Aix la Chapelle. It was not without danger the Engliſh traverſed ſo many countries to reach the Palatinate: nay, they durſt not have attempted it, had not Prince Frederic Henry of Naſſau, with two thouſand horſe and ſome foot, conducted them to Francfort, and deceived the vigilance of Spinola, who expected them on another road. It was the firſt of October before they joined the army of the King of Bohemia's allies, commanded by Anſpach.

They join the confederates army. Auguſt 31. Wilſon, p. 722. Annals.

Spinola, who departed from Bruſſels the eighth of Auguſt, being come to Coblentz, opened his orders in preſenſe of the Engliſh embaſſador, who had accompanied him thus far. The orders were, to make war upon whoſoever ſhould declare for the elector Palatine. This was all Edmonds could learn of Spinola's deſigns. The reſt was eaſy to be gueſſed, conſidering which way he was marching. He arrived in the Palatinate before the Engliſh had joined the confederate army, and took diverſe ſmall places. The two armies tried each other for ſome time, and were once actually in ſight ready to ingage, but no action of moment inſued. The ſeaſon, which daily grew more rigid, finally obliging them to retire into winter quarters, the confederate Princes led home their troops, leaving the Engliſh in gariſon at Heidelbergh, Manheim, and Frankendal.

Campain of the Palatine. Wilſon. Annals.

In April this year, the King of France ſent to his Imperial Majeſty, and ſundry German Princes, the duke of Angoulême, the duke of Bethune, and M. Des Preaux, to attempt appeaſing the Bohemian and Hungarian diſturbances. At the ſame time, James diſpatched ſir Henry Wotton *, on the ſame errand, and to exhort to peace all the powers ingaged in the quarrel between Ferdinand and the Palſgrave. If, while he ſent this embaſſador, he had armed by land and ſea, and put himſelf in a condition to ſtrike terror, his remonſtrances would doubtleſs have been liſtened to, and his mediation perhaps accepted. But Wotton, having traverſed moſt part of Germany, and diſcourſed ſeveral Princes of both parties, brought back only general expreſſions, which ſhewed how little the King his maſter was regarded. He finally arrived at Vienna, where he found the French embaſſadors. In the audience he had of his Imperial Majeſty, he made two propoſitions, each divided into three articles, according to the uſual cuſtom of King James, who was mighty fond of diviſions and ſubdiviſions. It muſt be obſerved, that Ferdinand had now publiſhed againſt the elector Palatine a ban (1), wherein he had fully ſet forth the reaſons moving him to come to ſuch extremities: that Spinola was marching to the Palatinate: that the duke of Bavaria was conducting his troops towards Bohemia to join the Imperial army (2), and the elector of Saxony advancing to invade Luſatia. Then it was Wotton made his two propoſitions to the Emperor.

Embaſſy to Germany from France. Annals.

* Not ſir Edward as in the French.

Succeſs of that embaſſy. Annals, p. 43.

Hiſt. Reb. Boh.

The firſt general propoſition was, that his Imperial Majeſty might confide in the King of Great-Britain, as appeared from the three following reaſons.

1. The King was never concerned in the elector's accepting the crown of Bohemia.

2. The elector Palatine did not impart to him the buſineſs before his election, and he had diſapproved it: this was evident from the King's never ſuffering him to be ſtiled King of Bohemia, or to be prayed for as ſuch in the churches.

3. His Majeſty never aſſiſted the elector with men or money.

The ſecond propoſition was concerning the means of procuring a peace, and contained theſe three articles.

1. He deſired the Emperor to let him know, whether he was come to treat of an accommodation by his maſter's and the French King's mediation: adding, if his Imperial Majeſty expected the affairs of Bohemia ſhould be reſtored to their former ſtate, he conceived that his ſtay at Vienna, and the King his maſter's mediation would be fruitleſs.

2. He prayed the Emperor to inform him of the ſtate of affairs in Bohemia.

3. And that he would be pleaſed to grant a ceſſation of arms, and let the roads be open between Vienna and Prague during the negociation.

Ferdinand, ſurpriſed to hear ſuch propoſitions in the preſent ſtate of affairs, told the embaſſador, he did not fully underſtand his diſcourſe, and deſired a clearer and more ſubſtantial memorial, that he might be able to give him a ſuitable anſwer. Whether Wotton could not explain his maſter's meaning with regard to the firſt article of the ſecond propoſition, or for ſome other reaſon unknown, the required memorial was never given in; whereat the Emperor was greatly diſpleaſed. Thus ended this embaſſy.

The elector of Saxony, the duke of Bavaria, and marquiſs Spinola, commiſſioned to execute the Imperial ban, began all three to act in September. I have already intimated what was done by Spinola in the Palatinate, during this firſt campain. The elector of Saxony, at the head of twenty thouſand men, entered Luſatia, and by the end of October conquered the whole country, which he kept for himſelf, according to his ſtipulation with Ferdinand.

The duke of Saxony conquers Luſatia. Annals, p. 42. Ruſhworth, p. 15.

While the elector of Saxony was in Luſatia, the duke of Bavaria having ſubdued Upper Auſtria, the begining of September, joined count Bocquoy, who commanded the Imperial army in Bohemia. As Frederic had all his forces there, the Emperor's two generals were obliged to take ſome places before they could advance to Prague. At length, having opened a paſſage, they came, early in November, within ſight of that metropolis, and of the enemy's army, poſted between them and the city. A few days after (3) was fought the famous battle of Prague, wherein Frederic's army was intirely routed. This Prince, who ſtayed at Prague during the battle, haſtily retired with his wife and children, leaving all his baggage and money in the city, which on the morrow opened her gates to the Imperialiſts and Bavarians. Weſton and Conway, the Engliſh embaſſadors, followed him in his flight: but, finding he deſigned to withdraw into Holland, they obtained a paſs to return to Prague, where they remained not long, their ſtay being utterly needleſs.

James I. An' 1620.

The victory lately gained by Ferdinand's arms produced great effects; the firſt whereof was, that the Palſgrave was forſaken by moſt of the Princes his confederates: even the Prince of Anhalt, who commanded his army, entered into the Emperor's ſervice. Count Mansfeldt alone remained faithful, and was ſtill ſerviceable to him (1).

He is deſerted by his allies. Wilſon. p. 725. Annals.

This ſame year, the Hugonots of France being vigorouſly puſhed by Lewis XIII, James ſent ſir Edward Herbert (2) to ſollicit him in their behalf: nay, he had orders to uſe menaces, in caſe the court of France refuſed to regard his remonſtrances. This envoy diſcharged his commiſſion ſo rudely, that conſtable Luynes being offended at it, cauſed him to be recalled. Herbert would have afterwards challenged the conſtable for miſrepreſenting his words; but this King James would not ſuffer. Viſcount Doncaſter, lately created earl of Carliſle, was ſent to France in Herbert's room. He expended vaſt ſums without effecting any thing for the Hugonots. This is not ſurpriſing, ſince the French court knew King James was neither able nor willing to aſſiſt them.

The Palatinate campain was no ſooner ended, than the earl of Eſſex poſted away, to repreſent to his Majeſty the impoſſibility of ſaving that country, without a ſpeedy and powerful ſuccor (3). But it was not by way of arms that James deſigned to ſupport his ſon-in-law's intereſt. Count Gondomar ruled him as he pleaſed, by feeding him with continual hopes of the marriage's good ſucceſs, provided he would not diſturb the negociation by proceedings offenſive to the Catholic Monarch: nay, he told him that, ſhould the Emperor become maſter of the Palatinate, it would only be a ſurer means to terminate the war, becauſe then it would be given to the Infanta for a preſent to her princely conſort, who might reſtore it to his brother-in-law the Palatine. With James all this paſſed current. He was ſo poſſeſſed with the project of ending the war by means of this match, that nothing could change his ſentiment. Count Gondomar had with preſents and penſions corrupted all thoſe who had the King's ear, and who took care to keep him in this vain belief (4). The reſt of the world were aſtoniſhed to ſee this Prince taking ſuch wrong meaſures: but none durſt preſs him upon that head, all knowing he liked not that any, except his miniſters, ſhould ſpeak to him of ſtate-affairs. He was ſtrongly perſuaded there was no other way to ſave the Palatinate, than to preſerve a good underſtanding with the King of Spain and the Emperor, by ſtanding neuter. This he himſelf declared to the council, adding however, that if his inſtances were rejected he would at laſt have recourſe to arms: not that he had the leaſt deſign of breaking with the houſe of Auſtria, happen what would, but hoped this would be a good pretenſe to get money, which he greatly wanted. To this end likewiſe it was debated in council, how to make preparations for defenſe of the Palatinate, in caſe his Majeſty's mediation was rejected. Gondomar having notice of what had paſſed at the board, wrote to the marquis of Buckingham, deſiring to know what was the King's intention. The following is the favorite's anſwer, which manifeſtly diſcovers King James's ſentiments on this affair.

SIR,

James I. An' 1620.

Buckingham's letter to Gondomar. Du Cheſne, p. 1145. Hiſt. Reb. Boh. Part V. p. 712.

"I Shewed your Letter to the King, who thinks your requeſt reaſonable. He has ordered me to tell you, that the ſpeech he lately made to the council contained two principal points: Firſt, whereas the world talked ſo variouſly of him, he declared, he was ſo far from adviſing the elector Palatine to accept the crown of Bohemia, that he uſed his utmoſt indeavors to diſſuade him from it. For the particulars of what he ſaid about this ſubject, he refers to lord Digby who, being preſent, can inform your excellency. His Majeſty declared moreover, he was reſolved to continue neuter for three reaſons. Firſt, becauſe his conſcience obliged him to it. Secondly, becauſe his honor was concerned. Thirdly, not to give ill example. Upon the firſt reaſon he ſaid, he was ſure the religion he profeſſed did not allow that crowns ſhould be removed from one head to another on account of religion: that our church very juſtly oppoſed the principle of the Jeſuits, who take upon them to inthrone and dethrone Kings according to their fancy: that our religion injoins us to obey our Princes and Sovereigns, tho' they ſhould be Turks or Infidels: that the world was inclined to turn this to a religious war, to which his Majeſty is intirely averſe. As to the point of honor, the King ſaid that, being ſollicited by the King of Spain to uſe all his intereſt to procure a peace between the Emperor and the Bohemian ſtates, and this accident, of accepting the crown of Bohemia, happening while his embaſſador was in Germany mediating accommodation, he was obliged to make known his innocence, in order to ſave his honor: that if now he aſſiſted his ſon-in-law in this affair, his actions would be directly contrary to his proteſtation, which would be very diſhonorable. Upon the third reaſon, his Majeſty declared, It was a very dangerous precedent againſt all Chriſtian Princes, to allow of the tranſlation of a crown by the peoples authority: that, tho' he was King by hereditary right, yet it could not be ſufficiently conſidered how far this miſchief might reach, if once it took root, and that this example might very ſenſibly affect the King of Denmark, his brother-in-law, whoſe crown was elective: that as for thoſe privileges the Bohemians might have, in this caſe, by the ancient and fundamental laws of the kingdom, it would be neceſſary to turn over many volumes, read abundance of hiſtories, and carefully examine what their rights are, before this point could be determined, with which he has nothing to do, not being made judge of the diſpute. The ſecond thing, concerning which the King declared himſelf, was the affair of the Palatinate. Upon this point he firſt informed his council, that he had omited nothing, as well by means of his embaſſadors, as by his own mouth, in ſpeaking to your excellency: that moreover, he had ſent an embaſſador to the German Princes, who were concerned in the affair, to remonſtrate to them, that ſince he had with ſo much ſincerity and candor continued neuter, he had great reaſon, on the other hand, to repreſent to

" After the King had thus ſpoken, it was de" bated in council, concerning the means of de" fending the Palatinate, as lord Digby could have " informed your excellency. To conclude this " letter, his Majeſty commands me to aſſure you,

James demands a benevolence for defenſe of the Palatinate. Annals, p. 45. Ruſhworth, p. 16.

King James's whole conduct, whether at the time this letter was written, or afterwards, agrees ſo punctually with the ſentiments therein expreſſed, that it would be loſs of time to diſpute its being genuine. It is certain, James never deſigned to defend the Palatinate by arms, while he had any hope of accompliſhing the Prince his ſon's marriage with the Infanta. He nevertheleſs uſed this pretext to draw money from his ſubjects, and to ſend a letter, ſigned by the council to all the nobility, and to the lord mayor of London, for a benevolence: but ſeemingly this method was unſucceſsful, ſo much were the people diſſatisfied with the government. At the very inſtant he ſeemed deſirous to defend the Palatinate, invaded by the Spaniards, count Gondomar, properly ſpeaking, governed England by his influence over the King. All who had any expectations from the court were extremely careful no way to offend him, as being ſenſible how much it was in his power to prejudice thoſe he diſliked. Secretary Naunton, on ſome occaſion, neglecting ſo neceſſary a piece of politics, loſt his imploy, which was given to Conway.

Buckingham's mother in great power Wilſon, p. 727.

On the other hand, the marquis of Buckingham ruled in the King's name, without induring the leaſt contradiction. All offices were abſolutely diſpoſed of by him, or indeed rather by his mother, ſince he could not deny her any thing. As ſhe was extremely greedy of money, and a moſt zealous bigot to Popery, none were advanced but ſuch as could make large preſents to the favorite's mother, and were well inclined to Rome, or at leaſt indifferent as to religion: nay, places were frequently taken from thoſe who had paid dear for them, in order to diſpoſe of them to new purchaſers. Montague, having given twenty thouſand pounds for the office of lord-treaſurer, was removed before the year expired, and ſir Lionel Cranfield put in his place, and created ſoon after earl of Middleſex. Cranfield had been a London merchant, and had afterwards a poſt in the cuſtom-houſe, whence he was introduced at court as a projector; a name given to ſuch as ſuggeſted to the miniſters expedients for repleniſhing his Majeſty's coffers when there was no parliament.

The marquis of Buckingham, towards this year's cloſe, married the earl of Rutland's only daughter, the wealthieſt heireſs in England. Some affirm his having firſt debauched her, and that Rutland let him know that, in caſe he made her not his wife, the King's favor ſhould not ſcreen him from his vengeance. Buckingham readily complied, it being a match ſo very advantageous: but as the young lady was by her mother educated a Papiſt, ſhe muſt, for form-ſake, be inſtructed by doctor White, who, as is pretended, made her a good Proteſtant. However, ſhe was by her mother-in-law brought into the old way again.

Buckingham's marriage. Wilſon, p. 728.

The Reformation affairs in Germany and France were in a wretched ſituation. On the other hand, the King of Bohemia being expulſed his kingdom, found himſelf at the point of loſing alſo the Palatinate. There was a general murmur at beholding King James's exceſſive indolence with reſpect to theſe two affairs, wherein he was ſo particularly concerned, as a father, as a King of England, and as a Proteſtant. Theſe murmurs finally produced a parliament: not that the court's intent was to ſatisfy the people; but it was judged, ſince they were ſo deſirous of having proper meaſures taken for defenſe of religion and the Palatinate, the houſe of commons would be ready to grant his Majeſty ſubſidies anſwerable to a deſign of ſuch importance. A parliament was therefore ſummoned to meet on the twentieth of January 1621. But the better to make people believe his Majeſty was really determined on a war, the council, a few days before the parliament met, nominated a certain number of grandees and officers of moſt note, who had orders to aſſemble and give their opinion concerning means of carrying on the war vigorouſly. Mean while, as the people talked of the King's and his miniſtry's conduct with too great freedom, they were forbid by proclamation to diſcourſe of ſtate-affairs. But this inhibition produced a quite contrary effect, it being ſcarcely poſſible by thoſe methods to bridle mens tongues.

James doubtleſs wiſhed to preſerve the Palatinate for his ſon-in-law: all he could be blamed for was, his taking a wrong courſe to effect it. Amuſed, or as it were bewitched by Gondomar's charm, he believed Prince Charles's marriage with the Infanta was the propereſt means, not perceiving that this match was only a decoy to divert him, and prevent his taking more ſuitable meaſures. It will certainly be thought ſtrange, that James ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be thus guided by a Spaniſh embaſſador in what ſo nearly concerned the houſe of Auſtria; but it will be the leſs aſtoniſhing if his then ſituation be conſidered. Firſt, he was extremely averſe to war, and tho' he would have made believe it was thro' reaſon and choice, it is however certain, this averſion was ſo natural, that it was in a manner impoſſible for him to overcome it. Secondly, his imbibed ſentiments concerning the the extent of regal power, inſpired him with a dread of every occaſion which might bring his prerogative into diſpute. If he ingaged in a war, he muſt call a parliament, and parliaments had already convinced him they agreed not with him in opinion touching the extent of the royal prerogative, of which he was ſo jealous. It is therefore no wonder that, of the two ways which offered to preſerve the Palatinate, viz. war and Prince Charles's marriage, he ſhould chuſe that which beſt ſuited his humor and diſpoſition. What much more deſerves wonder is that, in comparing theſe two ways, he ſhould be ſo blind as to think the marriage eaſieſt and moſt proper, and would not ſee it was only a ſnare to deceive him. On the other hand, he was not ſatisfied with reſolving to take this method rather than the other, but even affected to intimate to the houſe of Auſtria, that he ſhould not, 'till the laſt extremity, think of having recourſe to arms, and thereby marred all his affairs. The Emperor and King of Spain knew how to improve theſe wrong proceedings. Gondomar having eaſily diſcovered the King's ſcheme, failed not to incourage him to purſue it ſteadily, by feeding him with hope of ſucceſs. There was another and very ſtrong reaſon for Gondomar's keeping King James in this ſituation. The truce between Spain and Holland being near its period, if James ſhould reſolve to ſupport his ſon-in-law by arms, he would be able to make ſuch a diverſion in the Netherlands as would render the Palatinate's conqueſt dear to the houſe of Auſtria. For this reaſon chiefly the courts of Vienna and Madrid flattered him with the hope of obtaining an honorable peace for the Prince Palatine. But theſe were only words, which the too credulous James ſwallowed for realities.

Tho' the King deſigned nothing leſs than to declare war with Spain, he was however very glad that the people were inclined to ſupport by arms the elector's intereſt. He hoped the parliament would grant him large ſums to inable him to make himſelf feared, and then he fancied, it would be eaſy for him to determine his ſon-in-law's affairs, without drawing ſword, and conſequently without imploying the money which ſhould be given him by parliament. Herein his view was to imitate his great-grandfather Henry VII, who often uſed this expedient to cram his coffers: but he ſhould likewiſe have imitated that Prince's addreſs in concealing his deſigns, whereas on the contrary James's intentions were known univerſally.

Parliament meets. Jan. 30. 1621.

The parliament being aſſembled, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, which he divided into three heads. In the firſt, he told them what a parliament was, under color of reminding them of a point ſo neceſſary and fundamental. The ſecond contained the reaſons of their meeting. In the third, he ſpake of thoſe grievances which the people thought they had cauſe to complain of, and indeavored to juſtify his conduct. As this ſpeech is very prolix, I ſhall only cite ſuch paſſages as may ſerve as well to diſcover James's principles as his deſigns. He begins thus:

My Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and You the Commons.

The King's ſpeech. Annals of James I. p. 47. Ruſhworth, p. 21. Nalſon's Introduction.

" IN multiloquio non deeſt peccatum, ſaith the " wiſeſt man ever was; and this experience I " have found in mine own perſon, for it is true " there have been many ſeſſions of parliament " before this, wherein I have made many diſcourſes " to the gentlemen of the lower houſe, and in " them delivered a true mirror of my heart; but " as no man's actions are free from cenſure, in " regard of the excellency of perfection, ſo perhaps it pleaſed God, ſeeing ſome vanity in me, " to ſend back my words as wine ſpit into my own " face, ſo as I may truly ſay, 'I have piped unto " you, and you have not danced; I have mourned, " and you have not lamented.'

James I. An' 1621.

Concerning the conſtitution of a parliament.

" What is a parliament? It is an aſſembly " compoſed of a head and a body; the Monarch " is the head, and the three eſtates (1) the body, " which are called, in a monarchy, a parliament, " which was uſed and created by Monarchs; for " Kings were before parliaments, who as ſoon as " they had ſettled a form of government, and " were willing that the people ſhould be governed " by laws, called their parliaments, &c.-----Only " this I would have you to obſerve, that it is a " vain thing for a parliament to preſs to be popular; there is in no ſtate a parliament without " a monarchy.-----This I put you in mind of, " that you ſerve under a monarchy, and that we " muſt ſtand and fall with it: now conſider, firſt, " who called you? Your King. Secondly, whom " he calls? The peers, who in reſpect of the " eminency of their places and highneſs have an " intereſt therein by birth and inheritance, becauſe " they are to aſſiſt the King in his greateſt affairs. " In the next, the church, the clergy, not all, " but the principal heads thereof, the biſhops.----- " The knights ſtand for the ſhires, and the other " gentlemen for the boroughs: of theſe is the " whole body compact.

" Thirdly, why ye are called? To give the King " your advice in ſuch errands as he ſhall aſk of " you, or you ſhall think fit to aſk his advice " in.

" The King makes laws, and ye are to adviſe " him to make ſuch as will be beſt for the common-" wealth. There is another cauſe for which the " houſe of commons is called, for that they beſt " know the particular eſtate of their country; and " if the King ſhall aſk their advice, they can beſt " tell what is amiſs, as being moſt ſenſible; and " alſo petition him to redreſs and amend it; they " are the authors of ſuſtenance alſo to him, to ſupply his neceſſities; and that is the proper uſe of a " parliament. Here they are to offer what they " think fit to ſupply his wants, and he is in lieu " thereof to afford them mercy and juſtice.

" And this I dare boldly ſay, and I am not " aſhamed to ſpeak it, that all people owe a kind " of tribute to their King, as a thankfulneſs for " his love to them; and where there is a ſympathy " between a King and his people, it breeds a " happy parliament.-----

Concerning religion.

" As for religion there are laws enough, ſo as " the true intent and execution follow.----

" As touching the rumor which is ſpread, that " I ſhould tolerate religion in reſpect to the match " which hath been long in treaty with Spain for " my ſon; I profeſs I will do nothing therein " which ſhall not be honorable and for the good " of religion, elſe am I not worthy to be your " King; and if any thing break off this match, " it ſhall be the cauſe of religion. The trial which " you have had of my words and writings, where-" in I have been a martyr, tortured in the mouths

(1) As in the following reign there were great diſputes, whether the biſhops were a ſtate or a body apart by themſelves in the parliament, each ſide grounded their aſſertion upon theſe words of this ſpeech, the one affirming the King ſaid, the Three Eſtates, and the other maintaining, he mentioned only Two Eſtates. This is the reaſon of the difference which occurs in the ſeveral copies. Ruſhworth and Wilſon have Two Eſtates. Franklyn, Nalſon, &c. Three Eſtates.

Concerning the reaſons of calling the parliament.

" Now the major errand (I ſpeak truth) for " which I have called you, is for a ſupply of my " urgent neceſſities in urgent cauſes; ye can all " bear me witneſs, that I have reigned above " eighteen years among you; if it hath been a " fault in me that you have been at peace all this " time, I pray you pardon it; for I took it for an " honor unto me, that you ſhould live quietly " under your vines and fig-trees, reaping the fruits " of your own labors, and myſelf to be a juſt and " merciful King among you. You have not been " troubled with preſſing of men, nor with other " inconveniencies which the diſaſters of war pro- " duce, and yet in theſe eighteen years have I had " leſs ſupplies than any King before me. The late " Queen, of famous memory, was ſo far ſupplied in " her time, that it grew to a uſual contribution " of one hundred thirty-five thouſand pounds a " year: I had never above four ſubſidies and ſix " fifteenths. I challenge not more of deſert than " ſhe; but ſure I am, I have governed as peace- " ably. The time ſince my ſupply hath been as " the time of women with child, Quæ decem " tulerint faſtidia menſes, who after ten months " longing, are delivered of their burdens; but I " have travailed ten years, and therefore full time " to be delivered of my wants.

" Now you have ſeen a trial of my late care in " diverſe years laſt paſſed, in looking into the " particulars of my eſtate, wherein I muſt confeſs " I have found my revenue (as Job's friends) for- " ſaking me. In my houſhold expenſes I have a- " bated ten thouſands pounds per annum: in my navy " I have abated twenty five thouſand pounds, and " ſhortly I hope to abate ten thouſand pounds " more. In my ordinary I have brought the ex- " penſe from thirty four thouſand to fourteen " thouſand pounds, and yet I was loth to believe " at firſt that theſe were ſo much out of order: " but at laſt, by the information of ſome private " gentlemen, I was induced to come into a parti- " cular ſurvey; and herein was the love of my " young admiral to me, as he took the envy of " all upon himſelf for my ſake: and tho' he be " but young, yet I find him true in faith, and an " honeſt man, and hath had the beſt ſucceſs in all " he hath taken in hand. He appointed under " himſelf diverſe commiſſioners, as a young com- " mander ſhould do, the better to preſerve him- " ſelf from errors, and ſought no reward but my " good and ſervice, nevertheleſs went thro' with " great diligence and good ſucceſs: and therefore " I hope the kingdom ſhall ſay I have now a true " care of my eſtate, not taking from others by " violence, houſe or land, but governing my own " with good husbandry."

Touching the Bohemia affair, he ſaid much the ſame things as the marquis of Buckingham wrote in his letter to count Gondomar, after which he added:

" I am now to take for a worſe danger againſt " next ſummer, albeit I will leave no travel untried " to obtain a happy peace; but I thought good " to be armed againſt the worſe time, it being " beſt to treat of peace with the ſword in my " hand: Now I ſhall labour to preſerve the reſt " of the Palatinate, wherein I declare, that if by " fair means I cannot get it, my crown, my blood " and all ſhall be expended, with my ſon's blood alſo, " but I will get it for him; and this is the cauſe " of all, that the cauſe of religion is involved in " it, for they will alter religion where they con- " quer, and ſo perhaps my grand-child may ſuffer " who hath commited no fault at all. But this " is nothing without a ſpeedy ſupply, Bis dat qui " citò dat.

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

" Conſider who it is moves you? your King; " and the care of the reformation, and the charges " which he hath diſburſed, beſide forty thouſand " pounds upon the pyratical wars(1); and conſider " I deſerve not your reſpects?

" It is ſtrange that my mint hath not gone this " eight or nine years; but I think the fault of the " want of money is in the uneven balancing of " trade: for other things I confeſs I have been " liberal, but the main cauſe of my wants hath " been the ill government of thoſe whom I " have truſted under me, for I will not make every " day a Chriſtmaſs; and yet it may be in ſome " grants I have hurt my ſelf, and in others my " ſubjects; but if I am truly informed I will right- " ly reform them.

" But for you to hunt after grievances to the " prejudice of the King and yourſelves is not the " errand: deal with me as I ſhall deſerve it at your " hands: I will not leave any thing undone that " becomes a juſt King, if you find accordingly.

" I know this parliament hath been of great ex- " pectation, and ſo was that at my firſt coming. " You I knew, but not the laws and cuſtoms of " this land. I was led by the old counſelors I " found, which the old Queen left, and it may be " there was a miſtaking and miſunderſtanding be- " tween us which bred an abruption. And at the " laſt parliament there came up a ſtrange kind of " beaſt called Undertakers (2), a name which in " my nature I abhor, which cauſed a diſſolution.

" Now you have that advantage that I call you " out of my own free motion, and my truſt is " in your good offices: for my good ſtates, " even all and every one ſhall find an honeſt King " of me.

" How happy a fame will that be, that he is " reverenced and loved of all his people, and he " reciprocally loves them. So ſhall I then be ho- " nored by my neighbor Princes, and peradventure " my government be made an example for poſte- " rity to follow (3)."

Remarks on this ſpeech.

Many remarks and reflections might be made on this ſpeech; but as that would lead me too far, I ſhall reſt ſatisfied with making only a ſingle obſervation. This ſpeech contained ſome maxims concerning regal power, which certainly the Engliſh in general did not then admit, as they do not even at this day. If ſince King James's acceſſion, the parliament, or the commons in particular, had indeavored to incroach upon his prerogative, it might not be thought ſtrange that he ſhould let them know his reſolution to maintain it, and mark out the bounds they were not to exceed. But if we conſider what paſſed in the two firſt parliaments of this reign, the commons did not begin to attack the King, but the King himſelf gave the parliament reaſon for complaint: and ſuppoſing the grievances complained of by the lower houſe were groundleſs, to repreſent them to the King was no attempt upon the prerogative-royal; and yet this was the ſole cauſe of diſſolving the two firſt parliaments. It moreover appears, not only in this to the preſent parliament, but alſo in his former ſpeeches, that he made his prerogative to conſiſt in a boundleſs authority, ſince he ſaid in expreſs terms, "That as "to diſpute what God may do, is blaſphemy; "ſo is it ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute what a King "may do in the height of his power (1)." Hence it was eaſy to infer, he ſet no bounds to the prerogative-royal.

The parliament grants the King a ſubſidy. Coke, p. 111.

The occaſion of calling a parliament was ſo plauſible, that the commons readily judged if, as uſual, they began with examining grievances, before they gave his Majeſty money, he would not fail ſaying, that a delay in ſo important a juncture, was the ſame as a denial. The people were highly inſenſed againſt Spain for invading the Palatinate. They dreaded Prince Charles's marriage with the Infanta, and the deſtruction of the Proteſtant religion abroad: ſo to deny the King money, on this occaſion, would be juſtifying his indolence. Nevertheleſs, certain members, believing James had no deſign to enter on a war, were deſirous to ſpare the ſubjects purſes: but the reſt demonſtrated to them the neceſſity of ſacrificing a ſum of money, whether his Majeſty imployed it in defenſe of the Palatinate, or put it to other uſes. In the firſt caſe, the public would have what they wiſhed, and the money given would be only a ſmall part of what was farther to be expended in ſupport of ſuch war. In the ſecond caſe, his Majeſty's drift would be rendered manifeſt, and that would afford a juſt motive to refuſe him money hereafter for chimerical projects. So, without any ſollicitation, the commons granted the King two intire ſubſidies (2), with which he was ſatisfied, in expectation of obtaining much more afterwards on the ſame pretext.

Digby ſent to Vienna. p. 731.

Not long after, James diſpatched away lord Digby to Vienna, to attempt adjuſting the elector Palatine's affair, or at leaſt obtaining a truce, which ſhould ſecure the Palatinate from thoſe dangers wherewith it was menaced in the inſuing campain. Having previouſly recited what paſſed in parliament, I ſhall ſpeak of this negociation.

Complaints to the parliament againſt monopolies. Ibid.

The ſubſidy act was no ſooner paſſed, but many petitions were received by the houſe of commons, as well againſt the increaſe of Popery and impunity of recuſants, as againſt monopolies, informers, or projectors. Of the monopolies three were chiefly complained of. The firſt was concerning Inns, which no man could keep without a licenſe. The ſecond was of the ſame nature with reſpect to alehouſes. The third was the moſt enormous. It was a patent granted by the King to ſir Giles Monpeſſon, and ſir Francis Michel, for the ſole making and ſelling gold and ſilver lace. By this means, they vended great quantities of counterfeit gold lace, inſtead of real, and if any perſon preſumed to make or ſell any other, he was hurried to priſon and ſeverely fined (3). The two patentees being informed againſt in the houſe of commons, were inſtantly impriſoned: but Monpeſſon, Buckingham's creature, found means to make his eſcape. He was no ſooner in ſafety but James iſſued a proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon by whom he ſhould be apprehended.

Coke, p. 111; Monpeſſon and Michel impriſoned by the commons, and fined. Monpeſſon eſcapes. Coke. Ruſhworth. Wilſon. p. 731.

Mean while, the two houſes applied themſelves cloſely to the affair of monopolies. The commons would know how theſe perſons obtained their patent, while the peers were diligently forming their proceſs; during all which the King was very uneaſy. By the manner this affair was examining, he plainly perceived the odium could not but fall upon himſelf or favorite: wherefore, to prevent the conſequence, he repaired to the houſe of lords, and made a ſpeech replete with tender and affectionate expreſſions. He affirmed, he was ignorant of the ill effects his patent had cauſed, and charged them to bring the offenders to ſpeedy and ſevere juſtice: adding, his intention was to revoke all his patents which had been ſo injurious to the people, and particularly that of gold and ſilver lace, which was a kind of falſe coin. He moreover exhorted them to diſpatch the bill they were preparing againſt informers and projectors, ſaying, he had already ſhewn his diſlike of ſuch people, and to be rid of them would be the greateſt eaſe to himſelf *; "For (continued he) Buckingham told me, he never "found ſuch quiet and reſt as in this time of par- "liament from projectors and informers, who at "other times miſerably vexed him at all hours." He finally told them, he thought 'till then the people had never been ſo happy as in his reign: but now he was aſhamed to conſider how his people had been vexed and polled, by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and the like, which have more exhauſted their purſes than ſubſidies would have done. Having thus obviated the complaints which could be made againſt him, by being ſo ready to condemn the occaſion, he taught the lords how they were to proceed in equitably judging the matters before them, namely, not to ſuffer themſelves to be carried away with inconſiderate zeal for juſtice, in hearkening to thoſe who accuſed the innocent as well as the guilty.

All knew his meaning was to prevent the attacking Buckingham, who was deemed principal author of the monopolies. He had indeed the ſatisfaction to find this matter not too far puſhed by the parliament. But tho' he had ordered his ſpeech to be printed, and diſperſed, he could not hinder reflections greatly to his diſadvantage. For inſtance, he ſaid in his ſpeech, that "he aſſured "them, in the heart of an honeſt man, and by the "faith of a Chriſtian King, if theſe grievances had "been complained of to him before the parliament "he would have puniſhed them more ſeverely than "perhaps the parliament intended to do;" and yet he was contented with abandoning Monpeſſon and Michel, while he deſired the perſon who procured them their patent ſhould be left unmoleſted.

However this be, the lords were ſatisfied with puniſhing Monpeſſon and Michel. They confiſcated the eſtate of Monpeſſon, who had eſcaped, and degraded him of his knighthood (4). Michel was alſo degraded, fined a thouſand pounds, impriſoned for life, and led on horſeback, with his face to the tail, thro' the public ſtreets in London.

Not long after James, hearing complaints were brought before the peers againſt chancellor Bacon, went to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, made a ſpeech, wherein he chiefly inſiſted on the neceſſity of puniſhing corruption and bribery in judges. Then he thanked the commoners for the two ſubſidies, but ſaid, the money had been imployed previouſly for defenſe of the Palatinate and maintenance of his children, who were fled to Holland for refuge: that he had procured a ſhort truce, and hoped ſoon to obtain a general peace; but the great charges of ſending embaſſadors over all Europe, or an army into the Palatinate, in caſe his negociations became fruitleſs, required a much larger ſum than what had been granted him. He concluded, with proteſting before God, he would not diſſolve his preſent parliament 'till the affairs in agitation were completed.

He promiſes not to diſſolve the parliament.

Mean while, the houſe of commons, having demanded a conference of the lords, repreſented to them, that the chancellor being charged with ſundry crimes, it was not fit he ſhould continue any longer in ſo eminent a poſt if he was guilty, or be expoſed to calumny if innocent. Whereupon the lords ſent Bacon to the Tower, and prepared for his trial. He uſed all poſſible indeavors to avoid the ſhame of a particular and full confeſſion. To that end, he preſented to the houſe a very humble petition, ſubmiting to their cenſure, confeſſing himſelf guilty in general, and imploring pardon, or at leaſt, that his puniſhment might not extend farther than taking from him the great ſeal: but the peers were inexorable. They required him to confeſs all particulars of the charge, which conſiſted in the enumeration of ſeveral bribes he had taken. He was ſo very expreſs, that he confeſſed one of his ſervants took a dozen of buttons as a gift, in a cauſe depending before him (1): but this confeſſion, however full and plain it was, prevented not his being declared unworthy, not only of the office of chancellor, but even of thenceforth ſiting in the houſe of peers (2), tho' he had been created baron of Verulam, and viſcount St. Albans: nay, he was very near being deprived of this dignity. He was a very extraordinary genius, and one of the moſt learned men in Europe, but a ſervile flatterer, exceſſively arrogant while he injoyed the ſmiles of fortune, and moſt abjectly cringing under her frowns. After his diſgrace, he compoſed diverſe works, and among others, the Hiſtory of Henry VII, to whom certainly he has not given a juſt and true character. This is not much to be wondered at; for as his eſtate was forfeited by the ſentence paſſed upon him, and as he lived only on a penſion from King James, who always ſpoke of Henry VII, his great-grandfather, with high commendations, he made his court to the King, by repreſenting that Prince as a pattern of wiſdom and virtue.

Remark on his hiſtory of Henry VII.

Origin of Whig and Tory.

It was properly in this third parliament that two parties were formed, the one for the court, the other for the people, who began from this time to oppoſe each other on all occaſions. Theſe had the ſtrongeſt party among the commons, and his Majeſty in the houſe of lords: not but that the Kings had always their adherents in both houſes, and the miniſters and favorites their opponents and emulators. But 'till this parliament, there were not properly any formed parties, or, if any, they were not long-lived: but thoſe which began to be formed this year, continually increaſed. Theſe are the parties ſtill ſubſiſting, under the denominations of Tories and Whigs; whereof the firſt labors inceſſantly to ſtretch the prerogative royal as high as poſſible, when favored by the King, and the other is perpetually inſiſting on the rights and privileges of the people. The mutual animoſity of theſe two factions, when firſt they were formed, was nothing in compariſon to what it is at preſent. When parliamentary affairs came to be tranſacted with a ſpirit of party, all things tended gradually to confuſion. As one of the factions was always ready to inhance the Sovereign's power, the others imployed their utmoſt efforts not only to keep it within due bounds, but alſo to contract it, for fear the King's prerogatives might ſerve him for ſteps to mount higher: thus both went too far. James I gave birth to theſe two parties (who occaſioned ſo many calamities in England and his own family) by magiſterially eſtabliſhing prerogatives which, perhaps, would never have been queſtioned had he not founded them on principles which opened a door to arbitrary power. He nevertheleſs met with great oppoſition, not only in the houſe of commons, but even among the peers, ſeveral of whom ſcrupled not contradicting him openly. Of this number were the earls of Eſſex, Oxford, Southampton * lord Say and Seal, lord Spenſer, and ſome others. It was then become cuſtomary that, when one lord had ſpoken for or againſt the government, he was anſwered by another of the oppoſite party, and very frequently with a heat and paſſion unbecoming the dignity of that auguſt aſſembly. One day as lord Spenſer was diſcourſing of government, and urging diverſe inſtances concerning their noble anceſtors, Arundel ſuddenly interrupted him, ſaying, "My lord, when theſe things you ſpeak of "were doing, your anceſtors were keeping ſheep." Spenſer inſtantly replied, "When my anceſtors (as "you ſay) were keeping ſheep, yours were ploting "treaſon." Whereupon the houſe ordering them both to withdraw, it was reſolved, in ſpite of the moſt zealous courtiers, that the earl of Arundel, as agreſſor, ſhould give lord Spenſer ſatisfaction, which he refuſing was ſent to the Tower, and not releaſed 'till he had ſubmited to the houſe's orders.

Mean while the commons, finding his Majeſty made no preparations for war, but only ſent Digby to the Emperor, were not forward to give him a freſh ſupply, eſpecially as they knew the two ſubſidies already granted had been put to other uſes: neither were they ignorant that the King grounded all his hopes on the Spaniſh match, and conſequently would not eaſily reſolve to take arms againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and the more, becauſe Gondomar had ſtill over him a very great influence: and in reality, had King James ſincerely deſigned to wreſt from the Spaniard what was taken from the Palatine, it was not natural for a Spaniſh embaſſador to have ſo much power at court. The people were thereat highly diſguſted, and looked on the Spaniſh marriage as a very grievous calamity to the nation, and the Proteſtant religion. Of this they gave a ſenſible proof to Gondomar himſelf, who was reviled and inſulted by the populace in London ſtreets (3). The King hearing of it, ordered one of the inſolent mob to be publicly whiped by the common executioner.

James, perceiving the commons would never think of granting him a freſh aid, before it was more certainly known whether there would be peace or war, ordered the lord-treaſurer to go in his name, and adjourn the parliament to the fourteenth of November. The ſpirit of jealouſy, which then reigned among the commons, made them conſider this adjournment as a manifeſt infringment of their privileges. They pretended, the Sovereign had indeed power to prorogue and diſſolve parliaments, but that adjournment was the peculiar privilege of each houſe: ſo they deſired a conference with the lords, to perſuade their concurring with them in preſenting a petition to his Majeſty on this occaſion. But James acquainting the peers, that ſuch a petition would extremely diſguſt him, and that he would not ſuffer his power to call, adjourn, prorogue, and diſſolve the parliament to be diſputed, their lordſhips refuſed joining with the commons. Whereupon the commons declared, that they were highly diſturbed at his Majeſty's reſolution, becauſe it deprived them of the means of finiſhing what was begun for the public's advantage.

The lords refuſe to join with the commons.

This declaration brought James to the houſe of peers, and after thanking their lordſhips for acknowledging his prerogative, and refuſing to join with the commons, he told them, if they deſired it, he would grant them a delay of eight or ten days; but would not do it at requeſt of the commons. Upon this offer, the peers, after a conference with the commons, moved his Majeſty to continue their ſeſſion fourteen days longer, which was granted. Some days after, a commitee of both houſes attending the King, he took occaſion to tell them, how ill he took it that the commons ſhould diſpute his undoubted right to adjourn the parliament. Seemingly, this power was not confirmed by cuſtom, ſince the commons conſidered it as a downright incroachment on their immunities; whereas they never thought of queſtioning his right to prorogue and diſſolve the parliament. Howſoever this be, the commons, ſeeing the peers, who were equally concerned in the affair, refuſe their concurrence, proceeded no farther. Nevertheleſs, on the day they were to ſeparate, they up drew the following declaration, "That taking into moſt "ſerious conſideration the preſent ſtate of the "King's children abroad, and the generally afflicted "eſtate of the true profeſſors of the ſame Chriſtian "religion profeſſed by the church of England in "foreign parts, and being touched with a true "ſenſe and fellow-feeling of their diſtreſſes, as "members of the ſame body, they do with "unanimous conſent declare-----they ſhall be ready, "to the utmoſt of their power, both with their "lives and fortunes, to aſſiſt his Majeſty ſo, as "that he may be able to do that with his ſword "which by a peaceable courſe ſhall not be "effected."

Preſently after, James iſſued a proclamation, wherein he ſet forth, that as many great affairs, debated in parliament, could not be brought to perfection in ſo ſhort a time, "the commons "thought it convenient to continue the ſame "ſeſſion in courſe of adjournment:" that, as for the grievances, they were ſuch as he needed not the aſſiſtance of parliament to reform the ſame, and would have redreſſed them himſelf, had they been ſooner made known to him. Adding; that, by his own regal authority, he annulled and revoked the patent for gold and ſilver thread, and ſome others mentioned in the proclamation. At the ſame time, a ſecond proclamation was publiſhed againſt ſuch as were ſo bold as to talk of ſtate-affairs, notwithſtanding his Majeſty's former command, with threats of ſevere puniſhment, as well againſt the concealers of ſuch diſcourſes, as againſt audacious tongues and pens.

I muſt now briefly relate what paſſed in Bohemia and the Palatinate, after the battle of Prague. This knowledge is abſolutely requiſite towards clearly comprehending the affairs of England.

The day after that battle, the city of Prague ſurrendered at diſcretion, and the duke of Bavaria returned to Munich, leaving his army in Bohemia under command of his general count Tilly. On the other hand, count Bucquoy departed, the twelfth of December, for Moravia which voluntarily ſubmited, as deſpairing of aſſiſtance. When Bucquoy had paſſed part of the winter in Moravia and at Vienna, he went and commanded the Imperial army in Hungary, where, after having made ſome progreſs, he was killed. A little before, Sileſia had alſo ſubmited to the Emperor.

Affairs of Bohemia. Hiſt. Reb. Boh.

Mean while count Mansfeldt had fortified himſelf in Bohemia, whence the Imperialiſts would have found it difficult to drive him. But the King of Bohemia, who was ſtill in Holland, hearing the duke of Bavaria was preparing to invade the Upper Palatinate, cauſed Mansfeldt to march his army thither, having obtained of the Hollanders a hundred and fifty thouſand florins to pay his troops. Mansfeldt was not however in condition to withſtand Tilly, who being entered the Upper Palatinate with twenty-five thouſand men, had taken Bamburgh and ſome other places. Mean while, as Mansfeldt had intrenched himſelf behind a moraſs, where it was impracticable to attack him, count Tilly, to make him quit the country, concluded with him a treaty, whereby he ingaged to ſupply him with two hundred thouſand florins. This treaty was concluded the twenty-ſeventh of September 1621, but ſome difficulty ariſing, it was not executed: ſo Mansfeldt held his poſt 'till the arrival of lord Digby, who, paſſing that way in his return from Vienna, prevailed with him to march into the Lower Palatinate, which was in extreme danger. By this means the Upper Palatinate was effectually loſt, being reduced by the duke of Bavaria.

Loſs of the Upper Palatinate.

In the year 1620, Spinola, as I ſaid, began his conqueſts in the Lower Palatinate. Since the King of Bohemia's allies ſubmiſſion to the Emperor, after the battle of Prague, Spinola had continued his conqueſts with rapidity; for there was no army to ſtop him, and the Engliſh were too weak to oppoſe his progreſs. However, on the ſecond of Auguſt 1620, a five weeks truce was concluded at Haguenau, which was the truce mentioned by King James in his ſpeech to the parliament. The archduke had made him believe, he agreed to this truce purely on his account; but in reality it was purely to afford Ferdinand leiſure to ſend forces into the Lower Palatinate, in the room of thoſe Spinola was leading back to the Netherlands, becauſe of the expiration of the twelve years truce between Spain and Holland. Spinola leaving but very few troops with Don Gonſales de Cordoua, who was to command in the Palatinate, the truce was as much for the Spaniard's advantage as for the King of Bohemia's. Soon after, the Spaniſh army being become ten thouſand ſtrong, Vere was obliged to ſhelter himſelf in Wormes. Mean while, the Spaniſh general became maſter of Stein, Ladenburg, and Keiſers-Lautern, and in October beſieged Frankendal, whither Vere had retired. There was no other way to ſave this important place, than, as I obſerved, by cauſing Mansfeldt to come from the Upper Palatinate. On Mansfeldt's approach, Gonſales raiſed the ſiege of Frankendal: but immediately after Tilly arriving in the Lower Palatinate, with the Bavarian army, and ſome troops of Mentz and Wirtzburg, Mansfeldt was forced to withdraw into Alſatia. This campain ended with the loſs of all the towns in the Lower Palatinate, except Manheim, Heidelbergh and Frankendal, which were the moſt important. Vere continued at Frankendal, Herbert commanded in Manheim, and Burroughs in Heidelberg.

King James amuſed by the archduke;

The twelve years truce between Spain and the United Provinces being about to expire, the archduke was afraid, James would ſend the ſtates a powerful ſuccor, in order to compel the Spaniards to reſtore what was taken in the Palatinate. To divert James from ſuch thoughts, the Spaniard intimated to him, that a pacification between his Imperial Majeſty and the elector Palatine was not ſo difficult as was imagined, and the Emperor would doubtleſs agree to it on reaſonable conditions: nay, he ſent Ferdinand, in the elector's behalf, a very preſſing letter, which was communicated to King James. This was attacking him on his weak ſide: for he was ever of opinion that juſtice, honeſty and the world's regard for him, were ſufficient to determine this affair. To inſnare him with greater facility, Ferdinand wrote to the archduke that, at his inſtances, and out of his great reſpect to the King of England, he was ready to imbrace all proper methods for a peace with the elector Palatine. On the other hand, his Catholic Majeſty acquainted Ferdinand, that if he gave the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria, as was reported, he muſt expect no farther aſſiſtance from Spain. All theſe letters were imparted either to James or his embaſſadors, which confirmed him in his opinion, that there would be no occaſion for war, and that ſhewing the leaſt diffidence would ſpoil all. Thus the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria amuſed the King, to induce him to remain in his fatal neutrality. Upon theſe hopes therefore, without at all queſtioning their ſincerity, he diſpatched lord Digby to Vienna, the ſucceſs of whoſe negociation I muſt now relate.

and by the Emperor. Annals.

Succeſs of Digby's embaſſy. Du Cheſne. Ruſhworth, p. 37. Annals.

The embaſſador, having audience of the Emperor the fifteenth of July, confined his demands to theſe two heads. Firſt; That the elector Palatine ſhould he reſtored to the ſame ſtate he was in before he was King of Bohemia. Secondly; That the Imperial ban ſhould be revoked, or at leaſt ſuſpended; for which the King his father-in-law would undertake obliging him to give the Emperor due ſatisfaction.

Ferdinand, who only ſought to gain time, anſwered in writing; that the King of England, and ſome other Princes having ſollicited him in the Palſgrave's behalf, he was ready to pardon him at their requeſt: that the difficulty of this affair conſiſted in two principal points, the firſt whereof was, that the Palſgrave ſhould pay him the obedience due to the head of the Empire; the ſecond, that he ſhould give him a reaſonable ſatisfaction. As this was James's ſcheme for accommodation, a peace ſeemed not to be very remote: but the term ſatisfaction being capable of a more or leſs extenſive meaning, it was eaſy for Ferdinand to prolong the negociation as he pleaſed. Nevertheleſs, leſt he ſhould be taken at his word, he added in his anſwer, that, as he had undertaken this war with the advice and aſſiſtance of diverſe Potentates, he could not act without their concurrence; but had called a diet at Ratiſbon, the reſolutions whereof ſhould be communicated to the King of England. It muſt be obſerved, this diet did not meet 'till January 1623.

Death of the archduke. ibid.

A few days after Ferdinand had delivered this anſwer to the embaſſador, he received a letter from the Infanta Iſabella, notifying the archduke her conſort's deceaſe, at Bruſſels, the thirteenth of July, and repeating withal her inſtances in the elector's behalf. Whereupon Digby preſented a freſh memorial, demanding a truce for the Lower Palatinate on three conditions. 1. That count Mansfeldt ſhould obſerve the truce, otherwiſe the elector Palatine ſhould revoke his commiſſion. 2. That the commiſſion of John-George de Brandenburg, marquis of Jagerndorf, who ſerved the elector, ſhould be alſo revoked. 3. That as ſoon as the truce was publiſhed, the elector ſhould deliver to his Imperial Majeſty Tabor and Witigaw, the only places he ſtill held in Bohemia.

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

Ferdinand, having received theſe propoſals, communicated them to the elector of Saxony and duke of Bavaria, who returned both a like anſwer, as if they had given each other the word, viz. they counſelled him not to omit whatever might reſtore peace to Germany: looſe expreſſions without any meaning, but which however gave occaſion to believe they were inclined to peace. After this, Ferdinand ſent the Infanta a letter, which was imparted to Digby, telling her that, at her requeſt, and out of his great regard for the King of England, who had ſhewn ſo much prudence, ſincerity and moderation, he was determined on negociating a truce, on the conditions propoſed by the Engliſh embaſſador himſelf: adding that, during the truce, conferences might be held, to indeavour bringing matters to a thorough pacification. Thus James was obliged, either to ſit ſtill and wait the event of theſe conferences, or to break with the Emperor and Spain, when peace ſeemed to be on the point of concluſion, to which it was well known he would not readily be perſuaded.

Ruſhworth, p. 37. Annals.

Some time after the Emperor, whether to gain time, or to be freed from Digby's importunities, told him, he intended to grant a truce for the Palatinate, provided the duke of Bavaria would conſent: nay, he counſelled him to negociate with that Prince in perſon. Digby, quiting Vienna, the eleventh of September, came into the Upper Palatinate, where the duke of Bavaria then was, at the time Mansfeldt was concluding the forementioned truce with Tilly. When Digby talked of a truce, the duke told him, "There was no need to "labor for a truce, for the wars were at an end, "in that he had agreed with count Mansfeldt; nor "did he doubt of keeping both Palatinates in "peace 'till the Emperor and Palſgrave were a-"greed." Ferdinand, learning from Digby this anſwer, wrote to him, that the face of affairs being changed in the Upper Palatinate, thro' the ill conduct of Mansfeldt, who had entered that country with his troops, the duke of Bavaria was under a neceſſity of levying forces to drive him thence, and it was not reaſonable he ſhould be at that charge to no purpoſe. Then it was that Digby, having acquainted King James with the ſtate of affairs in Germany, brought Mansfeldt into the Lower Palatinate, where his coming ſaved Frankendal. After that, he borrowed on his own credit ten thouſand pounds ſterling, to pay the Engliſh troops, who had not for a long time received any ſubſiſtence.

Satisfaction offered Ferdinand by King James in the Palatine's name. Du Cheſne.

King James being, by his embaſſador's letter, informed of the duke of Bavaria's anſwer, wrote to his Imperial Majeſty, to complain of the Palatinate's being invaded, and to tell him in what manner he conceived the elector Palatine was to give him ſatisfaction, in order to remove that word's ambiguity. 1. That he ſhould renounce the crown of Bohemia. 2. That, as Prince of the Empire, he ſhould ſubmit to his Imperial Majeſty. 3. That he ſhould aſk pardon on his knees. 4. That, for the future, he ſhould remain quiet, and raiſe no diſturbance in the Empire. 5. That he ſhould be reconciled to all the Princes. 6. That, if this was not ſufficient, he would undertake to procure what other terms ſhould be deemed reaſonable. Laſtly, He told him that, if he could not obtain his ſon-in-law's pardon by this means, he was reſolved to have recourſe to arms. Ferdinand, without being terrified with this menace, ſtill continued to amuſe him, and the better to perſuade him he was inclined to peace, he dispatched count Schwatzenburgh to settle with him the conditions of a truce. The count was very magnificently received at London. But before I speak of the success of his embassy, I must relate what passed in England 'till the close of this year.

James assembles the parliament at Digby's return. Rushworth.

James had farther adjourned the two houses from the fourteenth of November to the eighth of February 1622. But Digby's return occasioned his ordering them to meet November twenty. As he was somewhat indisposed, he commanded the lord keeper, lord treasurer, and lord Digby, to acquaint the parliament with his intentions.

The keeper's speech. Wilson. Rushworth, p. 39. Annals.

The lord keeper said that, since the last adjournment, his Majesty had taken great care of the nation, reforming by his proclamations thirty-seven several grievances complained of by the people, without demanding ought in return for these favors, as was usual in former times: that he had reassembled the parliament, on the commons declaration to assist him powerfully in recovering the Palatinate: that he had used his indeavors to procure a good peace, but with little success, as lord Digby would inform them. Then he put them in mind, that the King had advanced forty thousand pounds to keep together an army in the Lower Palatinate: "But (continued he) unless the parliament take "farther resolution, and imitate rather ancient "than modern principles, and be more expeditious "in what they do, his Majesty's indeavors will "fall to the ground." He concluded with saying, his Majesty had resolved to continue the session 'till seven or eight days before Christmas, and renew it the eighth of February.

Digby's speech. Wilson. p. 738. Rushworth, p. 39. Annals.

Lord Digby, speaking next, gave a brief account of his embassy to Vienna, and said he plainly discovered his Imperial Majesty designed to give the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria. Adding, that a good sum of money was absolutely necessary, both to keep count Mansfeldt's army together, and to send a strong supply of English troops to the Palatinate.

The treasurer's speech. Rushworth, ibid.

Lord treasurer said, the King's coffers were empty, his treasure being exhausted by the sums imployed in defense of the Palatinate: nevertheless, tho' his Majesty declared for war, he was resolved to conclude the Spanish marriage, hoping by that means to heal the breach.

James's design. Rushworth, ibid.

Certain it is, King James had no notion of entering on a war, since it could be only with the Spaniard, whom he considered as his best friend, and with whom he was on the point of being strictly allied, by his son's marriage with the Infanta: but he feigned being ready to take arms, in case he should be necessitated. To this effect, it was, in his opinion, requisite to make early preparation, and begin with sending Mansfeldt wherewithal to pay his troops and continue war in the Palatinate, 'till he could learn the success of the Vienna and Madrid negociations. James would therefore have it supposed, as a thing certain, that in case their negociations proved ineffectual he was determined to commence the war, and support it vigorously. Consequently he demanded money to inable him to make the necessary preparations, and in short required, that the affair should be left intirely to his management.

Remark on this occasion.

Indeed parliaments are wont to act thus when they think the King is undertaking a just and necessary war: so James proceeded upon the usual parliamentary custom and method. There was only a single objection to be made, whereon however no man durst speak his mind freely; viz. that the conduct of former parliaments was grounded on a good opinion of their Kings, and the confidence they in them reposed: but the commons had no such confidence in James I. He demanded money for a war, to which they were persuaded he had no inclination: and therefore they could not help fearing that what monies should be granted him would be otherwise imployed than in a war against Spain. On the other hand, the commons were taken in their own nets. To shew that the delay of a war, universally deemed necessary, proceeded not from them, they had promised to put his Majesty in condition to begin and pursue it vigorously: but when this promise came to be performed, the little confidence they had in their Sovereign made them very reserved. It was however requisite to satisfy the public, and shew they intended to keep their promise, provided they could be certain it would be for the nation's advantage. To this end, they resolved to make a remonstrance to the King, representing what, in the present juncture, they judged necessary: not that they expected he would grant their requests, but to leave him without excuse in case he refused them, which was scarce to be doubted. Such were the effects this distrust between King and parliament began to produce. Instead of using their joint indeavors for the public good, each strove to take advantage of the other. The better to comprehend the events of this reign, which were the source and origin of those combustions which occurred in the next, it will not be amiss (long as it is) to insert the whole remonstrance.

Different principles of King and commons.

King James had, at opening this parliament, taken great care to mark out bounds which the commons were not to exceed. Above all things, he intimated to them, that they ought not to give him advice without being aſked. They neglected this charge very much in their remonſtrance, and plainly ſhewed, they did not believe it belonged to the King to determine on the extent of duty in the peoples repreſentatives in parliament. James's principles were ſo different from thoſe of the commons, that it is no wonder their inferences were directly contrary. This Prince's meaning never was that the commons ſhould adviſe him; and the commons pretended, it was their indiſpenſible duty to repreſent to him the dangers of church or ſtate, with the propereſt remedies. James reſted on the prerogative royal; but the commons agreed not to the extent he gave this prerogative, by virtue whereof he pretended to hinder their taking care of church and ſtate when they were in danger, or their concerns neglected. It is very difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, to mark out the bounds of royal prerogative, as well as of the privilege and duty of the nation's repreſentatives, in all caſes which may occur: ſo, without undertaking to decide this point, I ſhall only ſay, the commons diſtruſt made them take a very extraordinary courſe, which doubtleſs they would not have followed, had they been to deal with a Prince of greater eſtimation. On the other hand, it muſt be allowed James gave great occaſions of ſuſpicion and jealouſy, in affecting to eſtabliſh his prerogative upon general principles, which will never be received in England, without reſtrictions ſuitable to the nature of that kingdom's conſtitution.

James offended at the manner of this remonſtrance.

But attempting on the royal prerogative was not what alone offended his Majeſty. The remonſtrance contained what could not but be to him extremely diſagreeable, ſince, in obſcure terms, he was taxed with neglecting the welfare of religion and the nation; with tolerating recuſants; with having no deſign to ingage in a war for recovering the Palatinate, tho' he deſired money for that purpoſe; with granting licenſes prejudicial to the realm; and laſtly, with having little or no concern for the intereſt of religion, in matching the Prince his ſon with a Spaniſh Princeſs. The commons, not daring to ſpeak their thoughts freely on this occaſion, were contented with giving intimations. James perceived it, but in his own vindication forbore entering on particulars, which would not have redounded to his advantage. It was abundantly more agreeable to his intereſt and dignity to hinder ſo ungrateful a remonſtrance from being preſented to him: and that was the courſe he took. As ſoon as he heard the remonſtrance was ready, he wrote thus to the ſpeaker.

To our truſty and well-beloved, ſir Thomas Richardſon, knight, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

Mr. Speaker,

King James's letter to the ſpeaker. Wilſon. p. 172. Annals of James I. p. 60.

" WE have heard, by diverſe reports, to our " great grief, that our diſtance from the " houſes of parliament, cauſed by our indiſpoſition " of health, hath imboldened ſome fiery and " popular ſpirits of certain of the houſe of com- " mons, to argue and debate publicly of " matters far above their reach and capacity, " tending to our high diſhonor, and breach of the " prerogative royal. Theſe are therefore to com- " mand you to make known, in our name, unto " the houſe, that none therein ſhall preſume hence- " forth to meddle with any thing concerning our " government, or deep matters of ſtate; and " namely, not to deal with our deareſt ſon's match " with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the " honor of that King, or any other our friends " and confederates; and alſo not to meddle with " any man's particulars which have their due " motion in our ordinary courts of juſtice. And " whereas, we hear they have ſent a meſſage to " ſir Edwin Sandys, to know the reaſons of his " late reſtraint, you ſhall in our name reſolve them, " that it was not for any miſdemeanor of his in " parliament; but to put them out of doubt of " any queſtion of that nature that may ariſe among " them hereafter, you ſhall reſolve them, in our " name, that we think our ſelf very free and able " to puniſh any man's miſdemeanors in parlia- " ment, as well during their ſiting, as after: " which we mean not to ſpare hereafter, upon any " occaſion of any man's inſolent behavior there, " which ſhall be miniſtered unto us: and if they " have already touched any of theſe points, which " we have forbiden, in any petition of theirs which " is to be ſent unto us, it is our pleaſure that you " ſhall tell them, that except they reform it before " it come to our hands, we will not deign the " hearing nor anſwering it."

Dated at New-market, Dec. 3. 1621.

James I. An' 1621.

This letter being read and examined in the houſe, the commons thought not proper to keep ſilence, but to let the King ſee his threats ſhould not deter them from doing what they pretended was their duty. They drew therefore a petition, which was, with the foregoing remonſtrance, preſented to his Majeſty. The petition ran thus:

Moſt dread and gracious Sovereign,

The commons remonſtrance. Ruſhworth, p. 44. Annals of James I. p. 60.

" WE your moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, " the knights, citizens and burgeſſes " aſſembled in the commons houſe of parliament, " full of grief and unſpeakable ſorrow, thro' the " true ſenſe of your Majeſty's diſpleaſure, expreſſed " by your letter lately ſent to our ſpeaker, and by " him related and read unto us: yet comforted " again with the aſſurance of your grace and " goodneſs, and of the ſincerity of our own in- " tentions and proceedings, whereon with confi- " dence we can rely, in all humbleneſs beſeech " your moſt excellent Majeſty, that the loyalty " and dutifulneſs of as faithful and loving ſubjects " as ever ſerved, or lived under a gracious Sove- " reign, may not undeſervedly ſuffer by the miſ- " information of partial and uncertain reports, " which are ever unfaithful intelligencers: but that " your Majeſty would, in the clearneſs of your " own judgment, firſt vouchſafe to underſtand from " our ſelves, and not from others, what our humble " declaration and petition (reſolved upon by the " univerſal voice of the houſe, and propoſed with " your gracious favor to be preſented unto your " ſacred Majeſty) doth contain. Upon what oc- " caſion we entered into conſideration of thoſe " things which are therein contained, with what " dutiful reſpect to your Majeſty, and your ſervice, " we did conſider thereof, and what was our true " intention thereby. And that when your Majeſty " ſhall thereby truely diſcern our dutiful affections, " you will, in your royal judgment, free us from " thoſe heavy charges, wherewith ſome of our " members are burdened, and wherein the whole " houſe is involved.

" And

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

" And we humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that " you would not hereafter give credit to private re- " ports, againſt all or any of the members of our " houſe, whom the whole have not cenſured, un- " til your Majeſty have been truly informed there- " of from our ſelves: and that in the mean time, " and ever, we may ſtand upright in your Ma- " jeſty's grace and good opinion, than which no " worldly conſideration is or can be dearer unto us.

" When your Majeſty had re-aſſembled us in par- " liament, by your royal commandment, ſooner than " we expected, and did vouchſafe, by the mouths " of three honorable lords, to impart unto us the " weighty occaſions moving your Majeſty there- " unto, and from them we did underſtand theſe " particulars,

" That notwithſtanding your princely and pious " indeavors to procure peace, the time is now " come, that Janus's temple muſt be opened.

" That the voice of Bellona muſt be heard, and " not the voice of a turtle.

" That there was no hope of peace, nor any " truce to be obtained, no not for a few days.

" That your Majeſty muſt either abandon your " own children, or ingage your ſelf in a war, " wherein conſideration is to be had, what foot, " what horſe, what money will be ſufficient.

" That the Lower Palatinate was ſeized upon " by the army of the King of Spain, as executor " of the ban there in quality of duke of Burgundy, " as the Upper Palatinate was by the duke of Ba- " varia.

" That the King of Spain, at his own charge, " had now at leaſt five armies on foot,

" That the Princes of the union were diſbanded, " but the Catholic league remained firm, whereby " thoſe Princes ſo diſſevered were in danger, " one by one, to be ruined.

" That the eſtate of thoſe of the religion in fo- " reign parts was miſerable; and that out of theſe " conſiderations we were called to a war, and forth- " with to adviſe for a ſupply of keeping the forces " in the Palatinate from diſbanding, and to foreſee " the means for raiſing and maintaining the body " of an army for a war againſt ſpring. We there- " fore, out of our zeal to your Majeſty and your " poſterity, with more alacrity and celerity than " ever was precedented in parliament, did addreſs " our ſelves to the ſervice commended unto us. " And altho' we cannot conceive that the honor " and ſafety of your Majeſty and your poſterity; " the patrimony of your children invaded, and poſ- " ſeſſed by their enemies; the welfare of religion, " and ſtate of your kingdoms, are matters at any " time unfit for the deepeſt conſideration, in time " of parliament: and altho' before this time we " were in ſome of theſe points ſilent, and yet being " now invited thereunto, and led on by ſo juſt oc- " caſion, we thought it our duties to provide for " the preſent ſupply thereof, and not only to turn " our eyes on a war abroad, but to take care for " ſecuring our peace at home, which the dangerous " increaſe and inſolency of Popiſh recuſants, appa- " rently, viſibly, and ſenſibly did lead us unto. " The conſideration whereof did neceſſarily draw " us truly to repreſent unto your Majeſty, what " we conceive to be the cauſes, what we feared " would be the effects, and what we hoped might " be the remedies of theſe growing evils; among " which, as incident and unavoidable, we fell upon " ſome things which ſeem to touch upon the King of " Spain, as they have relation to Popiſh recuſants " at home, to the wars by him maintained in the " Palatinate againſt your Majeſty's children, and to " his ſeveral armies now on foot; yet, as we con- " ceived, without touch of diſhonor to that King, " or any other Prince your Majeſty's confederate.

" In the diſcourſe whereof, we did not aſſume to " our ſelves any power to determine on any part " thereof, nor intended to incroach or intrude upon " the ſacred bounds of your royal authority, to " whom and to whom only we acknowledge it " doth belong to reſolve of peace and war, and of " the marriage of the moſt noble Prince your ſon: " but, as your moſt loyal and humble ſubjects and " ſervants, repreſenting the whole commons of your " kingdom (who have a large intereſt in the happy " and proſperous eſtate of your Majeſty, and your " royal poſterity, and of the flouriſhing eſtate of " our church and commonwealth) did reſolve, out " of our cares and fears, truly and plainly to de- " monſtrate theſe things to your Majeſty, which " we were not aſſured could otherwiſe come ſo " fully and clearly to your knowledge; and that " being done, to lay the ſame down at your Ma- " jeſty's feet, without expectation of any other an- " ſwer of your Majeſty, touching theſe higher " points, than what at your good pleaſure, and in " your own time, ſhould be held fit.

" This being the effect of that we had formerly " reſolved upon, and theſe the occaſions and rea- " ſons inducing the ſame, our humble ſuit to your " Majeſty and confidence is, that your Majeſty " will be graciouſly pleaſed to receive, at the hands " of theſe our meſſengers, our former humble de- " claration and petition, and vouchſafe to read, and " favorably to interpret the ſame: and that to ſo " much thereof as containeth our humble petition " concerning Jeſuits, Prieſts, and Popiſh recuſants, " the paſſage of bills, and granting your royal " pardon, you will vouchſafe an anſwer unto us.

" And whereas your Majeſty, by the general " words of your letter, ſeemeth to reſtrain us from " intermeddling with matters of government, or " particulars which have their motion in the courts " of juſtice, the generality of which words, in the " largeneſs of the extent thereof (as we hope be- " yond your Majeſty's intention) might involve " thoſe things, which are the proper ſubject of par- " liamentary occaſions and diſcourſe.

" And whereas your Majeſty doth ſeem to a- " bridge us of the ancient liberty of parliament, " for freedom of ſpeech, juriſdiction and juſt cen- " ſure of the houſe, and other proceedings there " (wherein, we truſt in God, we ſhall never tranſ- " greſs the bounds of loyal and dutiful ſubjects) a " liberty which we aſſure our ſelves ſo wiſe and " ſo juſt a King will not infringe, the ſame being " our ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, " received from our anceſtors: without which we " cannot freely debate, nor clearly diſcern of things " in queſtion before us, nor truly inform your Ma- " jeſty; in which we have been confirmed by " your Majeſty's moſt gracious former ſpeeches and " meſſages. We are therefore now again inforced, " in all humbleneſs, to pray your Majeſty to al- " low the ſame, and thereby to take away the " doubts and ſcruples your Majeſty's late letter to " our ſpeaker hath wrought upon us.

" So ſhall we your loyal and loving ſubjects " ever acknowledge your Majeſty's juſtice, grace " and goodneſs, and be ready to perform that ſer- " vice to your Majeſty, which in the true affec- " tion of our hearts we profeſs, and pour out our " daily and devout prayers to the Almighty for " your Majeſty's long life, happy and religious " reign, and proſperous eſtate, and for your royal " poſterity after you for ever."

This petition, with the remonſtrance annexed, was ſent to the King by twelve members, at the head of whom the houſe affected to ſet ſir Richard Weſton, a privy-counſellor, a known Papiſt, and thought to be the perſon who moſt inſenſed his Majeſty againſt the commons. Then the houſe reſolved to proceed to no other affair, 'till they had anſwer to their petition. James received the twelve members very roughly: ſome ſay, he called for twelve chairs for them, ſaying, "Here are twelve "Kings come to me." He received from them their laſt petition, but rejected the remonſtrance, with a copy of their petition already preſented to him againſt the recuſants. Some days after, he ſent the commons his anſwer in writing. As nothing can better diſcover that Prince's deſigns and character than his ſpeeches, tho' generally very tedious, the reader perhaps will be glad to ſee the whole anſwer at large.

King James's anſwer to the latter petition. Ibid. p. 174. Annals of James I. p. 62. Ruſhworth, p. 46.

"WE muſt here begin, in the ſame faſhion "we would have done if your firſt petition "had come to your hands, before we had made a "ſtay thereof; which is to repeat the firſt words of "the late Queen, of famous memory, uſed by her "in anſwer to an inſolent propoſition made by a "Polonian embaſſador unto her; that is, "Legatum expectabamus, Heraldum accipimus". For "we had great reaſon to expect, that the firſt "meſſage from your houſe ſhould have been a "meſſage of thankſgiving, for our continued gracious behavior towards our people, ſince your "laſt receſs, not only by our proclamation of grace, "wherein were contained ſix or ſeven and thirty "articles, all of ſeveral points of grace to the "people, but alſo by the labor we took for the "ſatisfaction of both houſes, in thoſe three articles "recommended unto us in both their names, by "the right reverend father in God, the archbiſhop "of Canterbury; and likewiſe for the good government of Ireland, we are now in hand with "at your requeſt. But not only have we heard no "news of all this, but contrary-wiſe great complaints of the danger of religion within this kingdom, tacitly implying our ill-government in this "point. And we leave you to judge, whether it be "your duties, who are the repreſentative body of "our people, ſo to diſtaſte them with our government; whereas by the contrary it is your duty, "with all your indeavors, to kindle more and more "a dutiful and thankful love in the peoples hearts "towards us, for our juſt and gracious government.

"Now whereas, in the very begining of this "your apology, you tax us in fair terms of truſting "uncertain reports, and partial informations concerning your proceeding; we wiſh you to remember, that we are an old and experienced King, "needing no ſuch leſſons, being in our conſcience "freeſt of any King alive from hearing or truſting "idle reports, which ſo many of your houſe as are "neareſt us can bear witneſs unto you, if you would "give as good ear to them, as you do to ſome tribunitial orators among you: and for proof in "this particular, we have made your own meſſengers confer your other petitions ſent by you with "the copy thereof, which was ſent us before; "between which there is no difference at all, but "that ſince our receiving the firſt copy, you added "a concluſion unto it, which could not come to "our hands 'till it was done by you, and your "meſſenger ſent, which was all at one time. And "if we had no copy of it beforehand, we muſt "have received your firſt petition, to our great "diſhonor, before we had known what it contained, "which would have inforced us to return you a far "worſe anſwer than now we do; for then your "meſſengers had returned with nothing but that, "we have judged your petition unlawful and unworthy of an anſwer: for as to your concluſion "thereof, it is nothing but "proteſtatio contraria "facto"; for in the body of your petition, you "uſurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle "with things far above your reach; and then in "the concluſion you proteſt the contrary; as if "a robber would take a man's purſe and then "proteſt he meaned not to rob him. For firſt, "you preſume to give us your advice concerning "the match of our deareſt ſon with ſome Proteſtant "(we cannot ſay Princeſs, for we know none of "theſe fit for him) and diſſuade us from his match "with Spain; urging us to preſent war with that "King; and yet in the concluſion, forſooth, ye "proteſt, ye intend not to preſs upon our moſt undoubted and regal prerogative; as if the petitioning us in matters which your ſelves confeſs ye "ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling "with them.

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

"And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited "to this courſe by the ſpeeches of three honorable "lords; yet, by ſo much as your ſelves repeat of "the ſpeeches, nothing can be concluded, but that "we were reſolved by war to regain the Palatinate, "if otherwiſe we could not attain unto it. And "you are invited to adviſe forthwith upon a ſupply, "for keeping the forces in the Palatinate from "diſbanding, and to foreſee the means for the "raiſing and maintenance of the body of an army "for that war againſt the ſpring. Now, what "inference can be made upon this, that therefore we muſt preſently denounce war againſt the "King of Spain, break our deareſt ſon's match, "and match him to one of our religion, let the "world judge. The difference is no greater, than "if we would tell a merchant, that we had great "need to borrow money from him for raiſing an "army; that thereupon it would follow, that we "were bound to follow his advice in the direction "of the war, and all things depending thereupon: "but yet not contenting your ſelves with this excuſe "of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, ye "come after to a direct contradiction to the concluſion of your former petition, ſaying, that the "honor and ſafety of us and our poſterity, and the "patrimony of our children, invaded and poſſeſſed "by their enemies, the welfare of religion, and ſtate "of our kingdoms, are matters at any time not "unfit for your deepeſt conſiderations in parliament. To this generality, we anſwer with the "logicians, that where all things are contained, "nothing is omited. So as this plenipotency of "yours inveſts you in all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the Pope's to have the keys alſo "both of heaven and purgatory: and to this vaſt "generality of yours, we can give no other anſwer; "for it will trouble all the beſt lawyers in the houſe "to make a good commentary upon it: for ſo did "the Puritan miniſters in Scotland bring all kind of "cauſes within the compaſs of their juriſdiction, "ſaying, that it was the church's office to judge "of ſlander, and there could no kind of crime "or fault be commited, but there was a ſlander "in it, either againſt God, the King, or their "neighbor; and by this means they hooked in "to themſelves the cogniſance of all cauſes: or, "like Bellarmine's diſtinction of the Pope's power "over all Kings, "in ordine ad ſpiritualia", "whereby he gives them all temporal juriſdiction "over them.

"But to give you a direct anſwer to the matter "of war, for which you are ſo earneſt: we confeſs, "we rather expect you ſhould have given us great "and hearty thanks, for the ſo long maintaining "a ſettled peace in all our dominions, when as "all our neighbors about are in a miſerable combuſtion of war; but, "dulce bellum inexpertis", "and we indeed find by experience, that a number "of our ſubjects are ſo pampered with peace, as "they are deſirous of change, tho' they know "not what.

"It is true, that we have ever profeſſed, and in "that

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

" that mind, with God's grace, we will live and " die, that we will labor by all means poſſible, " either by treaty or by force, to reſtore our chil- " dren to their ancient dignity and inheritance: " and whatſoever Chriſtian Princes or Potentates " will ſet themſelves againſt it, we will not ſpare " any lawful means to bring our ſo juſt and honor- " able purpoſe to a good end; neither ſhall the " match of our ſon, or any other worldly reſpect, " be prefered to this our reſolution: for, by our " credit and intervention with the King of Spain, " the archdücheſs and her huſband, now with " God, we preſerved the Lower Palatinate one " whole year from any farther conquering in it, " which in eight days ſpace, in that time might " have eaſily been ſwallowed up by Spinola's " army without any reſiſtance. And in no better " caſe was it now at our embaſſador the lord " Digby's coming thro' Heidelberg, if he had " not extraordinarily ſuccored it.

" But becauſe we conceive that ye couple this " war of the Palatinate with the cauſe of religion, " we muſt a little unfold your eyes herein.

" The begining of this miſerable war, which " hath ſet all Chriſtendom on fire, was not for " religion, but only cauſed by our ſon-in-law's " haſty and harſh reſolution, following evil counſel, " to take to himſelf the crown of Bohemia.

" And that this is true, himſelf wrote letters " unto us at that time, deſiring to give aſſurance " both to the French King, and ſtate of Venice, " that his accepting the crown of Bohemia had no " reference to the cauſe of religion, but only by " reaſon of his right of election, as he called it. " And we would be ſorry that ſuch aſperſion " ſhould come upon our religion, as to make it a " good pretext for dethroning Kings, and uſurping " their crowns; and we would be loth that our " people here ſhould be taught that ſtrange doctrine: " no, let us not ſo far wrong the Jeſuits, as to " rob them of their ſweet poſitions and practiſe in " that very point.

" And upon the other part, we aſſure our ſelf " ſo far of your charitable thoughts of us, that " we would never have conſtantly denied our ſon- " in-law both the title and aſſiſtance in that point, " if we had well been perſuaded of the juſtice of " his quarrel. But to conclude; this unjuſt uſur- " pation of the crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria " from the Emperor, hath given the Pope and all " that party too fair a ground, and opened them " too wide a gate for curbing and oppreſſing " many thouſands of our religion, in diverſe parts " of Chriſtendom.

" And whereas you excuſe your touching upon " the King of Spain, on occaſion of the incidents " by you repeated in that place, and yet affirm " that it is without any touch to his honor; we " cannot wonder enough that you are ſo forgetful " both of your words and writs: for in your for- " mer petition ye plainly affirm, that he affects " the temporal monarchy of the whole earth; than " which there can be no more malice uttered " againſt any great King, to make all other " Princes and Potentates both envy and hate him; " but, if ye liſt, it may eaſily be tried, whether " that ſpeech touched him in honor or not, if ye " ſhall aſk him the queſtion, whether he means to " aſſume to himſelf that title or no, for every " King can beſt judge of his own honor. We " omit the particular ejaculations of ſome foul- " mouthed orators in your houſe, againſt the honor " of that King's crown and ſtate.

" And touching your excuſe of not determining " any thing concerning the match of our deareſt " ſon, but only to tell your opinion, and lay it " down at our feet. Firſt, we deſire to know, " how you could have preſumed to determine in " that point, without commiting high-treaſon. " And next you cannot deny but your talking of " his match, after that manner, was a direct " breach of our commandment, and declaration " out of our own mouth, at the firſt ſeting down " of this parliament, where we plainly profeſſed, " that we were in treaty of this match with Spain; " and wiſhed you to have that confidence in our " religion and wiſdom, that we would ſo manage " it, as our religion ſhould receive no prejudice " by it: and the ſame we now repeat unto you, " profeſſing that we are ſo far ingaged in that " match, as we cannot in honor go back; except " the King of Spain perform not ſuch things as " we expect at his hands. And therefore we are " ſorry, that ye ſhould ſhew to have ſo great " diſtruſt in us, as to conceive that we ſhould be " cold in our religion; otherwiſe we cannot " imagine how our former public declaration " ſhould not have ſtoped your mouths in this " point.

JAMES I. AN' 1621.

" And as to your requeſt, that we would now " receive your former petition; we wonder what " could make you preſume that we would receive " it, whereas in our former letter we plainly de- " clared the contrary unto you.

" And therefore we have juſtly rejected that ſuit " of yours: for what have you left unattempted " in the higheſt points of Sovereignty, in that " petition of yours, except the ſtriking of coin? " For it contains the violation of leagues, the par- " ticular way how to govern a war, and the mar- " riage of our deareſt ſon, both negative, with " Spain, nay, with any other Popiſh Princeſs? " and alſo affirmatively, as to the matching with " one of our religion; which we confeſs is a ſtrain " beyond any providence or wiſdom God hath " given us, as things now ſtand.

" Theſe are unfit things to be handled in par- " liament, except your King ſhall require it of " you: for who can have wiſdom to judge of " things of that nature, but ſuch as are daily ac- " quainted with the particulars of treaties, and of " the variable and fixed connexion of affairs of " ſtate, together with the knowledge of the ſecret " ways, ends and intentions of Princes, in their " ſeveral negociations? Otherwiſe, a ſmall miſtak- " ing of matters of this nature may produce more " effects than can be imagined: and therefore, " Ne ſutor ultra crepidam." And beſide, the in- " termedling in parliament with matters of peace " or war, and marriage of our deareſt ſon, would " be ſuch a diminution to us, to our crown in " foreign countries, as would make any Prince " neglect to treat with us, either in matters of " peace or marriage, excepting they might be " aſſured by the aſſent of the parliament. And ſo " it proved not long ago with the King of France *; " who, upon a trick procuring his ſtates to diſſent " from ſome treaty which before he had made, " was after refuſed treating with any other Princes, " to his great reproach, unleſs he would firſt pro- " cure the aſſent of his eſtates to their propoſition. " And will you caſt your eyes upon the late times, " you ſhall find that the late Queen, of famous " memory, was humbly petitioned by a parliament " to be pleaſed to marry: but her anſwer was; " that ſhe liked their petition well, becauſe it was " ſimple, not limiting her to place or perſon, as " not befiting her liking to their fancies; and if " they had done otherwiſe, ſhe would have thought " it a high preſumption in them. Judge then " what we may do in ſuch a caſe, having made " our public declaration already (as we ſaid before) " directly contrary to that which you have now " petitioned.

* K. Francis I, on receding from his agreement ſettled with Charles V, the Emperor.

" Now

James I. An' 1621.

" Now to the points in your petition, whereof " you deſire an anſwer, as properly belonging to " the parliament: the firſt and greateſt point is " that of religion; concerning which, at this " time, we can give you no other anſwer than in " general; which is, that you may reſt ſecure, " that we will never be weary to do all we can " for the propogation of our religion, and re- " preſſing Popery: but the manner and form you " muſt remit to our care and providence, who can " beſt conſider of times and ſeaſons, not by un- " dertaking a public war of religion thro' all the " world at once, which how hard and dangerous " a taſk it may prove, you may judge; but this " puts us in mind, how all the world complained, " laſt year, of plenty of corn; and God ſent us a " cooling-card this year for that heat: and ſo we " pray God, that this deſire among you of kindling " wars (ſhewing your wearineſs of peace and plenty) " may not make God permit us to fall into the " miſeries of both. But as we already ſaid, our " care of religion muſt be ſuch, as on the one part " we muſt not, by the hot perſecution of our recu- " ſants at home, irritate foreign Princes of con- " trary religion, and teach them the way to plague " the Proteſtants in their dominions, with whom " we daily intercede, and at this time principally, " for eaſe to thoſe of our profeſſion who live under " them; yet upon the other part, we never mean " to ſpare from due and ſevere puniſhment any " Papiſt who will grow inſolent for living under " our ſo mild government. And you may alſo " be aſſured, we will leave no care untaken, as " well for the education of youth at home, eſpe- " cially the children of Papiſts, as alſo for pre- " ſerving at all times hereafter ſuch youth as are or " ſhall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous " places, and ſo poiſoned in Popiſh ſeminaries. " And as in this point, namely, the good educa- " tion of Popiſh youth at home, we have already " given ſome good proofs, both in this kingdom " and in Ireland, ſo will we be well pleaſed to " paſs any good laws which ſhall be made, either " now or at any time hereafter, to this purpoſe.

" And as to your requeſt of making this a " ſeſſion, and granting a general pardon; it ſhall " be in your defaults, if we make not this a " ſeſſion before Chriſtmaſs.

" But for the pardon, ye crave ſuch particulars " in it as we muſt be well adviſed upon, leſt " otherwiſe we give you back the double or " treble of that we are to receive by your intire " ſubſidy, without fifteens. But the ordinary " courſe we hold fiteſt to be uſed ſtill in this caſe, " is, that we ſhould of our free grace ſend you " down a pardon from the higher houſe, con- " taining ſuch points as we ſhall think propereſt, " wherein we hope ye ſhall receive good ſatiſ- " faction.

" But we cannot omit to ſhew you, how ſtrange " we think it, that ye ſhould make ſo bad and " unjuſt a commentary upon ſome words of our " former letter, as if we meaned to reſtrain you " thereby of your ancient privileges and liberties " in parliament. Truly, a ſcholar would be " aſhamed ſo to miſplace and misjudge any ſen- " tences in another man's book. Dated at New-market the eleventh day of December, 1621 (2).

This concluſion of King James's anſwer was ſo clear, as not to require any explication. He had contented himſelf hitherto with inſinuating certain principles, the conſequences whereof he had carefully concealed, and thereby ſeemed to reſerve to himſelf the power either of admiting theſe conſequences in their utmoſt extent, or with reſtrictions, or of denying them according as occaſion ſhould offer. But now, whether he gave way to his paſſion, or was at length glad he had opportunity of delivering his ſentiments freely, and being no longer under the conſtraint of uſing ambiguous terms, very frequently pretended not to be underſtood, he put the commons under a neceſſity either of granting his pretenſions, or oppoſing them openly. But, if I may preſume ſo to expreſs myſelf, he was guilty of a moſt inexcuſable error, in not diſſolving the parliament, before the commons had time to debate upon his anſwer: he would thereby have eſtabliſhed his pretenſions without incuring ſuch a mortification as a bare-faced public oppoſition, which, had he not been wilfully blind, he muſt have expected. The commons, having peruſed his reply, the conſequences whereof they plainly perceived, and knowing the parliament was going to be diſſolved or prorogued, drew up the following proteſtation:

" THE commons now aſſembled in parliament, " being juſtly occaſioned thereunto, concern- " ing ſundry liberties, franchiſes, and privileges of " parliament, among others here mentioned, do " make

James, hearing of this proteſtation, called a council, and repairing thither gave orders for what is contained in the ſubſequent memorial.

Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1621.

James eraſes this proteſtation from the journal-book. Ruſhworth, p. 53.

" HIS moſt excellent Majeſty coming this day
" to the council, the Prince his Highneſs,
" and all the lords, and others of his Majeſty's
" privy-council ſiting about him, and all the judges
" then in London, which were ſix in number,
" there attending upon his Majeſty; the clerk of " the commons houſe of parliament was called for,
" and commanded to produce his journal-book,
" wherein was noted, and entries made of moſt
" paſſages which were in the commons houſe of " parliament; and among other things, there was " written down the form of a proteſtation, con" cerning ſundry liberties, privileges, and fran-
" chiſes of parliament; with which form of pro-
" teſtation his Majeſty was juſtly offended. Ne-
" vertheleſs, his Majeſty, in a moſt gracious man" ner, there expreſſed, that he never meaned to " deny that houſe of commons any lawful privi-
" leges they ever had injoyed; but whatſoever pri" vileges or liberties they had by any law or ſta-
" tute, the ſame ſhould be inviolably preſerved
" unto them; and whatſoever privileges they in-
" joy by cuſtom, or uncontrouled and lawful pre" cedent, his Majeſty would be careful to preſerve.
" But this proteſtation of the commons houſe ſo
" contrived and carried as it was, his Majeſty
" thought fit to be razed out of all memorials,
" and utterly to be annihilated, both in reſpect of
" the manner by which it was gained, and the " matter therein contained. For the manner of " geting it, firſt in reſpect of the time: for, after
" ſuch time as his Majeſty, out of his princely
" grace, and to take away all miſtakings, had di" rected his letter to ſecretary Calvert, dated at
" Royſton, 16 Decembris, and therein had ſo
" explained himſelf in the point of maintaining the " privileges of the houſe of commons, as that moſt
" of the ſaid houſe reſted fully ſatisfied, and freed
" from any ſcruple of having their liberties im-
" peached; and after that, by his Majeſty's letters,
" directed to the ſpeaker, dated eighteenth Decem" ber, being Tueſday, his Majeſty, at the humble
" ſuit of the houſe of commons, condeſcended to " make this meeting a ſeſſion before Chriſtmaſs,
" and for that purpoſe had aſſigned Saturday fol" lowing. Now upon this very Tueſday, and " while the meſſengers from the houſe of commons
" were with his Majeſty at Theobalds, to return
" thanks unto his Majeſty, and therewith an ex-
" cuſe from them not to make it a ſeſſion, in re-

" at their deſires, and thereupon gave orders for
" the adjournment of the parliament until the " eighth of February next, which was the firſt day
" formerly appointed by his Majeſty for the meet" ing together of the parliament: and while their " meſſengers were with his Majeſty, and had re" ceived a gracious anſwer to return unto their " houſes; even that afternoon, a commitee was " procured to be made for taking their liberties
" into conſideration; and this afternoon a proteſta-
" tion was made (to whom appears not) concerning " their liberties; and at ſix o'clock at night, by " candle-light, the ſame proteſtation was brought " into the houſe by the commitee, and that time of " night it was called upon to be put to the queſtion,
" there not being the third part of the houſe
" then preſent; whereas in all matters of weight
" their uſual cuſtom is, to put nothing of import" ance to the queſtion 'till the houſe be full: and
" at this time many of them who were preſent ex" pected the queſtion would have been defered to " another day, and a fuller houſe; and ſome then
" preſent ſtood up to have ſpoken to it, but could " not be ſeen or heard in that darkneſs and con-
" fuſion. Now for the matter of the proteſtation,
" it is penned in ſuch ambiguous and general words,
" as may ſerve for future times to invade moſt of " the rights and prerogatives annexed to the impe" rial crown; the claim of ſome privileges being " grounded upon the words of the writ for aſſem-
" bling the parliament, wherein ſome words, viz.
" Arduis Regni, are cunningly mentioned; but the " word " quibuſdam", which reſtraineth the gene-
" rality to ſuch particular caſes, as his Majeſty
" pleaſeth to conſult with them upon, is purpoſely
" omited (1).

" Theſe things conſidered, his Majeſty did, this " preſent day, in full aſſembly of his council, and
" in preſenſe of the judges, declare the ſaid pro-
" teſtation to be invalid, annulled, void, and of " no effect: and did farther, " manu ſuâ propriâ,"
" take the ſaid proteſtation out of the journal-book
" of the clerk of the commons houſe of parliament,
" and commanded an act of council to be made
" thereupon, and this act to be entered in the re-
" giſter of council cauſes."

James I. An' 1621.

Six days after, James did by proclamation diſſolve the parliament, declaring he was not obliged to give account thereof to any, ſince diſſolving the parliament when he pleaſed was confeſſedly in his power. That he was however willing to inform the public, it was becauſe the commons took the liberty not only to treat of his high prerogatives which belonged not to them, but alſo to ſpeak diſ-reſpectfully of foreign Princes: that they buſied

(1) Formerly, parliaments ſat but a few days, and took into conſideration ſuch affairs only as the King had before ſet forth in the writs of ſummons. But this method being altered, parliaments were called without the occaſion of their meeting being known, and were not limited to the affairs mentioned by the Kings in their firſt ſpeeches; and this made their ſeſſion hold ſo ong. themſelves moſtly in diſputing about their privileges without regarding the public wants: that ſome ill-tempered ſpirits ſowed tares among the corn, and by their cunning deviſes had impoſed on him a neceſſity of diſcontinuing the preſent parliament, without puting it to the name or period of a ſeſſion. Then, he declared that, tho' the parliament was broken off, he intended to govern well, and ſhould gladly imbrace the firſt occaſion to call another at a proper ſeaſon.

Proclamation forbiding to ſpeak of ſtate-affairs. Wilſon, p. 748.

This proclamation was followed by another, forbiding, under ſevere penalties, to talk of ſtate-affairs, and charging the judges in their circuits, to put the laws in force againſt licencious tongues.

Several members impriſoned. Annals, p. 66. Wilſon. Coke, p. 121. Ruſhworth.

Not that this was the ſole effect of James's reſentment. Some of the commons, who had appeared moſt zealous to maintain the privileges of the houſe, as ſir Edward Coke (1), ſir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym and Mr. Mallery, were impriſoned. Alſo ſir Dudley Diggs, ſir Thomas Crew, ſir Nathaniel Rich, and ſir James Perrot, were ordered into Ireland, to execute a certain commiſſion, the King intending thereby to remove them from their homes, and puniſh them with a kind of exile. On the other hand, the earls of Oxford and Southampton were ſent to the Tower on ſome ſtudied pretenſe: but it was very manifeſtly on no other real account than for ſpeaking, in the upper houſe, ſomewhat too freely of his Majeſty's conduct.

Cauſe of the difference between King and commons.

'Till this laſt parliament the King and commons had only mutually tried each other, the one to extend his prerogative, the other to preſerve privileges which they deemed inconteſtible: but, on the preſent occaſion, both parties were under a neceſſity of declaring and acting openly. The King pretended, as appears by his anſwer to the commons petition, that their privileges having no other foundation than the conceſſions made by his royal predeceſſors, he had a right to revoke them on their giving juſt occaſion. The commons on their ſide, pretended, they injoyed theſe privileges by ancient and undoubted right, had received them by inheritance from their anceſtors, and the King had no power to take them away. I paſs over in ſilence the conſequences which may be drawn from both theſe principles, if carried as far as the general terms will allow: they are obvious to the meaneſt capacity. I beg leave, not to determine ſo difficult a point, but only to make ſome remarks, which, I hope, will be of uſe to the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Remarks on this difference.

Firſt, it is in my opinion extremely difficult, and perhaps impoſſible, to eſtabliſh upon fixed principles as well the royal prerogatives of the Kings of England, as the privileges of parliament, and of the houſe of commons in particular. We muſt except ſuch as are allowed on both ſides, ſince this mutual conſent is of no leſs force than a law. Cuſtom therefore and precedent are the only foundation whereon to eſtabliſh their reſpective rights.

The Anglo-Saxons, who conquered Britain, had no Kings in thoſe parts of Germany where they inhabited before their paſſing over to England. Their government was ariſtocratical. Seven of their chiefs, by whom Britain was conquered, aſſumed the title of Kings, which was never before in uſe among them.

It muſt be obſerved, as a very neceſſary point, that the dominion of theſe new Kings did not properly extend over the vanquiſhed people, viz. the Britons, of whom the majority were driven into Wales and Cornwal, but over the conquerors themſelves, among whom the ſubdued country was divided. Hence it is evident that the right of conqueſt, which might be alledged in favor of the firſt Kings and their ſucceſſors, is wholly excluded.

James I. An' 1621.

It is very probable, not to ſay certain, that the parliament of England is as ancient as the monarchy, tho' ſome diſpute it, but in my opinion without much foundation (2); at leaſt, the time cannot be aſcertained when parliaments firſt commenced: but it is very difficult to prove the commons were ſummoned to parliament, and there voted.

On the other hand, it cannot be doubted theſe firſt Kings had great prerogatives, which were much augmented by their ſucceſſors: but I believe it may be taken for granted that, in general, neither the King's prerogatives, nor the peoples privileges, owe their origin to the laws; conſequently, they can neither be limited nor extended but as warranted by examples and precedents. Now theſe precedents are ſo contrary one to another, that there is no forming any fixed and certain rules: and what cauſes moſt difficulty in this matter, is the ambiguity of the terms, and firſt, in the word parliament.

If parliaments are conſidered as bodies compoſed of King and two houſes, we may without ſcruple aſcribe thereto a power unlimited, with reſpect to the kingdom's affairs: but if we ſuppoſe a parliament to conſiſt only of the two houſes without the Sovereign, we cannot deny its rights to be limited. The two houſes are properly the whole nation, excluſive of the King. They have their privileges; but it belongs not to them to extend them as they pleaſe: to effect this the King's conſent is neceſſary. This is ſtill abundantly more certain when one of the houſes acts alone, without the other's concurrence: for then it repreſents but part of the nation, who cannot legally claim any other rights than thoſe which are granted either by ſome law, or by the tacit conſent of the King and the other houſe. Very true it is that, to each of the two houſes belong ſeparate rights and privileges; and that the two houſes together, tho' ſeparated from the King, have alſo their privileges: but the queſtion is to know, how far they reach, and whether the Sovereign alone ought to be arbiter.

The term prerogative royal is liable to no leſs ambiguity than the word parliament. It is a looſe and general term, which gives only a very confuſed idea of the thing ſignified. If it is a right common to all who bear the title of King, the prerogative royal muſt be the ſame every where, and the Kings of England and Poland will be as abſolute as the King of Perſia. If it has bounds, by whom were they ſet? Or, what are the bounds which it cannot exceed? I believe it is no leſs difficult to reſolve theſe queſtions, than thoſe concerning parliamentary privileges. But as the prerogative royal includes many particular rights, let us examin, for inſtance, the power challenged by James of revoking the houſe of commons privileges. From whence had he this particular prerogative? Was it a right common to all Kings? But there are in the world kingdoms without parliaments or a houſe of commons. Was this prerogative as ancient as the Engliſh monarchy? But he himſelf would not grant the houſe of commons to be ſo ancient. Was it from ſome law? But he produced none. Was it by a tacit conſent, or by uſurpation? But the thing had never happened before. Was it, in fine, upon this general maxim, that whatever is granted by one King may be revoked by another? But, beſide that this is no inconteſtible principle, eſpecially after many centuries of uninterrupted poſſeſſion, his Majeſty would have been ſtrangely puzzled to name thoſe Kings who had granted the commons their privileges. Thus King James ſuppoſed, that the prerogative was a thing fixed, indiſputable, known to all the world, tho' nothing was more indeterminate, or of leſs known limits and extent.

Let us now conſider what were thoſe rights, liberties and privileges claimed by the commons as their ancient and indubitable birth-right and inheritance. Theſe are all uncertain and general terms, of which we cannot have a clear and diſtinct idea, without applying them to particular caſes. But what was ſaid concerning the royal prerogative, may be applied here. How came the commons by theſe rights? How far did they reach? Where were their bounds? This would be very difficult to fix. James perhaps went too far, when he would have intirely deprived the commons of the right of repreſenting to him the nation's grievances, and of the liberty to debate, reaſon, and ſay in the houſe what was thought proper. But if, under color of theſe rights, the commons would take upon them to adviſe the King upon all occaſions, and ſpeak injuriouſly of his Majeſty in their houſe, upon what would they ground ſuch privileges?

Since therefore it is ſo difficult to decide theſe queſtions concerning the prerogative royal, and the privileges of both houſes, or of each in particular, prudence and good policy require, that Kings and parliaments avoid as a rock the ingaging in ſuch diſputes. Accordingly, we may in peruſing this hiſtory have obſerved that the wiſeſt, the moſt illuſtrious Kings, thoſe whoſe merit is moſt univerſally acknowledged, as Edward I, Edward III, Henry V, Edward IV, Henry VIII, Elizabeth, never had any conteſts of this nature with their parliaments. On the contrary, thoſe who were leaſt eminent for their prudence and capacity, ſuch as Henry III, Edward II, Richard II, were ruined for ſtarting ſuch arguments. James is the firſt, who in thoſe later days ingaged in this quarrel. He was followed by his ſon and grandſons, and theſe Princes, very far from ſucceeding in their projects, only rendered themſelves extremely unhappy. A wiſe and prudent King of England, who knows his own intereſt, will never quarrel with his parliament; and a parliament, whoſe ſole view is the kingdom's welfare, will take care never to call in queſtion the King's juſt prerogative: nay, they will rather chuſe to ſee it ſomewhat too far ſtretched than run the riſque of breaking a union, which is the ſole foundation of public happineſs. I hope I ſhall be forgiven this digreſſion, which to me ſeems of uſe to inform the reader, and help him to judge impartially of the differences which gave birth in this, and produced ſo many calamities in the inſuing reign.

Ill conſequences of diſſolving the parliament.

The diſſolution of this parliament, and the little likelihood of James's ever calling another, could not but be attended with ill conſequences. The King forfeited, by this proceeding, not only the love and eſteem of great part of his ſubjects, but alſo the regard of foreigners. When he was thus imbroiled with his people, it was univerſally concluded he could be no longer either a friend to be relied on, or a foe to be dreaded. On the other hand, the nation could not without terror reflect that they were on the point of being expoſed to a deſpotic power, ſince they were not to have any more parliaments to keep within due bounds the prerogative royal. But the worſt effect produced by this rupture between King and parliament, was the diviſion among the ſubjects, who continually joined with the two oppoſite parties, which ſubſiſt to this day, with ſome difference, under the denominations of Whigs and Tories.

James I. An' 1621.

Theſe two parties which began to be formed, were at firſt contented with mutual diſputes in defenſe of the King's or the peoples rights, relating to what had occaſioned this parliament's diſſolution. The Royaliſts ſaid, the commons aimed at converting the Engliſh monarchy to a republic: that their meddling with ſtate-affairs, and adviſing his Majeſty how he ſhould manage the kingdom and his own family, ſhewed they aſpired to no leſs than governing the ſtate, ſince they would never want pretenſes to give the King counſel; with which if he refuſed complying he would, on that very account, be deprived of the neceſſary aids for defenſe of the realm, and conſtrained to receive law from foreign Princes: that England was originally a monarchy, and had ever continued upon the ſame foot: but the foundations were going to be undermined, by making the King ſubject to the parliament: that at firſt only remonſtrances were made to the King; afterwards counſels were added; but theſe counſels would ſoon be converted into inſtructions, and thoſe inſtructions into orders and commands: in a word, if the commons were ſuffered to proceed, the King would quickly become a mere Doge: that the commons had the leſs right to pretend to the ſtate government, as the ſtate had ſubſiſted five hundred years without them, ſince it was about the end of Henry III's reign, and during the earl of Leiceſter's uſurpation, that the peoples repreſentatives were firſt admited into parliament. In ſhort, that it was very ſtrange that, under a monarchial government, the people, or their repreſentatives, ſhould tell the King how he was to govern his kingdom: that ſuppoſing the people had ſuch a right, it would be neceſſary to impart to them all the ſtate ſecrets, and conſult them about alliances and treaties, peace and war; but, as this had never been practiſed, it followed of courſe that the ſuppoſition was falſe, and the people were called to parliament only to ſupply the King's wants, and to ſettle taxes and impoſitions in a manner leaſt burdenſome to the ſubjects: that indeed, as to the laws concerning the ſtate's internal government, it was thought proper to inact them with conſent of the people who were to be ſubject to them, that they might be the better executed; but no conſequence could thence be drawn, either for foreign affairs, or for the execution of theſe laws which was left to the King alone, or for the kingdom's general government.

Reaſons alledged for and againſt the King.

The peoples favorers ſaid in their turn, that the King, not ſatisfied with England's being a monarchy, would make it a deſpotic monarchy: that he affected to confound the ſeveral kinds of monarchies, whereof ſome were more others leſs abſolute, in order to acknowledge but one ſort, to which he aſcribed power unlimited: that the Engliſh monarchy was not of this kind, but began with the parliament, which being as ancient as the royalty, formed, together with the Sovereign, that abſolute power which his Majeſty would aſſume to himſelf alone: that the parliament had their privileges, as the King had his, nor could be deprived of them, without deſtroying the nature and conſtitution of the Engliſh government: that the parliament repreſented the whole nation, who were as much or more concerned in the ſtate's welfare than was the King himſelf: that indeed, the King had his undoubted prerogatives; but they were intended for the welfare and preſervation of the ſtate, and not for its ruin: that, while he kept within theſe bounds, and acted only for the kingdom's benefit, he anſwered the end and intent of his prerogatives; but it was deſtroying the conſtitution to pretend, that his prerogative royal gave him power to ſubvert

vert the laws, to make alliances repugnant to the good of the realm, to render the nation contemptible in the eyes of foreigners, to expoſe religion to the danger of being ruined thro' exceſs of careleſſneſs and condeſcenſion for its enemies: that, in ſuch a caſe, as he ſwerved from the end and deſign of his prerogative, it was the peoples, or their repreſentatives buſineſs to ſhew him the inconveniences of his conduct, propound means to prevent them, and give him counſels proper for their cure: that if this were not ſo, it would follow the King would be abſolute and arbitrary; might ruin and deſtroy the kingdom at his pleaſure, trample upon the eſtabliſhed laws, oppreſs the ſubjects, take away their lives and fortune, which was directly contrary to the conſtitution of England: that, as to the reſt, it evidently appeared, the King was laboring to reduce the parliament's privileges to little or nothing. Does the parliament repreſent to him the peoples grievances? It may, ſays he, be thence infered, that the King governs ill, and this tends to alienate from him the love of his ſubjects. Is he deſired to put the laws againſt recuſants in execution? He anſwers, that affair muſt be left to his care; he knows what is proper to be done; he is an old experienced King, who has no need to be taught, and yet he is not ſeen to do the leaſt thing towards redreſſing the grievances complained of: do the commons repreſent to him, that the Prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta may be of very ill conſequence to religion? He replies, they have no buſineſs to meddle with his family-concerns: do they ſtrive to make him ſenſible, that the Proteſtant religion is in danger of being deſtroyed throughout Europe, for want of aſſiſtance, and that the King of Spain amuſes him with fair promiſes, while he is over-runing the Palatinate? He anſwers, theſe are matters of ſtate too high for the peoples repreſentatives, who have neither wiſdom nor capacity enough to comprehend the myſteries of government: "Ne ſutor ultra crepidam". In a word, he reduces the privileges of the commons to adviſing the King when he ſhall do them the honor to aſk it, and to ſupplying him with money when he demands it on any pretenſe, tho' the pretenſe be evidently falſe, ſince he will not ſuffer his reaſons to be examined. But this is not all. He plainly tells the commons, their privileges are only conceſſions of himſelf and predeceſſors, and intimates that they ſhall keep them no longer than their ſubmiſſion makes them worthy thereof. Is it poſſible, ſay they, to give plainer marks of a ſettled deſign to uſurp arbitrary power? Suppoſing the commons were not called to parliament 'till the reign of Henry III, which however cannot be proved, have they not ever ſince been a very eſſential part of parliament, and conſequently have they not undoubted right to all parliamentary privileges?

The Puritans for the people.

This is part of what was then urged on both ſides, and is what ſerved to cheriſh diviſion between the two parties, who have not ever ſince ceaſed reviling each other. It is eaſy to gueſs with which of theſe factions the Puritans joined themſelves. They loved not the King, who on his part diſcovered, on all occaſions, that he was their mortal enemy: but there were, as I have already obſerved, two ſorts of Puritans, viz. State-Puritans and Church-Puritans. Before King James declared himſelf ſo openly with reſpect to his prerogative royal, the State-Puritans were few, becauſe his Majeſty having not gone great lengths, his intention was yet only ſuſpected: but after the diſſolution of his third parliament, their number greatly increaſed, and the King, thro' a policy very deſtructive of his intereſts, always affected to confound theſe two ſorts of Puritans. He thereby forced them to make but one party, tho' they were united only in a ſingle point, viz. in oppoſing the court's maxims: ſo the Church-Puritans, who before made but a ſmall figure in the kingdom, ſuddenly formed a very conſiderable party by this junction of the State-Puritans. This party grew at length ſo powerful, that they overthrew the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, and the monarchy itſelf; but this happened not 'till the ſucceeding reign.

James I. An' 1622

On the other hand, the King's party was ſtrengthened by junction of the Arminians, who were very numerous. Arminius's doctrine had bred diſputes in England, tho' with leſs noiſe than in Holland. Many eccleſiaſtics had imbraced this doctrine, tho' condemned by the ſynod of Dort, whoſe authority they did not acknowledge, and notwithſtanding his Majeſty's open profeſſion to reject Arminius's tenets. Theſe men, improving this opportunity ariſing from the diſcord between the two parties, readily joined the Royaliſts, and from that time were as much careſſed at court as they were hated before. By this means, William Laud, a divinity doctor of great parts and learning, was qualified, tho' Arminian in principle, to be promoted to the See of St. David's by the intereſt of Buckingham, who deſired the biſhop of Lincoln (1) to recommend him to his Majeſty. It was however with ſome difficulty that James agreed to this preferment, being prejudiced againſt him on account of his proud and turbulent ſpirit. After the Arminians had liſted themſelves in the King's party, they were in the height of proſperity, favored by the courtiers, who were laboring to hinder the growth of Puritaniſm. On the other hand, the Papiſts alſo declared openly for the King, becauſe it was by abſolute power alone they could obtain their wiſhes, whereas parliaments were profeſſedly their enemies. Finally, moſt of the clergy ſided alſo with the King, looking on him as the only perſon capable of ſupporting them againſt attempts of the Puritans, whoſe number continually increaſed.

The Papiſts imbrace this party, as do likewiſe the clergy.

The two factions being thus compoſed of men of different kinds and ſentiments, mutually upbraided one another with what was moſt odious in each party. The Royaliſts confounded under the name of Puritans all who oppoſed the King, and the Puritans taxed all the Royaliſts with being Papiſts or Arminians.

This diviſion, which began to be remarkable in England, little helped to eſtabliſh King James's reputation abroad. It was now two years ſince his ſon-in-law's dominions were invaded by the Spaniard and duke of Bavaria, and he was not ſeen to take any effectual courſe for their recovery. Embaſſies and ſollicitations were the only arms he uſed for that purpoſe (2). The King of Spain had amuſed him four or five years with hopes of a marriage which advanced not, and by that means tied up his hands while he ſeized the Palatinate. In fine, when all Europe expected he would open his eyes to look towards his kingdom's his family's and his own intereſts, and take ſome vigorous reſolution, it was heard that he was irreconcileably at variance with his parliament. Hereupon he was deſpiſed abroad, and inſults ſoon followed contempt. In the Netherlands he was publicly ridiculed on their ſtages. Comedies were acted, with meſſengers haſtily bringing news that the Palatinate was juſt ready to be over-run by the numerous forces ſending thither by the King of Spain's enemies: the King of Denmark was to find a hundred thouſand pickled herrings; the Hollanders a hundred thouſand butter-boxes; and the King of England, a hundred thouſand embaſſadors. In one place, King James was pictured with a ſcabbard without a ſword; in another with a ſword which could not be drawn, tho' diverſe perſons ſtood pulling at it (1). In England itſelf the almoſt-forgot ſtory of David Rizzo was revived. But what gave moſt chagrin to that party who oppoſed the court, was to ſee Buckingham govern ſo abſolutely that James ſeemed to have made his favorite his maſter. None were advanced to poſts but Papiſts, Arminians, or ſuch as were preſumed to have little or no religion. In a word, at court ſuch only paſſed for Proteſtants as were for the royal prerogative in its utmoſt extent, be their creed what it would: all the reſt were Puritans. Abbot himſelf, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was reckoned among the Puritans, becauſe he approved not of the court-maxims. He had the misfortune, in 1622, to kill a man with an arrow as he was ſhooting at a buck; and this accident occaſioned his being deemed incapable of any longer performing the epiſcopal functions: wherefore he reſolved alſo to ſave himſelf the trouble of going to the council, where his advice was little regarded, as coming from a perſon of Puritan principles.

While peoples minds were in this ſort of fermentation, James wanted money. He was for ſending Digby to Spain, and Weſton to Bruſſels to finiſh at once the marriage and Palatinate affairs: beſide, Buckingham and his relations were a gulph which could not be filled. There was no probability of a new parliament, after the ſteps James had lately taken. Tho' a parliament could have been prevailed on to give the King money, it would not have been 'till after their privileges were ſecured at the expenſe of the prerogative royal, and James thought that remedy worſe than the diſeaſe. Recourſe muſt therefore be had to extraordinary methods. The ſureſt and moſt expeditious ſeemed to be the exacting from the people a contribution under the name of Benevolence. As the court very well knew that, except ſome compulſion was uſed, the peoples liberality would not go any great lengths, the judges were ordered in their circuits to demand a benevolence, and to intimate withal, that his Majeſty would not be ſatisfied with what ſhould be voluntarily offered, if it was not proportionable to the donor's abilities. To that purpoſe the council directed a circular letter to the judges, concluding with theſe words: "Nevertheleſs, if any perſon "ſhall, out of obſtinacy or diſaffection, refuſe to "contribute herein proportionably to their eſtates "and means, you are to certify their names unto "this board. And ſo recommending this ſervice "to your beſt care and indeavor, and praying "you to return unto us notes of the names of ſuch "as ſhall contribute, and of the ſums offered by "them." The excuſe for this levy of money was the King's pretended reſolution to recover the Palatinate by arms, after having in vain tried gentle means. It will hereafter appear how this reſolution was executed.

James's project was to conclude the Prince his ſon's marriage, and receive the dowry of two millions, before he demanded reſtitution of the Palatinate, for fear the Spaniard ſhould pretend that this reſtitution was to be in compenſation of the dowry: after that, he hoped the King of Spain, thro' friendſhip, and in conſideration of their alliance, would ſurrender the Lower Palatinate to his ſon-in-law, and oblige the Emperor and duke of Bavaria to reſtore him the Upper. This was all he intended to do for his daughter and ſon-in-law. That this was his deſign, manifeſtly appears in his inſtructions to lord Digby, before his departure for Spain, wherein he was expreſly ordered, "not to make the affair "of the Palatinate one of the marriage articles." James would however have the public believe, that his chief aim in the Spaniſh match was to procure his ſon-in-law reſtitution of the Palatinate. This doubtleſs was one of thoſe myſteries of ſtate which could not be comprehended by the commons. Perhaps he really hoped ſuch reſtitution would immediately follow upon the marriage: but this hope was founded on a very weak baſis. Very ſeemingly, it was Gondomar who inſpired him with this chimerical expectation.

JAMES I. AN' 1622.

His project.

However this be, James, being abſolutely fixed on this ſcheme, ſent Digby embaſſador-extraordinary to Spain, to conclude the marriage-treaty, jointly with ſir Walter Aſton, who had been ſome time at the court of Philip IV (2). The articles concerning religion were already ſettled, but the reſt were not to be talked of, 'till the Pope's diſpenſation was obtained, for fear of laboring to no purpoſe. This was one of the Spaniſh court's artifices to prolong the affair, and have time to complete conquering the Palatinate, while the diſpenſation was expected, which, in all appearance, his Catholic Majeſty might either haſten or delay, juſt as himſelf pleaſed. Mean while, the hope of a ſpeedy concluſion of this marriage, the two millions dowry, and reſtitution of the Palatinate ſo fettered James's hands that he durſt not move even a finger to offend the Spaniard, for fear of defeating ſo noble a project. Thus, whenever he talked of ingaging in a war to recover the Palatinate, it was always with this reſtriction, if he could not obtain it by fair means, becauſe he thought himſelf ſure of ſucceſs in his negociations. It is therefore certain that, when he demanded money of the parliament, or exacted a benevolence on the people, it was not with deſign to prepare for war, tho' that was the pretext, ſince a breach with the houſe of Auſtria was inconſiſtent with his project.

When Digby (who was this year created earl of Briſtol) ſet out for Spain, James cauſed Gage to ſet out for Rome, to ſollicit the diſpatch of the diſpenſation, without which his new embaſſador could not proceed at Madrid. But to render Gage's inſtances more effectual, it was requiſite his Holineſs ſhould be acquainted, that King James was no proſecutor of Catholics: not but that he had already given very convincing proofs; however he thought he ſhould, on this occaſion, give a ſtill ſtronger one, by releaſing all the impriſoned recuſants (3). This was done publicly and openly, by writs under the great-ſeal to the juſtices of aſſize, with a letter from the lord-keeper Williams, exhorting them punctually to obey the King's orders. These writs, contrary to law, to the commons remonstrance, and to James's own answer to their petition, occasioned many severe censures upon this Prince's procedure. As this affair made a noise among the people, the lord-keeper was ordered to vindicate his Majesty by a public writing. The said vindication is introduced with this noble comparison: "As the sun in "the firmament appears to us no bigger than a "platter, and the stars but as so many nails in the "pummel of a saddle, because of the inlargement "and disproportion between our eye and the object: "so is there such unmeasurable distance between "the deep resolution of a Prince, and the shallow "apprehensions of common and ordinary people, "that as they will ever be judging and censuring, "so they must needs be obnoxious to error and "mistaking." Then he gives two reasons, both very false, of this conduct. The first; that as his Majesty was now solliciting very zealously for some ease to all the Protestants in Europe, it would be unreasonable to execute, at the same time, the laws against the Roman Catholics. The second; that the English Jesuits had published a book, to excite the French King to execute, in his kingdom, against the Hugonots the same laws as those inacted in England against the Papists. But, added the bishop, "to conclude, from the favor done to the English "Papists, that the King favors the Romish re-"ligion, is a composition of folly and malice, "little deserved by a gracious Prince, who, by "word, writing, exercise of religion, and acts of "parliament hath demonstrated himself so resolved "a Protestant.

I observed that, about the close of last year, the Emperor sent to England count Schwartzemburg, to treat of the Palatinate affair. This embassador, being pompously received at London, as testifying his Imperial Majesty's regard for the King, could produce no powers when he was to discourse of business. It was the archduchess Isabella whom the Emperor had impowered to conclude the truce which King James required: wherefore there was a necessity of going to negociate at Brussels with her said Highness and the agents of some Protestant Princes. King James chose for this imploy sir Richard Weston, possibly, because he thought his religion would advance the negociation. But, to gain the Infanta's favor, he likewise made use of another means. He gave leave to lord Vaux, a Papist, to raise two thousand men (1) in England, to serve the Infanta against the United Provinces, and the Protestant Princes their allies. By such means as these did James hope to succeed in his negociations. We shall see presently the event; but it will be necessary first to mention what passed in Germany, during the year 1622.

The King of Bohemia, plainly perceiving his royal father-in-law used very ineffectual methods to restore him to his dominions, believed it advisable to try some other expedient. He was still master of Manheim, Heidelberg and Frankendal, and count Mansfeldt, tho' withdrawn into Alsatia, had it still in his power to re-enter the Lower Palatinate. In order to improve this latter remedy, he agreed with Prince Christian of Brunswic, administrator of the bishoprick of Halberstadt, who had accompanied him to the Hague, to raise forces in Westphalia, and join Mansfeldt. At the same time, he made a like agreement with the Prince of Baden-Durlach, who promised also to levy troops for the same purpose. Seemingly, the Hollanders supplied monies for these levies, on account of the advantage they should reap from this powerful diversion. These two Princes kept promise with his Bohemian Majesty, and each headed ten or twelve thousand men. The difficulty was how to enter the Lower Palatinate, where the Spaniards where very powerful. However, the matter not appearing quite impossible, the Prince of Brunswic took the field in Westphalia, and seized some places in the county of Marc. This drew upon him a detachment of the Spanish army from the Netherlands, under conduct of count Henry de Bergh, who was joined by the count of Anhalt with another detachment of the Bavarian army, commanded by count Tilly in the Palatinate. By this means, Prince Christian saw himself detained some time in Westphalia: but at length count Bergh being recalled, he was at liberty to advance. On the other hand, it was not easy for the Prince of Baden to enter the Palatinate, all its avenues being secured by count Tilly and Gonsalez de Cordoua.

Affairs of Bohemia. Hist. Reb. Boh. Coke. Wilson.

Mean while, the King of Bohemia departing privately from the Hague, on board a small vessel, and landing at Calais, traversed France and safely arrived at Mansfeldt's army, already advanced to Germersheim. Here they impatiently expected the approach of the two armies coming to their assistance. It would be needless to give a particular account of the march of these two armies, and the obstacles they met with from the Spaniards and Bavarians. It will suffice to say, the Prince of Baden was defeated the sixth of May: that afterwards the King of Bohemia and Mansfeldt marching to Prince Christian, met count Tilly, who put them to rout, and forced them to retire to Manheim. This battle was fought the twelfth of June. Eight days after, Tilly also attacked Prince Christian, who was advanced to the borders of the Palatinate, and tho' he gained over him some advantage, could not however prevent his passing to Manheim with good part of his forces.

Some time after, the Spaniards and Bavarians were so strongly recruited, that their army consisted of more than fifty thousand men, with which they almost surrounded their enemies, who lay incamped between Manheim and Heidelberg. Wherefore the King of Bohemia, despairing ever to recover what he had lost, returned to Holland. After his departure, the Prince of Brunswic and count Mansfeldt resolved to join Prince Maurice in the Netherlands, and march thro' Lorrain. As they were obliged to take a compass, Gonsalez de Cordoua, parting from Tilly, marched and expected them in Brabant, to obstruct their passage. The two armies meeting between Namur and Brussels, fought with equal success; but the Prince of Brunswic lost one of his arms by a cannot shot. After the battle, Mansfeldt pursued his march towards Holland.

During this interim count Tilly, having no enemy to oppose him in the Lower Palatinate, carried Heidelberg by storm (2), took Manheim by a long blocade, and then besieged Frankendal (3).

Heidelberg and Manheim taken, and Frankendal besieged.

While his Bohemian Majesty was in the Palatinate, conferences were held at Brussels, to procure a truce for that unhappy country, answerably to the King of England's desire, tho' he was not impowered by the King his son-in-law, for whom, at this juncture, a truce was not convenient. Immediately in this negociation occurred two difficulties which ſerved to prolong it. The firſt was, the Engliſh embaſſador had not ſufficient powers from the King of Bohemia and his allies: James had doubtleſs imagined that, ſince this truce was negociating on his account, it ſufficed to treat with him; but the Spaniards gave to underſtand, they could treat only with the principal parties: they muſt therefore neceſſarily ſend to the Palatinate for full powers from the King of Bohemia, who was not in haſte to diſpatch them while he had any hope of ſucceeding in his enterpriſe; but at laſt ſending theſe powers when he ſaw his affairs declining, another difficulty of the ſame nature occurred at Bruſſels. The archdutcheſs had no other power than the Emperor's bare letter, deſiring her to conſult with the Engliſh embaſſador concerning a truce for the Lower Palatinate (1). From that time the King of Bohemia's affairs daily growing worſe, the archdutcheſs and count Schwartzemburg prolonged the affair on diverſe pretenſes, 'till Heidelberg was taken, and Manheim cloſely blocaded. Then James wrote to the King of Spain, deſiring him to order that the Palatinate affairs might remain in their preſent ſtate, 'till the truce was concluded and the blocade of Manheim raiſed. Philip feigned to have for him this condeſcenſion; but before his letter to the archdutcheſs was received, Manheim was taken: nay, it hindered not count Tilly from beſieging Frankendal, which he would have alſo taken without ſcruple, had not the overflowing of diverſe rivers forced him to remove. Thus was James amuſed with vain hopes, while the conqueſt of the Palatinate was completing. He at length perceived it, but at the ſame time was told, the Prince his ſon's marriage was ſo near a concluſion that he could not think of hazarding a miſcarriage in that affair, by inſiſting too ſtrenuouſly on reſtitution of the elector's dominions. This may be clearly ſeen in his letters to the earl of Briſtol, his embaſſador in Spain, wherefrom I ſhall here give ſome extracts.

His letters to the earl of Briſtol. Wilſon. Ruſhworth, p. 68.

"YOUR diſpatch of the ninth of Auguſt gave us ſo much contentment, and ſo great hopes of ſatisfaction in all thoſe buſineſſes, which you have there to treat with that King, as we could not expect any farther difficulties; notwithſtanding, by that which has come to our hands immediately after, as well by George Gage from Rome, as by our embaſſador, ſir Richard Weſton, at Bruſſels, and our miniſters in the Palatinate; we find that neither the diſpenſation is granted for the match, nor the treaty of ceſſation ſo near a concluſion as we conceived it would have been, now that the auxiliaries, and all other obſtacles are removed. But on the contrary ſide, that new delays and excuſes are invented, our gariſons in the Palatinate in the mean time blocked up, Heidelberg itſelf actually beſieged.----.

"Therefore our pleaſure is, that you ſhall immediately, and with as much ſpeed as you may, crave audience of that King, and repreſent unto him the merit which we may juſtly challenge unto our ſelf, for our ſincere proceedings, with the Emperor and him, in all the courſe of this buſineſs, notwithſtanding the many invitations and temptations which we have had to ingage our ſelf on our ſon-in-law's part. That we have had, both from the Emperor and him, hopes given us from time to time of extraordinary reſpect, howſoever our ſon-in-law had deſerved, which we have attended and expected even to the very laſt, with much patience, and in deſpight (as it were) of all the oppoſition that hath been made to ſhake our reſolution in that behalf. If now, when all impediments are removed, and that the way is ſo prepared that as the Emperor may give an end unto the war, and make ſome preſent demonſtration of his reſpects towards us, in leaving us the honor of holding thoſe poor places, which yet remain, quietly and peaceably, until the general accommodation, the ſame ſhall nevertheleſs be violently taken from us, what can we look for, when the whole ſhall be in his hands and poſſeſſion? who amuſing us with a treaty of ceſſation, and protracting it induſtriouſly (as we have reaſon to believe) doth in the mean time ſeize himſelf of the whole country; which being done, our embaſſador ſhall return with ſcorn, and we remain with diſhonor.

James I. An' 1622.

"I ſhall not need to furniſh you with arguments for the unfolding and laying open this unfriendly dealing more plainly unto them; your own reaſon and obſervation will find enough out of the diſpatches, whereof copies are ſent unto you; as namely, the withdrawing the Spaniſh forces, and leaving the buſineſs wholly in the hands of the Emperor and duke of Bavaria; the ſtile of the Infanta, in anſwering our embaſſador with recriminations, which was not her manner heretofore; the ſlight and frivolous anſwer given by marquis Bedmar unto our embaſſador, when he acquainted him with the ſiege of Heidelberg; the quarrellous occaſion taken by the Emperor for calling the diet at Ratiſbon, contrary to his own promiſe, which, in his diſpatch to us, he confeſſeth to have broken, as you will ſee by the copy: all which, and many more, which your own judgment (in the peruſal of the diſpatches) will ſuggeſt unto you, do miniſter unto us cauſe ſufficient of jealouſy on the Emperor's part, as you ſhall plainly tell that King; altho' we will not do him that wrong as to miſtruſt that he gives the leaſt conſent to it. In this confidence, with much earneſtneſs, we ſhall ſtill ſollicit him, that for the affection he beareth us, and the deſire which we ſuppoſe he hath that there may continue for ever a perfect amity betwixt us and the whole houſe of Auſtria, he will not ceaſe to do all good offices herein; leting him know directly, that in theſe terms we cannot ſtand with the Emperor; but that if Heidelberg be won, or the ſiege continue, or the ceſſation be long unneceſſarily delayed, we muſt recall our embaſſador from Bruſſels, and treat no more, as we have already given order; hoping, that whatſoever unkindneſs we ſhall conceive againſt the Emperor upon theſe occaſions, it ſhall not be interpreted to reflect in any ſort upon the intire affection that is at this preſent, and as we hope ſhall always continue, betwixt us and the crown of Spain. And therefore, as we have heretofore ſundry times promiſed, in teſtimony of the ſincerity of our proceedings, and of our great deſire to preſerve the amity inviolable between us and the whole houſe of Auſtria, that, in caſe our ſon-in-law would not be governed by us, that then we would not only forſake him, but take part and join our forces with the Emperor againſt him; ſo you may fairly repreſent unto that King, that in like manner we have reaſon to expect the ſame meaſure from him, that (upon the Emperor's averſeneſs to a ceſſation and accommodation) he will likewiſe actually aſſiſt us for the re-

Notwithſtanding all this, Heidelberg and Manheim were taken by the Emperor's forces, and Frankendal beſieged.

Wilſon. p. 756.

In another letter to the ſame embaſſador, dated October 3, King James ſaid, " That while he was " amuſed with treaties at Madrid and Bruſſels, " Heidelberg had been taken by force, the Engliſh " gariſons put to the ſword, and Manheim be- " ſieged: that the Infanta (having an abſolute com- " miſſion to conclude a ceſſation and ſuſpenſion of " arms) when all objections were anſwered, did not " only delay the concluſion of the treaty, but " refuſe to lay her command upon the Emperor's " generals to abſtain from the ſiege of his gariſons " during the treaty, upon a pretext of want of au- " thority. And therefore, for avoiding farther " diſhonor, he had been forced to recall both his " embaſſadors, as alſo lord Chicheſter, whom he " intended to have ſent unto the Emperor to the " diet at Ratiſbon." After which he added:

" Seeing therefore that, merely out of our extra- " ordinary reſpect to the King of Spain, and the " firm confidence we ever put in the hopes and pro- " miſes which he did give us (deſiring nothing " more than for his cauſe principally to avoid all " occaſions that might put us in ill underſtanding " with any of the houſe of Auſtria) we have hither- " to proceeded with a ſtedfaſt patience: truſting to " the treaties, and neglecting all other means, which " probably might have ſecured the remainder of " our childrens inheritance, and by this confidence " and ſecurity of ours, are now expoſed to diſho- " nor and reproach. You ſhall tell that King, that " ſeeing all thoſe indeavors and good offices which " he hath uſed towards the Emperor in this buſi- " neſs, on the behalf of our ſon-in-law, have not " ſorted to any other iſſue, than to a plain abuſe " both of his truſt and ours; we hope and deſire, " that he will faithfully promiſe and undertake " upon his honor (confirming the ſame alſo under " his hand and ſeal) either that the town and caſtle " of Heidelberg ſhall, within threeſcore and ten " days after your audience and demand made, be " rendered into our hands, with all things thereto " belonging; and the like for Manheim and Fran- " kendal, if both or either of them ſhall be taken " by the enemy while thoſe things are in treaty: as " alſo that there ſhall be, within the ſaid term of " ſeventy days, a ceſſation and ſuſpenſion of arms in " the Palatinate for the future, upon the ſeveral ar- " ticles and conditions laſt propounded by our em- " baſſador ſir Richard Weſton; and that the gene- " ral treaty ſhall be ſet on foot again: or elſe, in " caſe all theſe particulars be not yielded unto, " and performed by the Emperor, that the King " of Spain do join his forces with ours: or if ſo be " his forces be otherwiſe imployed, yet that at the " laſt he will permit us a free and friendly paſſage " thro' his territories and dominions, for ſuch forces " as we ſhall ſend and imploy in Germany for his " ſervice. Of all which, if you receive not from " the King of Spain (within ten days at the far- " theſt after your audience) a direct aſſurance un- " der his hand and ſeal without delay, that then " you take your leave, and return to our preſenſe, " without farther ſtay; otherwiſe to proceed in the " negociation for the marriage of our ſon, accord- " ing to the inſtructions we have given you.

James I. An' 1622.

This letter evidently ſhews King James's being convinced of his having hitherto been only amuſed: nevertheleſs he next day wrote thus to the earl of Briſtol; " Tho' you have order to come away " without farther delay, in caſe you receive not " ſatisfaction to your demands from the King of " Spain; yet we would not have you inſtantly " come away upon it but advertiſe us firſt, leting " us know privately (if you find ſuch cauſe) that " there is no good to be done, nor ſatisfaction, as " you judge, intended us (tho' publicly and out- " wardly you give out to the contrary) that we may " make uſe thereof with our people in parliament, " as we ſhall hold beſt for our ſervice."

Wilſon, P. 757.

All this manifeſts how much James was miſtaken in expecting to adjuſt his ſon-in-law's affairs by the method he had purſued, and how he had been impoſed on in his ſeveral negociations, and whereof he was very ſenſible: and yet all the vengeance he took was to recall his embaſſador from Bruſſels. It is true, he ſeemed determined on being revenged by arms: but he would have the King of Spain join with him, to oblige the Emperor and duke of Bavaria to reſtore a country which he had himſelf delivered to them; at leaſt, he expected that his Catholic Majeſty ſhould grant him a paſſage thro' his territories; all projects as chimerical as that of recovering the Palatinate by fair means and ſollicitations alone. In fine, it is from theſe letters very obvious, that James made the reſtitution of the Palatinate and concluſion of the marriage two diſtinct affairs, and did not conſider the laſt as dependent of the other. Indeed, tho' there was manifeſtly a colluſion between the Emperor, Philip IV, and the Infanta, James ordered his embaſſador to do nothing offenſive to the King of Spain, for fear of prejudicing the marriage, which he was always made to regard as on the very point of accompliſhing.

James's wrong meaſures.

At length, after a tedious expectation, Gage was ſent back from Rome, where he had been ſolliciting the diſpenſation, with nineteen articles, to each of which the Pope had put a poſtil, after the manner practiſed in the capitulations of places. According to appearances, the ſenſe of the three material articles, which were agreed on, was expatiated, and therefrom the nineteen following ones were formed by common conſent.

The marriage articles, with the Pope's anſwers. Du Cheſne. p. 1160.

I. That the Pope's diſpenſation ſhall be firſt obtained at the ſole inſtance of his Catholic Majeſty.

" Note. The two parties are agreed on this " point.

II. That the marriage ſhall be celebrated in Spain according to the rites practiſed in the church of Rome; and afterwards in England, with ſuch ceremonies as ſhall tend moſt to the King of Great Britain's advantage; yet ſo, as that nothing be done contrary to the religion profeſſed by the moſt excellent Infanta. But as to this point, they ſhall agree about the ceremonies to be performed in both kingdoms.

" Note. The marriage ought to be celebrated " but once in Spain, and if any ceremony is to be " performed in England, notice muſt be previouſly " given, and this ceremony be agreed on.

III. That the moſt gracious Infanta ſhall have free exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion.

" Note. This article is granted.

IV. That all the domeſtics and ſervants belonging to the moſt gracious Infanta, ſhall be appointed Note. " Granted.

V. That the moſt gracious Infanta ſhall have an oratory, where divine ſervice ſhall be celebrated in ſuch manner as ſhe ſhall appoint.

VI. That this oratory ſhall be in her palace, and there maſſes to be celebrated at the Infanta's pleaſure.

Note. " A church ſhall be builded in London, " beſide that in the palace, and divine ſervice ſhall " be celebrated in each, and the word of God " preached, and the ſacraments adminiſtered.

VII. That all the officers and domeſtics belonging to the Infanta, of what degree ſoever, as alſo her ſervants and family, may be freely and publicly Catholics; which is ſo to be underſtood, as that each of them in particular ſhall be obliged to profeſs the Roman Catholic religion.

Note. " The men and women ſervants of the " moſt ſerene Infanta, their children and poſterity, " with their whole families, what office ſoever " they bear, ſhall have the free exerciſe of the " Catholic religion.

VIII. That the exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion ſhall be in form following: the moſt gracious Infanta ſhall have in her palace a chapel ſo ſpacious that her ſervants and family may enter and ſtay therein; in which there ſhall be a public and ordinary door for them, and another inward door by which the Infanta may have a paſſage into the chapel, where ſhe and others may be preſent at divine offices.

Note. " All the ſervants muſt conform to this.

IX. That the chapel may be beautified with decent ornaments, and other things neceſſary for divine ſervice, according the cuſtom of the holy Roman church; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſervants and others to go to the ſaid chapel at all hours.

Note. " Granted.

X. That the keeper and guardians of the chapel ſhall be appointed by the lady Infanta, and they ſhall take care no body may enter into it to do any indecent thing.

Note, " The keeper and guardians of the chapel " and church ſhall be Spaniards.

XI. That to ſerve in the chapel, there ſhall be a convenient number of Prieſts, as to the Infanta ſhall ſeem fit: and if any of them be natives of Great Britain, they ſhall not be admited to ſerve, without her conſent firſt obtained.

Note. " His Holineſs wills and means that this " be a true church.

Note. " He muſt be a biſhop.

XIV. That it may be lawful for the lady Infanta to procure from Rome indulgences and jubilees, and all graces, as ſhall ſeem expedient to her.

Note. " This article is granted.

XV. That the ſervants and family of the lady Infanta ſhall take the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain; provided there be no clauſe therein contrary to their conſciences and the Roman Catholic religion, and that the form of the oath be firſt approved.

Note. " The men and women ſervants ſhall be " Spaniards.

XVI. That the laws made againſt the Roman Catholic religion in England, ſhall not extend to the ſervants of the moſt gracious Infanta; but they ſhall be exempt from the ſaid laws, and the penalties annexed, and of this a declaration ſhall be made.

JAMES I. AN' 1622.

Note. " The laws already made, or to be made, " in England concerning religion ſhall not extend " to the ſervants, who ſhall be exempted from them " as well as from the penalties, &c. and for this " reaſon the eccleſiaſtics ſhall not be liable to any " but their eccleſiaſtical laws.

XVII. That the children of the moſt illuſtrious Prince, and the moſt gracious Infanta, ſhall not be conſtrained in point of conſcience, and in that caſe, the laws made againſt Catholics in England ſhall not extend to them; and tho' any of them be Catholics they ſhall not loſe the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdom and dominions of Great Britain.

Note. " This article is granted by his Holineſs.

XVIII. That the nurſes which ſhall give ſuck to the children of the lady Infanta, ſhall be choſen by her, and accounted part of her family.

Note. " The nurſes ſhall be Catholics, choſen " by the moſt ſerene Infanta, and reckoned among " her domeſtics.

XIX. That the rector or ſuperior miniſter, and other eccleſiaſtical and religious perſons of the lady Infanta's family, ſhall wear their uſual veſtments and habits.

Note. " Granted.

At the end of theſe articles, which were long debated and canvaſſed by the congregation " de propagandâ fide," thoſe fathers ſubjoined their opinion in the following terms.

" As to the terms offered by the moſt ſerene " King of England, it ſeems to us they are de- " ſigned only to ſecure the moſt ſerene Infanta's " religion. But to the end his Holineſs may grant " the diſpenſation, there are other things neceſſary " to the privilege, increaſe, and welfare of the " Roman Catholic religion. Theſe things are to " be propoſed by the moſt ſerene King, that his " Holineſs may conſider whether, upon ſuch affairs, " he can grant the diſpenſation." Du Cheſne's Hiſt. of England.

It is eaſy to ſee that his Sanctity's poſtils tended not only to promote Popery, but alſo to procraſtinate the affair, purſuant to the Spaniſh court's intentions. Beſide its not being expected that James would agree to the contents of thoſe notes, another expedient was ready prepared to obſtruct concluding the marriage; I mean, obliging his ſaid Majeſty to make offers for the advancement of Catholiciſm, wherewith the Pope, if he pleaſed, might never be ſatisfied. Thus, after a ſix years expectation, James was no farther advanced than when the affair was firſt ſet on foot, except that he was now ready diſpoſed to grant whatever his Holineſs did or might demand: and in effect this was in a manner the very courſe he took. He found now of what conſequence was the firſt article which he had been made to ſign, that the diſpenſation ſhould be firſt procured by the King of Spain's ſollicitation; for by this means his ſaid Catholic Majeſty could advance, or intirely break off the negociation, as he pleaſed, by cauſing the Pope to delay or refuſe the diſpenſation. It is certain, as was obſerved, the Spaniſh court's intent at firſt was only to make uſe of the project of this marriage to allure James into their ſnare, leſt he ſhould join the German Proteſtants, and afterwards, for fear he ſhould powerfully aſſiſt the King of Bohemia. Remark on this ſubject. Wilſon. P. 755.

When Gage returned from Rome with the above-inſerted articles, King James found himſelf terribly imbaraſſed. The Palatinate was almoſt loſt: the Bruſſels negociation made no progreſs, and he could not but perceive he was impoſed on by the Emperor and King of Spain: ſo that he ſaw no James's imbaraſs. Wilſon. Annals.

other way to procure the elector's reſtoration but Prince Charles's marriage with the Infanta. It is true, England was ſufficiently powerful to have greatly haraſſed the houſe of Auſtria; but a parliament muſt have been called, of which James could not bear even the thoughts. On the other hand, his Holineſs annexed to the marriage ſuch terms as James could not grant, without giving his domeſtic enemies occaſion to repreſent him as a Prince regardleſs of the Proteſtant intereſt, to which imputation he was already but too obnoxious. In this perplexity, rather than break with Spain, and ſo loſe the deſired dowry of two millions, with all hope of recovering the Palatinate, he choſe to be expoſed to his ſubjects reproaches, which he however ſeemed not much to regard. He therefore drew up a memorial which he ſigned with his own hand, containing his offers in favor of the Catholic religion, and ſent it to the earl of Briſtol, with the letter dated September 9, whereof I have already given ſome extracts. The ſaid letter's concluſion, which I purpoſely reſerved for this occaſion, becauſe the marriage is here mentioned, runs thus, viz.

His letter to the earl of Briſtol, with a memorial containing his offers. Wilſon. p. 755. Ruſhworth, p. 68.

" Nevertheleſs we muſt tell you, that we have " no great cauſe to be well pleaſed with the dili- " gences uſed on that part, when we obſerve that, " after ſo long expectance of the diſpenſation, upon " which the whole buſineſs (as they will have it) " depends, there is nothing yet returned but queries " and objections. Yet becauſe we will not give " over our patience a while longer, until we under- " ſtand more certainly what the effect thereof is " like to be, wherein we require you to be very " wary and watchful, conſidering how our honor " is therein ingaged; we have thought fit to let " you know, how far we are pleaſed to inlarge our " ſelf concerning thoſe points demanded by the " Pope, and ſet down by way of poſtil unto the " articles agreed upon betwixt Spain and us, as " you ſhall ſee by the power which Gage brought " us from Rome, whereof we have ſent you a " copy, and our reſolutions thereupon, ſigned with " our own hand, for your warrant and inſtruction. " And farther than that, ſince we cannot go with- " out much prejudice, inconveniency and diſhonor " to our ſelf and our ſon, we hope and expect the " King of Spain will bring it inſtantly to an iſſue, " without farther delay, which you are to preſs " with all diligence and earneſtneſs, that you may " preſently know their final reſolution, and what " we may expect thereupon. But if any reſpite of " time be earneſtly demanded, and that you per- " ceive it not poſſible for them to reſolve until an " anſwer come from Rome, we then think it fit " that you give them two months time after your " audience, that we may underſtand that King's " final reſolution before Chriſtmaſs next, at the " fartheſt."

He finally reſolves to conclude the marriage. p. 69.

Tho' James affirmed, he could not proceed any farther, yet means were found to perſuade him to a greater compliance, as will appear in the ſequel.

Hitherto the Spaniſh court had fed King James's hopes concerning the marriage, purely to amuſe him. But ſince, by the articles and offers ſigned with his own hand, they plainly ſaw he was reſolved to conclude at any rate, their opinion was, that they ought not to miſs ſuch a fair opportunity to reſtore the Catholic religion in England, which, very ſeemingly, might by means of this match be accompliſhed. So Philip, ſuddenly altering his mind, appeared as eager to conclude, as he had before ſeemed unwilling (1). From that time, viz. from the cloſe of 1622, the marriage was really determined on at the court of Madrid: the only buſineſs being to extort from King James ſuch terms as ſhould lead to what was projected. The Catholic Monarch's whole procedure, from the time I am ſpeaking of, evidently ſhews he was inclined to the marriage, in caſe he could obtain what he promiſed himſelf for the advancement of Popery in England, and which James's impatience gave him room to expect: but it is no leſs certain that, before then, he was utterly averſe to it. This manifeſtly appears in King Philip IV's letter to count Olivarez, and from that miniſter's anſwer. The letters here follow: viz.

JAMES I. AN' 1622.

The King of Spain's letter to count Olivarez.

Nov. 5. 1622.

" THE King my father declared at his death, Wilſon, " that his intent was never to marry my p. 71. " ſiſter, the Infanta Dona Maria, with the Prince " of Wales, which your uncle Don Baltazar under- " ſtood, and ſo treated this match ever with in- " tention to delay it: notwithſtanding, it is now " ſo far advanced that, conſidering all the In- " fanta's averſeneſs thereto, it is time to take ſome " meaſures to divert the treaty, which I would have " you find out, and I will make it good, whatſo- " ever it be. But in all other things, procure the " ſatisfaction of the King of Great Britain (who " has deſerved much) and it ſhall content me, ſo it " be not in the match."

Olivarez's anſwer to the King. Novem. 8. Annals, p. 71. Ruſhworth, p. 71.

Count Olivarez, in his anſwer agreed, that the late King never intended to conclude this marriage, but only to amuſe the King of England, by reaſon of the ſituation of affairs in the Palatinate and Netherlands. He ſaid moreover, the Infanta was determined to retire to a convent, immediately on her being preſſed on that ſubject.

After that, he repreſented to his Majeſty, " That the King of England found himſelf equally " ingaged in two affairs at that time, viz. the " marriage, and reſtitution of the Palatinate. Sup- " poſing then (added Olivarez) that the marriage " be made, we muſt come to the other affair, and " then your Majeſty will find yourſelf ingaged " with the King of England in a war againſt the " Emperor, and the Catholic league: a thing " which to hear will offend your ears; or if you " declare yourſelf for the Emperor, then you will " find yourſelf ingaged in a war againſt the King " of England, and your ſiſter married with his " ſon. If your Majeſty ſhould ſhew yourſelf neutral, " what a great ſcandal will it be for Spain to ſtand " neuter in a buſineſs wherein religion is ſo much " concerned?

" On the other hand (ſaid the count) ſuppoſing " we could ſatisfy the King of England, by having " the Palatinate reſtored to his ſon-in-law, yet we " muſt conſider whether it is in our power to have " it reſtored; ſince the duke of Bavaria is poſſeſſed " of all thoſe dominions, and the Emperor, who " has promiſed to transfer to him the Upper Pala- " tinate, with the electoral dignity, is now in the " diet, where that tranſlation is to be made. " Beſide, the Emperor has given us to underſtand, " how difficult it would be to wreſt the Palatinate " out of the duke of Bavaria's hands, ſince it " appears by the memorial, which was yeſterday " preſented to your Majeſty by the Emperor's em- " baſſador, that the duke of Bavaria alone can " maintain more troops than all the reſt of the allies " joined together.

Upon theſe difficulties, Olivarez, in the ſame letter propoſed, " to ſet on foot two other marriages;

(1) The earl of Briſtol wrote to King James, that if the Spaniſh court intended not the match, they were falſer than all the devils in hell, for deeper oaths and proteſtations of ſincerity could not be made. Ruſhworth, p. 69.

" namely,

James I. An' 1622.

"namely, between the Emperor's eldeſt daughter "and the Prince of Wales, and between the Prince "Palatine's ſon and the Emperor's ſecond daughter; "by which means the buſineſs (ſaid he) may be "accommodated, and afterwards, I would reduce "the Prince elector to the obedience of the church, "by breeding his ſons in the Emperor's court "with Catholic doctrine."

If it be conſidered, that his Catholic Majeſty's letter bears date the fifth of November, and that probably the anſwer was made within few days, it will be eaſy to comprehend that, 'till then, the Spaniard never intended to conclude the marriage. But preſently after, as I have obſerved, a different reſolution was taken at the court of Madrid.

An' 1623. Truce for fifteen months concluded at London. Du Cheſne's Hiſt. of Engl. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVII. p. 461, 473, 479.

The late change of ſcheme in the Spaniſh court procured the earl of Briſtol a letter from Philip IV, to the Infanta Iſabella, requeſting her to raiſe the ſiege of Frankendal, and renew at London the conferences for a truce, which were broken off at Bruſſels. This requeſt was a real order which the Infanta obeyed, and the negociation for a truce commenced at London, where it ended the twenty-ſeventh of March 1623. The ſole point was, by means of this truce, to prevent Frankendal, the only place in the Palatinate gariſoned by Engliſh, from falling into the Emperor's hands. But on the other ſide, his Imperial Majeſty had reaſon to fear, if James remained maſter of this place, he would make uſe of it to carry war into the Palatinate, and the more, as he had ſometimes threatened to have at laſt recourſe to arms. To adjuſt the different intereſts of the Emperor and King of England, this rare expedient was deviſed. Frankendal was to be delivered to the Infanta Iſabella, and a truce made for fifteen or eighteen months, after which, the Infanta was to reſtore that place to the Engliſh: but withal, the Elector was to break his alliance with the Prince of Brunſwic and count Mansfeldt.

Welwood. Coke.

The council of England's overſight in this treaty.

This treaty affords no grand idea of the capacity of King James and his council. Not only was Frankendal delivered to the Infanta, as if ſhe had been a third perſon intirely diſintereſted, tho' ſhe had ſhewn the contrary in this very treaty; but the elector was alſo deprived of all hope of re-entering his country. Moreover, the Emperor and duke of Bavaria were at liberty either to diſmiſs their troops, or to aſſiſt his Catholic Majeſty in the Netherlands, ſince there was no farther danger of a war in the Palatinate. But what advantage accrued to James by this treaty? Indeed, he hindered the Emperor from taking Frankendal, but at the ſame time, the place was delivered to Spain. On the other hand, the truce, which would have been for his advantage, had he kept Frankendal, turned to his prejudice, ſince it deprived him of the power to carry war into the Palatinate in favor of his ſon-in-law. It is true, on ſuppoſition of the Infanta's ſincerity, he was to have again that place when the truce was expired: but this was a very doubtful ſuppoſition, ſince the Infanta was intirely guided by the directions of the courts of Vienna and Madrid.

The duke of Bavaria made elector. Jan. 1623. Wilſon, p. 761, &c. Ruſhworth, p. 74.

Before this truce was concluded at London, the Emperor going to the diet of Ratiſbon, inveſted the duke of Bavaria with the electoral dignity, and the Upper Palatinate, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of diverſe Princes who were poſſeſſed of hereditary dominions, and to whom ſuch a precedent gave juſt occaſion of apprehenſion. Such was the effect of King James's three years negociations, in favor of his ſon-in-law, who was finally diſpoiled of all his dominions and dignities: but the Spaniſh match was to recover all. We muſt now ſee the ſucceſs of that tedious negociation, the only remarkable event of the year 1623.

Sequel of the marriage negociation.

What ſolely obſtructed the marriage, were the articles concerning religion. The earl of Briſtol had been diſputing the ground inch by inch, ever ſince his arrival in Spain, and Philip IV was not thereat diſpleaſed, becauſe it gave him opportunity to gain time. In Auguſt 1622, the Spaniard demanded certain articles in favor of the Engliſh Catholics, to which the embaſſador made no other reply than that, he would therewith acquaint the King his maſter. At the ſame time, his Holineſs put his poſtils or notes to the articles agreed on. Hence it is eaſy to perceive, that the Roman and Spaniſh courts acted in concert, both tending to a like purpoſe. King James received, about the ſame time, the Pope's poſtils, and the court of Madrid's demands in behalf of the Engliſh Papiſts. Theſe latter, thro' ceremony, he kept ſome months without giving any anſwer, but at length ſigned all, the fifth of January, 1623; and having made the Prince ſign them alſo, ſent the ſame articles to the earl of Briſtol, who received them the twenty-fifth of the ſame month. I believe the full and intire reſolution of the Spaniſh court to conclude the marriage may be fixed to this time. From the year 1616, to November 1622, that court's ſole intent was to amuſe King James. From thence, to the twenty-fifth of January, 1623, they ſeem to have reſolved on the marriage, provided certain advantages could be obtained for the Romiſh religion. In fine, after the articles ſigned by King James and Prince Charles had ſecured him what they wiſhed for, their reſolution was fixed. Theſe three periods of time are to be carefully obſerved and diſtinguiſhed, for want of which moſt hiſtorians are very obſcure in their recital of this affair.

James I. An' 1623.

James agrees to whatever his Holineſs requires for the Catholics. Ruſhworth, p. 281.

The Spaniard, being pretty well ſatisfied with the articles ſent from England, which were abundantly more advantageous to Papiſts than thoſe agreed on with the earl of Briſtol, demanded time to ſend them to Rome, and obtain the Holy Father's diſpenſation. It was thought, the diſpenſation might come in March or April at fartheſt, and it was agreed, the nuptials ſhould be ſolemniſed four days after its arrival: that the Infanta ſhould ſet out within twenty days after celebration of the eſpouſals, and while the diſpenſation was waiting for, the other articles, which were termed temporal, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe concerning religion, ſhould be adjuſted. Anſwerably to this ſtipulation, the earl of Briſtol and ſir Walter Aſton, jointly with the Spaniſh miniſters, prepared theſe articles by the begining of March, to the mutual ſatisfaction of both parties. The twenty-ſecond of March, counts Olivarez and Gondomar repaired to the Engliſh embaſſadors, and ſhewed them a writing with his Catholic Majeſty's ſignature affixed, whereby he approved of the temporal articles, and ordered them to conclude the buſineſs. Theſe articles concerned only the portion and dowry, without any mention of the Palatinate. Beſide King James's having injoined the earl of Briſtol in his inſtructions, not to make reſtitution of the Palatinate one of the marriage-articles, this injunction was reiterated in his ſaid Majeſty's letter to him, the thirtieth of December 1622, that is, two or three months before. Moreover, at this very inſtant, the truce and ſequeſtration of Frankendal were negociating at London.

A time for ſolemniſing the marriage is fixed.

without any mention of the Palatinate.

The marriage affair being in this ſituation, and moſt ſeemingly near a concluſion, the end of April was to be expected with patience, to ſee whether any new difficulty would occur, for thus far all matters ſeemed to be ſettled to King James's ſatisfaction. But the face of this affair was ſuddenly changed by a very odd and moſt extraordinary adventure. Buckingham put it into Prince Charles's head, that it behoved him perſonally to fetch home from Spain his miſtreſs the Infanta. He told him, "the more uncommon ſuch a gallantry was among "Princes,

"Princes, the more it would redound to his honor: "the Infanta herſelf would be charmed with it: "his preſenſe would immediately put an end to "all formalities, and remove whatever difficulties "might yet occur: as after the marriage, there "was an affair of moment to be negociated, namely, "reſtitution of the Palatinate, an interceſſor like "him would do more in three days than em- "baſſadors could do in as many months." In a word, he ſo artfully repreſented this project, that the Prince, tranſported with the thoughts of ſuch a magnanimous adventure, never reſted 'till he had accompliſhed it. The difficulty was to obtain his Majeſty's conſent. His Highneſs aſked it before Buckingham, and expreſſed ſo earneſt a deſire to make the journey, that James granted his requeſt without much heſitation, and put off 'till next day

Ibid. p. 13. to conſider of means to effect it: but having more ſeriouſly reflected on this affair, his mind was quite changed on the morrow, when Prince Charles and Buckingham came to him. He repreſented to them, how fruitleſs ſuch a journey would be in the preſent ſituation of the marriage-affair, and the inconveniences wherewith it might be attended: but, inſtead of anſwering his reaſons, Buckingham rudely told him, he had given his word, and if he broke

p. 13—15. James conſents. ibid. Wilſon. it ſhould be never more credited. In lord Clarendon's hiſtory may be ſeen at large this converſation, which ended with King James's permiſſion, extorted by the Prince and Buckingham, for this unaccountable, raſh, and moſt perilous journey. It was reſolved, that Buckingham ſhould accompany his royal Highneſs, with only two others, viz. ſir Francis Cottington, who had been King James's agent in Spain, and returned thence in September, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of the Prince's bed-chamber, and who had been brought up at Madrid: that they ſhould go poſt thro' France, and the whole be a ſecret, that they might be at a diſtance before their departure was known. This reſolution taken, the Prince and Buckingham deſired only two days to prepare.

The motives of this journey are variouſly related, according to the intereſt and prejudices of the ſeveral

Weldon, p. 143. writers. Some ſay, the court of England, ſtill doubting the Spaniſh court's ſincerity, thought proper, the Prince and Buckingham ſhould be ocularly ſatisfied, in order to know what could be depended on. But ſuppoſing this doubt, was it not ſtrangely imprudent to put the King's only ſon into the hands of a Prince whoſe ſincerity was believed juſtly ſuſpected? the King, Prince and favorite muſt have been all three void of underſtanding to act ſo very erroneouſly. This therefore ſeems not at all probable.

Vol. I. p. 11. Lord Clarendon ſays, Buckingham, thro' envy that the earl of Briſtol ſhould have the ſole management of ſuch a momentous affair, had a mind to have the glory of giving the finiſhing ſtroke: but he ſhould have thought of it ſooner, ſince all was now concluded in Spain, at or about the time of the Prince's departure for Madrid: ſo the marquis could not acquire much honor; beſide the event ſhewed this was not his motive, ſince, inſtead of promoting, he ſolely occaſioned all inſuing difficulties, and finally the breach of this affair.

Ruſhworth, p. 262. Others pretend, Buckingham's aim was inſenſibly to induce the Prince to change his religion, by expoſing him to all the temptations which of courſe he would meet with at the court of Madrid. Of this he was afterwards accuſed before the parliament, by the earl of Briſtol, who ſaid, the project was formed, ſeveral months before his royal Highneſs's departure, between Buckingham and Gondomar, by means of Endymion Porter, who had been ſent to Spain for that purpoſe: but the proofs whereon the earl of Briſtol grounded his accuſation, were at moſt but preſumptions; and as he was a profeſſed enemy to Buckingham, I am not ſure whether we may venture to rely on his teſtimony.

But whatever were the favorite's real motives with reſpect to this journey, it cannot well be denied, that it was a ſign of great levity in the Prince, and of no leſs weakneſs and imprudence in his Majeſty. The match affair was in ſuch a ſituation, that it was wholly needleſs to ſollicit a-freſh the Spaniſh court, where all was agreed. Two months patience would have ſhewn King James whether he could depend thereon, without expoſing his only ſon and heir apparent to ſuch imminent danger, by ſuffering him to execute a romantic project whence not the leaſt advantage could accrue. But James's condeſcenſion for the Prince and Buckingham prevailed over all theſe conſiderations. They ſet out poſt the ſeventeenth * of February, and went to Paris, where they ventured to appear at court, and be preſent at a ball, where, tho' diſguiſed, they were in ſome danger of being diſcovered. However, they arrived ſafely at Madrid the ſeventh † of March, and alighted at the earl of Briſtol's, who was not a little ſurpriſed at ſight of his Highneſs (1). I ſhall not ſtay to deſcribe the magnificent reception Prince Charles met with at the court of Spain, when he made himſelf known; contenting myſelf with only ſaying that they ſhewed him all the reſpect due to his birth, and uſed all poſſible careſſes to teſtify their ſatisfaction at his gallantry to the Infanta, and his candor in thus confiding in his Catholic Majeſty's generoſity. The only point wherein great ceremony was uſed, was his not being ſuffered to viſit the Infanta privately: the Spaniſh cuſtoms admit not ſuch familiarity, and the more becauſe the diſpenſation not being yet come he could not, in ſtrictneſs, be conſidered as the Infanta's future conſort.

No ſooner was Prince Charles known in Spain, but all the Spaniards believed his journey thither was purpoſely to change his religion before he eſpouſed the Infanta; no one imagining there could be any other motive: nay, count Gondomar very ſeriouſly deſired the earl of Briſtol, not to oppoſe ſo pious a deſign; and if Briſtol is to be credited, the count intimated to him, that the marquis of Buckingham was not againſt it (2). The earl of Briſtol, comprehending that, if the court of Spain had any ſuch hope, it would be apt to retard the marriage, ſpake of it to his Highneſs, and conjured him to impart the ſecret to him, if there was really any ſuch matter in agitation. But Charles firmly denied it, and expoſtulated with the embaſſador, ſomewhat warmly, for having of him ſuch bad ſentiments. Briſtol thereupon beſeeched his Highneſs, neither to do nor ſay any thing whatever might feed the Spaniſh court's hopes on that ſubject, for fear of obſtructing the marriage. Nevertheleſs he was attacked ſeveral times, one while by eccleſiaſtics, who took all occaſions to diſpute with him about religion, another while by courtiers, who repreſented to him how powerful England would grow, if ſhe would return to the Pope's obedience. He even received a long epiſtle from Gregory XV, exhorting him to come into the boſom of the church, and imitate his glorious anceſtors, who had done ſo great things for the defenſe of religion. Prince Charles to Pope Gregory XV.

Moſt Holy Father,

Prince Charles's anſwer to the Pope. Wilſon, p. 767.

"I Received the diſpatch from your Holineſs with great content, and with that reſpect which the piety and care wherewith your Holineſs writes doth require. It was an unſpeakable pleaſure to me to read the generous exploits of the Kings my predeceſſors, to whoſe memory poſterity hath not given thoſe praiſes and elogies of honor that were due to them. I do believe that your Holineſs hath ſet their example before my eyes, to the end that I might imitate them in all my actions; for in truth they have often expoſed their eſtates and lives for the exaltation of the holy chair. And the courage with which they have aſſaulted the enemies of the croſs of Jeſus Chriſt hath not been leſs than the care and thought which I have, to the end that the peace and intelligence, which hath hitherto been wanting in Chriſtendom, might be bound with a bond of true concord: for like as the common enemy of peace watcheth always to put hatred and diſſenſion between Chriſtian Princes, ſo I believe that the glory of God requireth that we ſhould indeavor to unite them. And I do not eſteem it a greater honor to be deſcended from ſo great Princes, than to imitate them in the zeal of their piety: in which it helps me very much to have known the mind and will of our thrice honored lord and father, and the holy intentions of his Catholic Majeſty, to give a happy concurrence to ſo laudable a deſign: for it grieves him extremely to ſee the great evil that grows from the diviſion of Chriſtian Princes, which the wiſdom of your Holineſs foreſaw, when it judged the marriage, which you pleaſed to deſign between the Infanta of Spain and myſelf, to be neceſſary to procure ſo great a good: for it is very certain, that I ſhall never be ſo extremely affectionate to any thing in the world, as to indeavor alliance with a Prince who hath the ſame apprehenſions of the true religion with myſelf. Therefore I intreat your Holineſs to believe, that I have been always far from incouraging novelties, or to be a partiſan of any faction againſt the Catholic, Apoſtolic, Roman religion: but, on the contrary, I have ſought all occaſions to take away the ſuſpicion which might reſt upon me; and that I will imploy myſelf for the time to come to have but one religion, and one faith, ſeeing that we all believe in one Jeſus Chriſt: having reſolved in myſelf to ſpare nothing I may have in the world, and to ſuffer all manner of diſcommodities, even to the hazarding my eſtate and life, for a thing ſo pleaſing unto God. It reſteth only, that I thank your Holineſs for the permiſſion which you have been pleaſed to afford me, and that I may pray God to give you a bleſſed health here, and his glory, after ſo much travel which your Holineſs taketh within his Church.

Prince Charles to Pope Gregory XV.

James I. An' 1623.

Moſt Holy Father,

Annals, p. 77. Ruſhworth, p. 82.

"WE have received your letter with no leſs thankfulneſs and reſpect than is due to the ſingular good will and godly affection wherewith we know it was written. It was moſt acceptable unto us, that the never-enough renowned examples of our anceſtors were propoſed to us by your Holineſs for our inſpection and imitation; who, tho' they often hazarded their lives and fortunes to propagate the Chriſtian faith, yet did they never more chearfully diſplay the banners of the croſs of Chriſt againſt his moſt bitter enemies, than we will indeavor to the utmoſt, that the peace and union, which ſo long triumphed, may be reduced into the Chriſtian world, after a kind of elimination or exile. For ſince the malice of the father of diſcords hath ſowed ſuch unhappy diviſions among thoſe who profeſs the Chriſtian religion, we account this moſt neceſſary, thereby to promote with better ſucceſs the glory of God, and Chriſt our Saviour; nor ſhall we eſteem it leſs honor to tread in their footſteps, and to have been their rivals and imitators in holy undertakings, than to have been deſcended of them. And we are very much incouraged to this as well by the known inclination of our lord and father, as his ardent deſire to lend a helping hand to ſo pious a work, as by the anguiſh which gnaws his royal breaſt, when he conſiders what cruel deſtructions, what deplorable calamities ariſe out of the diſſenſions of Chriſtian Princes. Your Holineſs's conjecture of our deſire to contract an alliance and marriage with a Catholic family and Princeſs, is agreeable both to your wiſdom and charity; for we would never deſire ſo vehemently to be joined in a ſtrict and indiſſoluble bond with any mortal whatſoever, whoſe religion we hated. Therefore your Holineſs may be aſſured, that we are, and always will be of that moderation, as to abſtain from ſuch actions which may teſtify our hatred againſt the Roman Catholic religion; we will rather imbrace all occaſions whereby, thro' a gentle and fair procedure, all ſiniſter ſuſpicions may be taken away; that as we all confeſs one individual Trinity, and one Chriſt crucified, we may unanimouſly grow up into one faith. Which that we may compaſs, we little value all labor and watchings, yea, the very hazard of our lives. It remains that we render thanks to your Holineſs for your letter, which we eſteem as a ſingular preſent, and wiſh your Holineſs all proſperity and eternal happineſs.

Dated at Madrid, 20 Junii, 1623 *.

* As no original appears, we may juſtly doubt the genuineſs of both theſe pretended tranſlations.

It muſt be obſerved of theſe two letters, which vary not a little, that, as they appeared not 'till after the civil wars broke out, it is equally probable that one of the parties qualified, while the other agravated, the expreſſions: wherefore it is needleſs to make thereon any reflection.

The Pope adds new conditions to the diſpenſation.

Mean while, ſince Prince Charles's arrival in Spain, the marriage affair ſomewhat changed countenance. The diſpenſation arrived about ſix weeks after, viz. in the begining of May: but his Holineſs had annexed certain conditions, without which it was to be of no validity. Very ſeemingly, if his ſaid Highneſs had not been in Spain, the diſpenſation would have come ſooner, and without any reſtriction: but it is not very ſurpriſing, that the Pontif, knowing Prince Charles was in Spain, ſhould deſire to make advantage of that imprudence. He ſent therefore the diſpenſation, but it was to be delivered only on theſe terms; that the Infanta ſhould have a church in London:

that the children by this marriage ſhould be left to their mother's care 'till they were ten years old: that the nurſes ſhould be Catholics, and appointed by the mother: that the King of England ſhould give ſecurity for performance of the articles agreed on touching religion.

Wilſon. p. 768.

Article about education of the children agreed on. Wilſon, p. 757.

The article which concerned educating the children had been debated in November, and the Pope and King of Spain had inſiſted, that the children ſhould remain 'till marriageable under their mother's tuition. King James at firſt offered ſeven years, and the courts of Rome and Spain deſcended as low as twelve: then James allowed nine, and his Holineſs ten. At laſt, the earl of Briſtol received his maſter's order, not to diſpute for a year more or leſs.

Philip ingages for K. James. Du Cheſne. p. 1164.

On the arrival of Prince Charles and Buckingham at Madrid, themſelves managed the marriage affair, excluſive of the earl of Briſtol. Some debate paſſed upon the articles annexed to the Pope's diſpenſation. The Prince of Wales ſaid, he had no power to make the leaſt addition to the articles ſigned by the King his father, and the Spaniſh miniſters maintained, that his Catholic Majeſty could not reject the conditions whereon his Holineſs had granted the diſpenſation: that it lay in the Pope's breaſt to grant his favors on what terms he pleaſed, and that the diſpenſation was void without theſe conditions. It was at length judged requiſite to conſult the King of England by letter, and withal to aſk him, what ſecurity he would give for performance of the articles. James made no ſcruple about either the time of the childrens education, or the nurſes, becauſe thoſe matters were already agreed. As to the ſecurity, he replied, he could give no other than his own and the Prince's royal words and oaths, confirmed by his council of ſtate, and exemplified under the great ſeal of England. All this not ſatisfying the Pope's nuncio, who pretended to have particular orders upon that point, the King of Spain offered to become ſecurity himſelf: but it was firſt to be determined by a commitee of eccleſiaſtics, that Philip might lawfully ſwear for the King of England. Some believe this to be a deviſe, to render his Catholic Majeſty guarantee of the articles granted to the Papiſts. This difficulty being removed, Prince Charles diſpatched Cottington to England with the articles concerning religion, newly drawn, anſwering his Sanctity's meaning, together with certain other ſecret articles which were not ſo ſoon to be publiſhed.

Nothing ſtipulated concerning a dowry or the Palatinate. Wilſon, p. 773.

It muſt be remarked, that hitherto there was no other writing about the Infanta's dowry than a rough draught, approved indeed by the King of Spain in a forementioned letter directed to his miniſters, but which remained in the hands of Olivarez. Much leſs had there been any care taken about reſtitution of the Palatine, James being unwilling to make this one of the marriage articles, for fear it ſhould be reckoned in lieu of the two millions, promiſed him for the Infanta's dowry: but he was very willing to receive the Palatinate from his Catholic Majeſty's bounty, when the marriage ſhould be accompliſhed: this was at leaſt his ſcheme, and doubtleſs, while the court of Spain ſought only to amuſe him, he was made to expect reſtitution of the Palatinate, tho' without any written ingagement. James however relied on this verbal promiſe, as if it had been a treaty ſigned with the Spaniard's own hand (1).

King James debates in council about tolerating Papiſts Wilſon.

Cottington being come to England with the articles, both public and private, it was rumored, that the Pope and King of Spain demanded a toleration for the Engliſh Papiſts. King James himſelf occaſioned this rumor, by aſking his council, whether it would be convenient to grant ſuch a toleration? Whereupon Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had withdrawn to his own houſe ever ſince that fatal accident of killing the park-keeper, and came no more to the council, deemed it his duty to write his Majeſty the following letter.

James I. An' 1623.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

Archbiſhop Abbot's letter to King James againſt toleration of Popery. Wilſon. p. 768. Coke. Ruſhworth, p. 85.

"I Have been too long ſilent, and I am afraid by my ſilence I have neglected the duty of the place it hath pleaſed God to call me unto, and your Majeſty to place me in. But now I humbly crave leave I may diſcharge my conſcience towards God, and my duty to your Majeſty; and therefore I beſeech you freely to give me leave to deliver myſelf, and then let your Majeſty do with me what you pleaſe. Your Majeſty hath propounded a toleration of religion: I beſeech you take it into your conſideration what your act is, what the conſequence may be. By your act, you labor to ſet up the moſt damnable and heretical doctrine of the church of Rome, the whore of Babylon: how hateful it will be to God, and grievous to your good ſubjects, the profeſſors of the Goſpel, that your Majeſty, who hath often diſputed, and learnedly written againſt thoſe hereſies, ſhould now ſhew yourſelf a patron of thoſe wicked doctrines, which your pen hath told the world, and your conſcience tells your ſelf, are ſuperſtitious, idolatrous, and deteſtable. And hereunto I add what you have done in ſending the Prince into Spain, without conſent of your council, the privity and approbation of your people: and altho' you have a charge and intereſt in the Prince, as ſon of your fleſh; yet have the people a greater, as ſon of the kingdom, upon whom, next after your Majeſty, are their eyes fixed, and welfare depends; and ſo tenderly is his going apprehended, as (believe it) however his return may be ſafe, yet the drawers of him into this action, ſo dangerous to himſelf, ſo deſperate to the kingdom, will not paſs away unqueſtioned, unpuniſhed. Beſide, this toleration which you indeavor to ſet up by your proclamation, cannot be done without a parliament, unleſs your Majeſty will let your ſubjects ſee that you will take unto yourſelf ability to throw down the laws of your land at your pleaſure. What dread conſequence theſe things may draw afterwards, I beſeech your Majeſty to conſider; and above all, leſt by this toleration, and diſcountenancing the true profeſſion of the Goſpel, wherewith God hath bleſſed us, and this kingdom hath ſo long flouriſhed under it, your Majeſty do not draw upon this kingdom in general, and your ſelf in particular, God's heavy wrath and indignation.

"Thus, in diſcharge of my duty towards God, to your Majeſty, and the place of my calling, I have taken humble leave to deliver my conſcience. Now, Sir, do what you pleaſe with me.

King James ſigns the articles ſent from Spain. Wilſon.

It appears by this letter that it was not without ground this archbiſhop paſſed for a Puritan, at leaſt, according to the then notions at court, where all were conſidered as Puritans who refuſed aſcribing to his Majeſty a power unlimited. Accordingly the prelate's counſels were not regarded.

James detained not Cottington long in England. As it was not now time to diſpute, and he was required to ſign the articles as brought by Cottington, without any alterations, he choſe to do it rather than hazard a breach of the marriage, when the Prince his ſon was in the Spaniard's power: he therefore ſigned, and ſolemnly ſwore to them. As theſe articles were new drawn, explained and increaſed to twenty three, beſide four ſecret ones, my readers will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to view them here in their new form, and ſee withal to what lengths King James carried his compliance.

Articles ſworn by the King. Wilſon. Annals of James I. p. 78. Ruſhworth, p. 86.

I. That the marriage be made by diſpenſation of the Pope, but that to be procured by the indeavor of the King of Spain.

II. That the marriage be once only celebrated in Spain, and ratified in England, in form following: In the morning, after the moſt gracious Infanta hath ended her devotions in the chapel, ſhe, and the moſt excellent Prince Charles, ſhall meet in the King's chapel, or in ſome other room of the palace, where it ſhall ſeem moſt expedient; and there ſhall be read all the procurations, by virtue whereof the marriage was celebrated in Spain; and as well the moſt excellent Prince, as the moſt excellent Infanta, ſhall ratify the ſaid marriage celebrated in Spain, with all ſolemnity neceſſary for ſuch an act: ſo as no ceremony or other thing intervene, which ſhall be contrary to the Roman Catholic Apoſtolic religion.

III. That the moſt gracious Infanta ſhall take with her ſuch ſervants and family as are convenient for her ſervice; which family, and all perſons to her belonging, ſhall be choſen and nominated by the Catholic King: ſo as he nominate no ſervant who is vaſſal to the King of Great Britain, without his will and conſent.

IV. That as well the moſt gracious Infanta, as all her ſervants and family, ſhall have free uſe and exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion, in manner and form as is beneath capitulated.

V. That ſhe ſhall have an oratory and decent chapel in her palace, where, at the pleaſure of the moſt gracious Infanta, maſſes may be celebrated; and in like manner ſhe ſhall have, in London, or whereſoever ſhe ſhall make her abode, a public and capacious church near her palace, wherein all duties may be ſolemnly celebrated, and all other things neceſſary for the public preaching of God's word, the celebration and adminiſtration of all the ſacraments of the Catholic Roman church, and for burial of the dead, and baptizing of children: that the ſaid oratory, chapel and church ſhall be adorned with ſuch decency, as ſhall ſeem convenient to the moſt gracious Infanta.

VI. That the men-ſervants and maid-ſervants of the moſt gracious Infanta, and their ſervants, children, deſcendants, and all their families, of what ſort ſoever, ſerving her Highneſs, may be freely and publicly Catholics.

VII. That the moſt gracious Infanta, her ſervants and family, may live as Catholics in form following: that the moſt gracious Infanta ſhall have, in her palace, her oratory and chapel, room ſo ſpacious that her ſaid ſervants and family may enter and ſtay therein; in which there ſhall be a public and ordinary door for them, and another inward door, by which the Infanta may have a paſſage into the ſaid chapel, where ſhe and others, as aboveſaid, may be preſent at divine offices.

VIII. That the chapel, church and oratory may be beautified with decent ornaments of altars, and other things neceſſary for divine ſervice, which is to be celebrated in them, according to the cuſtom of the holy Roman church; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſaid ſervants, and others, to go to the ſaid chapel and church at all hours, as to them ſhall ſeem expedient.

IX. That the care and cuſtody of the ſaid chapel and church ſhall be commited to ſuch as the lady Infanta ſhall appoint, to whom it ſhall be lawful to appoint keepers, that no body may enter into them to do any indecent thing. James I. An' 1623.

X. That to the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, and to ſerve in the chapel and church aforeſaid, there ſhall be twenty-four prieſts and aſſiſtants, who ſhall ſerve weekly or monthly, as to the Infanta ſhall ſeem fit; and the election of them ſhall belong to the lady Infanta, and the Catholic King, provided that they be none of the vaſſals of the King of Great Britain; and if they be, his will and conſent is to be firſt obtained.

XI. That there be one ſuperior miniſter, or biſhop, with neceſſary authority upon all occaſions which ſhall happen belonging to religion; and for want of a biſhop, that his vicar may have his authority and juriſdiction.

XII. That this biſhop, or ſuperior miniſter, may correct and chaſtiſe all Roman Catholics who ſhall offend, and ſhall exerciſe upon them all juriſdiction eccleſiaſtical: and moreover alſo, the lady Infanta ſhall have power to put them out of her ſervice, whenſoever it ſhall ſeem expedient to her.

XIII. That it may be lawful for the lady Infanta and her ſervants to procure, from Rome, diſpenſations, indulgences, jubilees, and all graces, as ſhall ſeem fit to their religion and conſciences, and to get and make uſe of any manner of Catholic books whatſoever.

XIV. That the ſervants and family of the lady Infanta, who ſhall come into England, ſhall take the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain: provided, that there be no clauſe therein which ſhall be contrary to their conſciences, and the Roman Catholic religion; and if they happen to be vaſſals to the King of Great Britain, they ſhall take the ſame oath the Spaniards do.

XV. That the laws which are, or ſhall be in England, againſt religion, ſhall not take hold of the ſaid ſervants; and only the aforeſaid ſuperior eccleſiaſtical Catholic may proceed againſt eccleſiaſtical perſons, as hath been accuſtomed by Catholics: and if a ſecular judge ſhall apprehend any eccleſiaſtical perſon for any offenſe, he ſhall forthwith cauſe him to be delivered to the aforeſaid ſuperior eccleſiaſtic, who ſhall proceed againſt him according to the canon law.

XVI. That the laws made againſt Catholics in England, or in any other kingdom of the King of Great Britain, ſhall not extend to the children of this marriage; and tho' they be Catholics, they ſhall not loſe the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdom and dominions of Great Britain.

XVII. That the nurſes who ſhall give ſuck to the children of the lady Infanta (whether they be of the kingdom of Great Britain, or of any other nation whatſoever) ſhall be choſen by the lady Infanta, as ſhe pleaſeth, aud ſhall be accounted of her family, and injoy the privileges thereof.

XVIII. That the biſhop, eccleſiaſtical and religious perſons of the lady Infanta's family, ſhall wear the veſtments and habit of their digniry, profeſſion and religion, after the cuſtom of Rome.

XIX. For ſecurity that the ſaid matrimony be not diſſolved for any cauſe whatſoever, the King and Prince are equally to paſs the word and honor of a King; and moreover, that they will perform whatſoever ſhall be propounded by the Catholic King for farther confirmation, if it may be done decently and fitly.

XX. That the ſons and daughters which ſhall be born of this marriage ſhall be brought up in company of the moſt excellent Infanta, at the leaſt until the age of ten years, and ſhall freely injoy the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdoms, as aforeſaid.

XXI. That whenſoever any place of either man-ſervant or maid-ſervant, which the lady Infanta ſhall ſhall bring with her (nominated by the Catholic King her brother) ſhall happen to be void, whether by death, or by other cauſe or accident, all the ſaid ſervants of her family are to be ſupplied by the Catholic King, as aforeſaid.

James I. An' 1623.

XXII. For ſecurity that whatſoever is capitulated may be fulfiled, the King of Great Britain and Prince Charles are to be bound by oath; and all the King's council ſhall confirm the ſaid treaty under their hands: moreover, the ſaid King and Prince are to give their faiths, in the word of a King, to indeavor, if poſſible, that whatſoever is capitulated may be eſtabliſhed by parliament.

XXIII. That, conformably to this treaty, all theſe things propoſed are to be allowed and approved of by the Pope, that he may give apoſtolical benediction, and a diſpenſation neceſſary to effect the marriage.

Difficulty concerning the Pope's title.

King James ratified theſe articles in the uſual form, and ſwore to obſerve them, before the two Spaniſh embaſſadors and twenty (1) privy-counſellors, who alſo ſigned the treaty. When James came to take the oath, he had ſome diſpute with the embaſſadors. He would not ſtile the Pope Holy Father, or his Holineſs, ſaying, he had written againſt this title, and it was unreaſonable to make him retract. But the embaſſadors inſiſting thereon, his Majeſty at length yielded, not thinking he ought, for ſuch a trifle, retard a treaty which had now been ſeven whole years in agitation.

James yields. Du Cheſne. Coke. Wilſon. Ruſhworth, p. 90. Annals.

After publicly taking this oath, he withdrew into his cloſet, where, in preſenſe of the ſame embaſſadors, and ſome privy-counſellors, he ratified and ſwore to theſe four ſecret articles.

Private articles. Wilſon, p. 769. Annals of James I. p. 79. Ruſhworth, p. 89.

I. That particular laws made againſt Roman Catholics, under which other vaſſals of our realms are not comprehended, and to whoſe obſervation all generally are not obliged; as likewiſe general laws, under which all are equally comprized, if ſo be they are ſuch as are repugnant to the Romiſh religion, ſhall not at any time hereafter, by any means or chance whatſoever, directly or indirectly, be commanded to be put in execution againſt the ſaid Roman Catholics; and we will cauſe that our council ſhall take the ſame oath, as far as it pertains to them, and belongs to the execution, which by the hands of them, and their miniſters is to be exerciſed.

II. That no other laws ſhall hereafter be made anew againſt the ſaid Roman Catholics, but that there ſhall be a perpetual toleration of the Roman Catholic religion, within private houſes, throughout all our realms and dominions, which we will have to be underſtood as well of our kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as in England; which ſhall be granted to them in manner and form as is capitulated, decreed and granted in the article of this treaty concerning the marriage.

III. That neither by us, nor any other interpoſed perſon whatſoever, directly or indirectly, privately or publicly, will we treat (or attempt) any thing with the moſt renowned lady Infanta, Donna Maria, which ſhall be repugnant to the Roman Catholic religion; neither will we by any means perſuade her, that ſhe ſhould ever renounce or relinquiſh the ſame in ſubſtance or form, or that ſhe ſhould do any thing repugnant or contrary to thoſe things which are contained in the treaty of matrimony.

IV. That we and the Prince of Wales will interpoſe our authority, and will do as much as in us ſhall lie, that the parliament ſhall approve, confirm, and ratify all and ſingular articles in favor of the Roman Catholics, capitulated between the moſt renowned Kings by reaſon of this marriage: and that the ſaid parliament ſhall revoke and abrogate particular laws made againſt the ſaid Roman Catholics, to whoſe obſervance alſo the reſt of our ſubjects and vaſſals are not obliged; as likewiſe the general laws under which all are equally comprehended, to wit, as to the Roman Catholics, if they be ſuch as is aforeſaid, which are repugnant to the Roman Catholic religion: and that hereafter, we will not conſent that the ſaid parliament ſhould ever, at any time, inact or write any other new laws againſt the Roman Catholics (2).

James I. An' 1623.

Theſe are the four articles which ſerved for a ground-work to the Pontif's diſpenſation: for as the congregation "de propagandâ fide" urged; "The other articles are only to ſecure the Infanta's "religion: but there muſt be ſomething more for "the Catholics in general before the diſpenſation "can be granted." Nalſon and others pretend, theſe four ſecret articles are fictitious, groundleſs, and even improbable: but beſide that they follow very naturally from what was demanded by the "de propagandâ fide" congregation, and are manifeſtly alluded to in the archbiſhop's letter to King James, we ſhall immediately examine a paper which leaves no room to doubt James's having ingaged to perform the contents of thoſe ſaid four articles.

It is pretended that all theſe articles, as well public as private, ſigned by the King and privy-council, with the great ſeal annexed, being brought to Spain, the Prince of Wales made the following additions: but in reality, I find not ſo ſtrong proofs of theſe additions, as of the foregoing articles. This depends on the degree of credit which the reader is willing to allow the firſt publiſhers.

"Moreover, I Charles, Prince of Wales, ingage "my ſelf (and promiſe, that the moſt illuſtrious "King of Great Britain, my moſt honored lord "and father, ſhall do the ſame, both by word "and writing) That all thoſe things which are "contained in the foregoing articles, and concern "as well the ſuſpenſion as the abrogation of all "laws made againſt the Roman Catholics, ſhall "within three years infallibly take effect, and "ſooner if it be poſſible, which we will have to "lie upon our conſcience and royal honor: that I "will intercede with the moſt illuſtrious King of "Great Britain, my father, that the ten years of "educating the children, which ſhall be born of "this marriage, with the moſt illuſtrious lady Infanta their mother, accorded in the twenty third "article (which term the Pope of Rome deſires to "have prorogued to twelve years) may be "lengthened to the ſaid term: and I promiſe freely and of my own accord, and ſwear, that if it "ſo happen, that the intire power of diſpoſing this "matter be devolved to me, I will alſo grant and "approve the ſaid term. Farthermore, I Prince "of Wales oblige my ſelf, upon my faith to the "Catholic King, that, as often as the moſt illuſtrious lady Infanta ſhall require I ſhould give "ear to divines, or others whom her Highneſs "ſhall be pleaſed to imploy in matter of the Roman Catholic religion, I will hearken to them "willingly without all difficulty, and laying aſide "all excuſe. And for farther caution, in point of "of the free exerciſe of the Catholic religion, and "ſuſpenſion of the law above-named, I Charles, "Prince of Wales, promiſe and take upon me, in "the word of a King, that the things above "promiſed and treated concerning thoſe matters, "ſhall take effect, and be put in execution, as well

" in the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as of " England."

Such were the products of Prince Charles's and Buckingham's journey to Spain; a journey not only needleſs, but even pernicious, as may eaſily be ſeen by all the additions made to thoſe former articles ſettled by the earl of Briſtol. King James was ſo over-joyed at his having brought to a period this grand matrimonial affair, that " he defied all the " devils in hell to break it." As a grateful acknowledgment for his favorite's important ſervices, he ſent over a patent creating him duke of Buckingham. There was no other duke at that time in England.

Wilſon, p. 769.

Buckingham created a duke. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XVII. 495. Coke.

King James's compliance in all he had ſigned and ratified went ſuch great lengths that the Spaniards could ſcarce believe it ſincere. Some of them who were no ſtrangers to the Engliſh conſtitution, maintained, it was not in James's power to perform his promiſes, or, in caſe he attempted it, a rebellion would be the infallible conſequence. This occaſioned his Catholic Majeſty's ordering the Junto to take this matter into conſideration. The reſult of their deliberations was, that it was not proper to ſend the Infanta to England before next ſpring, that in this interval the performance of thoſe articles granted to the Catholics, and their effect, might be aſcertained. Hereupon the Spaniſh embaſſadors in England had orders to requeſt his Britannic Majeſty to begin executing his ingagements in favor of the Catholics. This demand imbaraſſed him. What he had promiſed was ſecret, and not to be performed 'till after the marriage, and he was preſſed to make it public by the execution while Prince Charles was yet in Spain. This was a ſort of menace that the marriage ſhould not be ſolemniſed before he had given public marks of his ſincerity. He knew, a proclamation tolerating Popery might be attended with ill conſequences; that theſe conſequences might break off the match, and the Prince his ſon would be in danger of being detained by the Spaniard. To free himſelf from this perplexity, he reſolved to give the embaſſadors ſome ſatisfaction, by delivering into their hands a declaration of his council, containing his intention concerning this affair. In all appearance, the embaſſadors were prevailed on to agree its performance ſhould be defered, by reaſon of the accidents it might produce. The declaration ran thus: viz.

And his Majeſty is likewiſe " pleaſed, that his general pardon ſhall remain in " being five years, to the end all who will may in " that time take it out; and his Majeſty will give " order for the comfort of the poorer ſort, that " the pardon ſhall not be coſtly, but ſuch like " courſe ſhall be taken as was in a like occaſion " at his Majeſty's coming into England; and that " it ſhall be lawful to put as many as can be poſſi- " ble into one pardon.

This declaration, ſigned by ſecretary Conway and ſuch privy-counſellors as were moſt in his Majeſty's confidence, was in all appearance remited to Spain, as a pledge of James's intention to perform his ingagements. At Madrid it was the earl of Briſtol found means to have either the original itſelf, or a copy, which he produced before the parliament in 1626, as a manifeſtation of what Buckingham had negociated in Spain without his privity. It is evident; firſt, That this declaration ſuppoſes the above-inſerted ſecret articles; ſecondly, That the earl of Briſtol would not have ventured to produce it in parliament, had he not been able to prove it no forgery.

Death of Gregory XV. which renders void the diſpenſation. Wilſon. Annals.

While all this paſſed in England, news came to Madrid of Gregory XV's death, which was a freſh obſtacle to the concluſion of the marriage. When Cottington arrived from England with the ratification of the articles, the nuncio refuſed delivering the diſpenſation, alledging that the nuptial ceremonial not being yet ſolemniſed, the defunct Pope's diſpenſation was of no force, and therefore it was requiſite to wait the election of a new Pontif, who might grant a valid diſpenſation. By this accident the Prince of Wales found himſelf detained in Spain 'till a new Pope was choſen: Nevertheleſs, the twenty ninth of Auguſt was appointed for celebrating the matrimonials, in a ſuppoſition, that by then there would be a Pope and a new diſpenſation.

Prince Charles forced to ſtay for a new diſpenſation. Wilſon.

Mean while, reſtitution of the Palatinate was not talked of, or if mentioned, it was only by way of converſation, without any poſitive demand on the King of Spain, or his miniſters: I have already ſhewn the reaſon. As to temporal articles, they were in the ſame ſtate as when Prince Charles came to Madrid, and nothing ſigned on either ſide; ſo that if the diſpenſation arrived before the twenty ninth of Auguſt, the marriage muſt have been either defered, or ſolemniſed before theſe articles were ſettled.

Project to perſuade the Prince to turn Papiſt. Ruſhworth, p. 262.

But the court of Spain was intent on a project of greater moment; I mean, uſing indeavors to perſuade the Prince of Wales to turn Papiſt: nor is their hope of ſucceeding much to be wondered at, conſidering what had paſſed. Beſide, if we may credit the earl of Briſtol, in the impeachment he brought before the parliament againſt Buckingham, that duke gave the Spaniards too much room to expect this pretended converſion: nor are we to ſeek any other reaſon for delaying the diſpenſation. Urban VIII, who was elected the ſixth of Auguſt, would not have failed diſpatching it, had he not waited for this happy event, which he indeavored to expedite by his letters to the Prince and duke of Buckingham. This finally occaſioned the intire breaking off this marriage, after ſo many tedious procraſtinations.

Urban VIII, choſen Pope, denies to grant the diſpenſation. Annals.

I have very carefully ſearched after the real cauſe of this breach, but could never meet with any thing ſatisfactory. All agree, it was the duke of Buckingham who firſt inſpired Prince Charles, and afterwards his Majeſty, with the thought; but it is difficult to gueſs his motive, and what induced him to break his firſt meaſures, and purſue a contrary courſe, ſo obſcurely is this point explained by the hiſtorians. Some ſay, the duke rendered himſelf contemptible and odious to the court of Spain, by affecting to follow the French faſhions, in almoſt every thing oppoſite to the Spaniſh: that, for this reaſon, ſeeing the Infanta and Spaniards would have great power at the court of England, he imagined they might at length do him ſome ill turn, and therefore reſolved to break off the match. Others ſay that count Olivarez, King Philip IV's favorite, reminding Buckingham of his promiſe that Prince Charles ſhould turn Catholic, that duke gave him the lie to his face, and thence-forwards ſought means to quit the Spaniſh court, for fear of the count's revenge. Some affirm that the Queen of Bohemia, perceiving there was no likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by this marriage, and having much more reaſon to expect great advantages from a rupture between England and Spain, ſent Buckingham a truſty meſſenger, with certain offers, in caſe he would procure a breach. This is not improbable, and the Hollanders, to whom ſuch union between Spain and England muſt needs have been prejudicial, might well be concerned in the project. In fine, Buckingham's greateſt favorers pretend, that this duke, having ſounded the King of Spain's intentions as to reſtoring the Palatinate, found there was nothing to be expected, and therefore reſolved to break off a match deſigned not for any other purpoſe: it is at leaſt certain that the King, Prince and duke made uſe of this pretenſe to juſtify the rupture.

However this be, Buckingham being ſo determined ſoon prevailed on Prince Charles, over whom he had now a very great aſcendant. In the execution of this deſign, two difficulties were to be ſurmounted. The firſt was, to obtain King James's conſent. The ſecond to get Prince Charles out of Spain. Buckingham muſt have been thoro'ly ſatisfied of his power over the King, to hope he could at once incline him to deſiſt from a project which for ſeven whole years he had ſo conſtantly purſued, at the very time all was concluded, and nothing wanting but the matrimonial ceremonies. He however deſpaired not of ſucceeding, and therefore gave him notice; That he had at laſt diſcovered the King of Spain's inſincerity: that not only he had no inclination to cauſe the Palatinate to be reſtored, but alſo was far from having the leaſt thought of accompliſhing the marriage, and the Prince was in danger of being detained in Spain all his life. To ſupport what Buckingham urged, Prince Charles alſo wrote to the King, his father, telling him, " He muſt now look upon his ſiſter " and her children, never thinking more of him, " and forgeting he ever had ſuch a ſon." King James fell, or rather threw himſelf into this ſnare, without the leaſt reflection, and wrote inſtantly to Buckingham, to bring away the Prince at all events; ſending likewiſe at the ſame time ſome ſhips to San Andero, in Biſcay, to take them on board.

The firſt difficulty being overcome, means were to be deviſed to quit Spain, and not give the court any ſuſpicion, which could not be effected without wounding the Prince's honor and conſcience. Happily for them, Urban VIII had not yet ſent the diſpenſation, nor even fixed any time for it: ſo Buckingham notified to his Catholic Majeſty the order he had received to bring back the Prince to England, his return being abſolutely neceſſary to remove remove the nation's jealouſy of his ſo-long ſtay in Spain: adding, his departure would cauſe no conſiderable alteration, ſince he would leave in the hands of any perſon his Majeſty ſhould pleaſe to nominate a proxy to eſpouſe the Infanta in his name, as ſoon as the diſpenſation ſhould arrive. The Catholic Monarch was ſomewhat ſurpriſed at the Prince's deſign: nevertheleſs, as he deſired not the Infanta his ſiſter ſhould go before ſpring, he imagined that, after the eſpouſals, it would be eaſier to detain her, than if the Prince of Wales was actually in Spain, and therefore he the more willingly conſented to his Highneſs's departure (1).

He leaves a proxy to celebrate the marriage. Ruſhworth, p. 103. Wilſon. Annals.

The only point therefore was to be aſſured of the celebration of the marriage, and King Philip himſelf deſired to be the Prince's proxy, jointly with Don Duarte, Infante of Portugal. The proxy was drawn by his Catholic Majeſty's ſecretary, and the Prince of Wales ſigning it, in preſenſe of ſundry witneſſes, left it in the earl of Briſtol's hands, with orders to deliver it to King Philip ten days after receit of the diſpenſation. This done, Buckingham departed firſt, under color of preparing for Prince Charles's reception on board the Engliſh fleet at San Andero. The court ſaw him go without the leaſt reluctance, or rather with a ſatisfaction equal to his impatience to be in a place of ſecurity. After his departure, all imaginable honors were done to his royal Highneſs. King Philip perſonally conducted him to the Eſcurial, where he received and feaſted him as a Prince who ſhould very ſuddenly be his brother-in-law. I ſhall not here enter on a detail of the courteſies that Prince received. It will ſuffice to ſay, that on the very day of his departure, he ſolemnly ſwore again to the marriage articles and then left with Briſtol the proxy, whereof a ſtate-ſecretary made an authentic act, ſigned by diverſe witneſſes.

Buckingham ſets out firſt. Wilſon, p. 774.

Mendoza's Relat. p. 7, &c.

Ruſhworth, p. 281. Prince Charles ſwears to the articles again.

Prince Charles took leave and ſet out, loaded with honors, careſſes, preſents, and attended by ſeveral of the court grandees who waited on him to his ſhips. No ſooner was he there, but he diſpatched to the earl of Briſtol Mr. Edward Clarke, one of Buckingham's retinue, with poſitive orders not to deliver the proxy 'till ſecurity was given him that the Infanta, after the eſpouſals, would not betake herſelf to a cloiſter, and to ſend him notice, before delivery of the proxy, what ſecurity was offered, that he might himſelf be a judge whether it was proper to accept it. This was Prince Charles's firſt artifice to gain time, apprehenſive leſt the diſpenſation would come, and the marriage be ſolemniſed before the King his father was determined to break it. The earl of Briſtol, not yet perceiving the intent of the order he had received, feared, if he ſhould ſtay to the laſt, it might obſtruct accompliſhing the marriage: wherefore he thought proper to take care, before the diſpenſation ſhould arrive, to know what ſecurity the court of Spain would give concerning the Prince's ſcruple. He received as ſatisfactory a reply as he could wiſh, which he conveyed to the King and Prince by a letter.

He departs.

His orders to the earl of Briſtol. Wilſon, p. 776. Defenſe of the earl of Briſtol, in Ruſhworth, p. 297. Coke.

The Prince and duke arrived on the fifth of October at Portſmouth, and thence poſted to Royſton, where the King was. It ſeems they durſt not immediately diſcover to his Majeſty their deſign of breaking off the match, but thought fit to take ſome precautions, to render it leſs ſurpriſing. What induces me to be of this ſentiment is that, the earl of Briſtol's letter coming ſoon after, King James wrote to him, the eighth of October, that he was ſatisfied with the ſecurity offered by the court of Spain. The Prince, who probably had not yet prepared all his batteries, concealing his deſign, wrote alſo to the earl of Briſtol theſe words, which were doubtleſs to be peruſed by the King his father.

Ibid.

Prince Charles was however in danger of the diſpenſation's arriving at Madrid, before the earl of Briſtol ſhould have received a poſitive order not to deliver the proxy, ſince in that caſe he would have been obliged to execute what was injoined him by the Prince himſelf, at his leaving the Eſcurial: but this riſk was to be run; there being no avoiding it, before the King was determined to a breach. It is true, himſelf and Buckingham had now begun to inſtil into James's mind doubts with regard to reſtoring the Palatinate. On this account, his ſaid Majeſty, in his letter October 8, told the earl of Briſtol, that he hoped to receive, before Chriſtmaſs, the agreeable news both of his ſon's marriage, and ſon-in-law's reſtoration (3). Tho' this was no expreſs order to demand the Palatinate before the eſpouſals, nevertheleſs the earl of Briſtol thought proper to take ſome care of a buſineſs ſo much neglected during the Prince's ſtay in Spain, and even ſince the marriage-articles were ſettled. He mentioned it therefore to Olivarez, and made him ingage that the proxy ſhould not be demanded, 'till a written promiſe was put into his hands that the Palatinate ſhould be reſtored. Of this he informed King James, in a letter of the twenty-third of November, wherein he told him, he hoped by Chriſtmaſs he ſhould congratulate the Prince his ſon, and the Princeſs his daughter, the one upon his marriage, the other upon the end of her ſufferings.

It muſt be obſerved that the Prince of Wales, before he left Spain, had imployed artifice to gain time, knowing he could not break off the marriage without his father's conſent. He had cauſed it to be inſerted in the proxy, that it ſhould remain in full force only 'till Chriſtmaſs. He hoped the diſpenſation would not arrive before that time, or if it came but a few days before, the proxy would be uſeleſs: and in effect, as Briſtol was not to deliver it 'till ten days after the diſpenſation reached Madrid, if the tenth day was after Chriſtmaſs-day, the proxy would be of no force, by virtue of the inſerted clauſe. But this precaution was not ſufficient, becauſe the diſpenſation might happen to be at Madrid above ten days before Chriſtmaſs. This finally obliged the Prince and duke to diſcover their ſecrets to his Majeſty. Whether James yielded to their reaſons, or thro' exceſſive condeſcenſion for his ſon and favorite would not vex them by a denial, he wrote to the earl of Briſtol, the thirteenth of November, expreſly ordering him, not to deliver the proxy 'till after Chriſtmaſs: that is, when it was no longer valid. Moreover he injoined him not to diſcover this order to the court of Spain 'till the very laſt. This letter was ſent to the earl by three (1) ſeveral meſſengers, two by land and one by ſea, for fear of accidents. It came in a critical time, for the diſpenſation arrived at Madrid the begining of December, new ſtile (2), and his Majeſty's letter the thirteenth of November old ſtile. On receit of the diſpenſation, King Philip immediately ordered all requiſites towards celebrating the eſpouſals to be prepared (3): but the ten days being expired, and the marriage ſolemnities expected, the earl of Briſtol notified to him his royal Maſter's orders, not to deliver the proxy 'till after Chriſtmaſs. He readily comprehended his Britannic Majeſty's drift, ſince the proxy would then be invalid. That very day, he ſent the earl of Briſtol orders to demand no more audience, and gave command, that the Infanta ſhould be no longer ſtiled Princeſs of Wales, as ſhe had been ever ſince the arrival of the diſpenſation, and cauſed to ceaſe all the connubial preparations. Mean while, to caſt the whole blame on the King of England, he ſent the earl of Briſtol, on the eighth of January 1624, a written promiſe, ſigned with his own hand, whereby he ingaged to cauſe the Palatinate to be reſtored to the elector Palatine. This the earl of Briſtol, in the ſucceeding reign, affirmed before the parliament in his defenſe.

Du Cheſne. Wilſon, p. 777.

Ruſhworth, p. 298.

Scarce one of the Engliſh hiſtorians ſcruples affirming, that the want of this reſtitution occaſioned the breaking off the match, and the earl of Briſtol having demanded it of his Catholic Majeſty, as a condition without which the marriage could not be accompliſhed, Philip coldly replied; "The Pala- "tinate was none of his to give, and the Emperor "might be applied to." But this is directly contrary to the earl of Briſtol's own account, who doubtleſs knew more of this affair than any other. Lord Clarendon indeed takes care not to ſpeak like the reſt: he contents himſelf with aſcribing the breach to ſome ſecret deſign of Buckingham.

Wilſon, p. 776.

Ruſhworth, p. 296, &c. Clarendon.

Thus ended the Spaniſh match buſineſs, which had found King James ſeven whole years conſtant imployment. During all which time, he moſt earneſtly ſollicited its concluſion, and to ſucceed, ſcrupled not ſacrificing the intereſts of his ſon-in-law; his own reputation; the religion he profeſſed; the good of his people, and the laws of his realm: but when it was at length juſt on the point of accompliſhing, he ſuddenly brake it off, for reaſons never yet thoro'ly penetrated. It can only be aſcribed to his weakneſs for his favorite. Lord Clarendon ſays poſitively, the King was compeled to it by the duke of Buckingham, "who, in breaking the "marriage, reſumed the ſame impetuoſity he had "indulged to himſelf in the debate of the journey "into Spain." He adds, "the King plainly "found the Prince and duke were reſolved upon a "breach, with or without his approbation, and "that he never forgave the duke what he had done, "but retained as ſharp a memory of it as his nature "could contain." It is to be preſumed, the earl of Clarendon was well acquainted with this affair, and the more, as he is not the ſole writer who intimates that King James had neither the power nor the courage to withſtand the Prince and duke, who were ſtrictly united ſince their Spaniſh journey.

James I. An' 1623.

An' 1624. Annals, p. 86. Clarendon, p. 18. Ruſhworth, p. 113. Coke, p. 140.

Mean time, for fear the earl of Briſtol ſhould, by ſome means, renew a treaty broken with ſo little reaſon, they had him recalled. King James conſented to his return with more readineſs as he ſaw not in his court any perſon able to give good counſel how to free himſelf from the ſlavery he was under, except the earl of Briſtol, who never gave way to Buckingham's arrogance. This had drawn on him the favorite's enmity to ſuch a degree, that ever after he was continually expoſed to his perſecutions, and the indignation of Prince Charles, who liſtening to Buckingham's ſuggeſtions ſpared no indeavors to work his ruin, even when he had aſcended the throne, tho' without being able to ſucceed.

Since the Prince's and duke's return, King James no longer ruled; all his affairs were managed by them, and he only executed their counſels. He ſaw not about him any he could truſt. All his officers, all his courtiers were the duke's creatures, and the more attached to him, as they ſaw him in ſuch firm union with his royal Highneſs. In this ſituation, James had no other remedy than to ſurrender himſelf intirely to them, and do whatever they pleaſed; whether he feared their preſumption would augment by reſiſtance, or waited for ſome favorable opportunity to throw off their yoke. Not only the breach of the marriage had been reſolved between them, but alſo a war with Spain; nor durſt he contradict them, notwithſtanding his irradicable antipathy to hoſtilities. Their firſt project was, to demand for this war a benevolence of every ſubject: nay, they made the King ſign orders to levy it: Baker ſays, in his chronicle, he himſelf paid fifty pounds on this occaſion. But on a ſudden, by advice of the Prince and Buckingham, James deſiſted from this ſcheme, and reſolved to call a parliament. That was indeed the propereſt method to authoriſe his breaking off the treaty with Spain, and to procure money, which he wanted extremely.

Ruſhworth, p. 107. Clarendon, p. 20.

Every true Engliſhman had conſtantly conſidered the Spaniſh match as highly prejudicial to he kingdom. Ir was known in general, that the King, in favor of this marriage, had made large conceſſions with reſpect to religion, tho' the particulars, and eſpecially the ſecret articles, were known to very few. But the King's complaiſance towards Papiſts ſufficiently ſhewed the court of Spain had greatly prevailed with him in that reſpect. The duke of Buckingham, not being ignorant of the peoples averſion to this marriage, the breach whereof was not yet very public, doubted not gaining their affection, by procuring a parliament to be called, and declaring himſelf to be author of this felicitous rupture ſo paſſionately deſired by all good Engliſhmen. To compaſs theſe his views, he made himſelf popular, and affected to careſs both Church and State-Puritans: nay, he conſulted one of the leading Puritans * how the King might ſeize the dean and chapter Lands. Nothing could be properer to win the peoples love, moſt of the eccleſiaſtics having rendered themſelves odious, by their zeal in maintaining the prerogative royal (4). So,

Project of a match between the Prince and Henrietta Maria of France. Annals, p. 87. Ruſhworth, p. 114.

Mean while, the Prince and duke had in view another project. This was to match his Highneſs with Henrietta Maria, his Gallic Majeſty's ſiſter; whereto James readily conſented. He was ſo prepoſſeſſed with the opinion of his own grandure, that he could not once think of marrying his ſon to any but a Priuceſs royally born, and King Henry IV's third daughter was the only undiſpoſed of Princeſs ſo qualified then in Europe. Very ſeemingly, the Queen of Bohemia's meſſenger to Buckingham, when in Spain, made him the firſt overture of this match, and that duke thereupon reſolved to break off the marriage Prince Charles was on the point of concluding with the Infanta. Howſoever this may have been, James approving the project, Henry Rich lord Kenſington, was on ſome pretext ſent over to France, in order to ſound the court concerning this marriage: and, before his departure, he was created earl of Holland. I ſhall ſpeak preſently of the ſucceſs of this negociation; but muſt firſt take a view of what paſſed in the parliament, which met the 19th of February. The King made a ſpeech to both houſes ſo different from thoſe to the two preceding parliaments, that ſuch oppoſite expreſſions can ſcarcely be believed to come from the ſame Prince's mouth, was it not notorious what a ſtrange aſcendant Buckingham had over him, and how neceſſary it was to the favorite's deſigns that his Majeſty ſhould ſo expreſs himſelf. As this ſpeech is not ſo long as the others, our readers will poſſibly be glad to ſee it.

My lords and gentlemen.

James ſpeech in parliament. Annals of James I. p. 87. Wilſon. Ruſhworth, p. 115.

"I Have aſſembled you at this time, to impart to you a ſecret, and matter of as great importance as can be to my ſtate, and the ſtate of my cbildren; wherein I crave your beſt and ſafeſt advice and counſel, according as the writ whereby you were aſſembled, imports, 'That the King would adviſe with you in matters concerning his eſtate and dignity.' And as I have indeavored, by this and the like ways, to procure and cheriſh the love of my people towards me, ſo I do hope, and my hope is exceeded by faith: for I fully now believe, that never any King was more beloved of his people; whom as you, my lords and gentlemen, do here repreſent, ſo would I have you truly to repreſent all their loves to me; that in you, as in a true mirror or glaſs, I may perfectly behold it, and not as in a falſe glaſs which repreſents it not at all, or otherwiſe than it is indeed. Give me your free and faithful counſels in the matter I propoſe, of which you have often heard; the match of my ſon: wherein, as you may know, I have expended much time with great coſt in long treaties, deſiring always therein (and not without reaſon hoping to have effected my deſires) the advancement of my ſtate and children, and the general peace of Chriſtendom, wherein I have always conſtantly labored, depending upon fair hopes and promiſes. At the earneſt inſtance of my ſon, I was contented (altho' it was of a moſt extraordinary nature) to ſend him to proſecute his deſires in Spain; and for his more ſafety, ſent Buckingham (in whom I ever repoſed moſt truſt of my perſon) with him, with this command, 'continually to be preſent with him, and never to leave him, 'till he had returned again ſafely unto me.' Which he performed, tho' not with that effect in the buſineſs which I expected, yet not altogether without profit; for it taught me this point of wiſdom, 'Qui verſatur in generalibus,' is eaſily deceived, and that generality brings nothing to good iſſue; but that before any matter can be fully finiſhed, it muſt be brought to particulars: for when, as I thought, the affair had been, before their going, produced to a narrow point, relying upon their general propoſitions, I found, when they came there, the matter proved to be ſo raw, as if it had never been treated of; the generals giving them eaſy ways to invade, and affording them means to avoid the effecting any thing (1).

James I. An' 1624.

"The particulars which paſſed in the treaty, I mean not now to diſcover to you, the time being too ſhort. I refer you to Charles and Buckingham, and the ſecretaries reports, who ſhall relate to you all the particulars. And after that, 'Super totam materiam,' I deſire your beſt aſſiſtance to adviſe me what is beſt and fiteſt for me to do, for the good of the commonwealth, and the advancement of religion, and the good of my ſon, and my grandchildren of the Palatinate. And of our eſtate, I know you cannot but be ſenſible, conſidering that your welfare conſiſts in ours, and you ſhall be ſure to have your ſhare in what miſery ſhall befal us: and therefore I need to urge no other argument to you in this behalf, in offering me your wiſeſt and ſureſt counſel and fartherance. And I aſſure you in the faith of a Chriſtian King, that it is 'res integra,' preſented unto you, and that I ſtand not bound, nor either way ingaged, but remain free to follow what ſhall be beſt adviſed.

"To plant is not ſufficient, unleſs, like good gardeners, you pluck up the weeds which will choak your labors: and the greateſt weeds among you are jealouſies; root them out. For my actions, I dare avow them before God; but jealouſies are of a ſtrange depth. I am the huſband and you the wife, and it is ſubject to the wife to be jealous of her huſband: let this be far from you. I can truly ſay, and will avouch it before the ſeat of God and angels, that never King governed with a purer, ſincerer and more uncorrupt heart, than I have done, far from all will and meaning of the leaſt error or imperfection of my reign.

"It hath been talked of my remiſſneſs in maintenance of religion, and ſuſpicion of a toleration: but, as God ſhall judge me, I never thought nor meaned, not ever in word expreſſed any thing which favored of it (2). It is true, that at times, for reaſons beſt known to my ſelf, I did not ſo fully put thoſe laws in execution, but did wink and connive at ſome things which might have hindered more weighty affairs; but I never, in all my treaties, ever agreed to any thing to the overthrow and diſagreeing of thoſe laws, but had in all a chief preſervation of that truth which I had ever profeſſed; and as, in that reſpect, I have a charitable conceit of you, I would have you have the like of me alſo, in which I did not tranſgreſs: for it is a good horſeman's part not always to uſe his ſpurs, and Cenſures on his ſpeech. Coke.

This ſpeech, like the reſt made by King James to his parliament, was liable to many cenſures not a little reflecting on his ſincerity. It could not be conceived, that he really believed himſelf better beloved by his people than any of his predeceſſors, ſince no King ever had ſuch frequent quarrels with his parliament, which certainly is no very proper method to win the peoples affection. Thoſe who were acquainted with the ſtate of affairs, thought it very ſtrange his Majeſty ſhould tell the parliament that, at the Prince's arrival in Spain, the affair was ſo raw as if it had been never treated of, ſince he had already ſigned the matrimonial articles, and, as to the Palatinate, he would not have it mentioned before the marriage was accompliſhed. The ſame perſons could not forbear wondering, he ſhould call God to witneſs, he never ſo much as thought or intended to grant the Papiſts a toleration, ſince it was one of the ſecret articles of the marriage, and ſince, without being informed of any ſuch article, it was eaſy to perceive that with this view alone Philip gave his ſiſter to the Prince of Wales. Laſtly, ſome malicious perſons obſerved, that when the King ſaid, he never intended to invade the peoples liberties, they might very juſtly apply to him the ſimile, which himſelf had uſed on another occaſion, of him who took a man's purſe, aſſuring him, he had no deſign to rob him.

Buckingham explains the pretended reaſons for breaking off the match. Febr. 24.

Some days after James had delivered his ſpeech, the two houſes determining on a conference, to examine the affair recommended by his Majeſty, the Prince and Buckingham repaired thither and informed them of all particulars. Prince Charles having ſpoken a few words, the duke of Buckingham began and made a long harangue, which he divided into ſix heads, under color of giving matters clearer explication, but in reality to confound them, and conceal the reciprocal coherence of the particulars he was to relate. Under the firſt head, he ſet forth the motives of his royal Highneſs's journey to Spain. In the ſecond, he ſpake of the marriage treaty apart by itſelf. In the third, he joined together the two affairs of the marriage and Palatinate. In the fourth, he declared the reaſons of his Highneſs's return. In the fifth, he informed the parliament of his Majeſty's ſubſequent proceedings in the marriage and Palatinate affairs ſince Prince Charles return. In the ſixth and laſt, he ſtated the queſtion, wherein both houſes were to offer his Majeſty their advice. While he was ſpeaking, he turned, at the end of every point, to the Prince, aſking him, whether what he was ſaying was not true? to which the Prince failed not anſwering: " Yes, it is true ", or to the like purport. The drift of this whole oration was to make appear; that his Majeſty had been unadviſely ingaged in the marriage treaty, by the falſe hopes given him by the earl of Briſtol: that the court of Spain never intended this alliance, much leſs to reſtore the Palatinate, tho' the earl of Briſtol aſſured the contrary: that the Prince had been ill treated in Spain, and much preſſed to turn Papiſt: finally; he intimated, that none was blamable but the earl of Briſtol, who had abuſed his Majeſty's confidence. Nothing is eaſier than to accuſe one who is abſent. It is only concealing what makes for him, giving a ſiniſter turn his moſt innocent actions, agravating the faults he may have commited, and loading him with crimes whereof he is not guilty. This is preciſely what Buckingham did with regard to the earl of Briſtol, and this with the Prince's approbation and aſſiſtance: all which is ſo true that, two years after, Charles being on the throne, and having himſelf accuſed the earl of high treaſon, Briſtol, in his defenſe to the parliament, gave a narrative of the Spaniſh negociation quite different from Buckingham's. He proved what he ſaid by unexceptionable papers, and defied the duke to anſwer them. He not only affirmed, that Buckingham's whole report was falſe, but alſo impeached him in form, and gave in to the upper houſe his impeachment, which remained unanſwered. This is ſufficient to maniſeſt the falſeneſs of Buckingham's narrative: ſo I think it needleſs to expatiate farther upon this ſubject.

Remark on this ſpeech.

Ib. p. 246.

However, the duke of Buckingham's ſpeech was received with applauſe, for ſeveral reaſons. Firſt, he had made a party in the two houſes. Secondly, he had prevented the marriage from being concluded in Spain; which was counted a piece of moſt agreeable ſervice, both by parliament and people. Thirdly, he had brought home the Prince, contrary to all expectation, and thereby baniſhed thoſe juſt apprehenſions the Engliſh had conceived. Finally, as Buckingham's narrative being atteſted by the Prince himſelf, it could not be imagined fictitious. Conſidering the public's ignorance of the ſecret circumſtances of this negociation, it is no wonder the parliament ſhould credit what was told them by the King, Prince and favorite: but afterwards, when all was unveiled, people were of a quite different ſentiment.

The Spaniſh embaſſador, being informed of what paſſed at the conference between the two houſes, demanded audience of his Majeſty, and loudly complained, that Buckingham had reflected on the Catholic Monarch's honor (1): adding, if any of his maſter's ſubjects had ſpoken thus of the King of England, it would have coſt him his head. Seemingly, his ſaid excellency hath been miſ-informed, ſince the duke had not uſed any offenſive expreſſions againſt his Catholic Majeſty: he had only inſinuated, that King Philip had never any other intention than to amuſe the King and Prince. As Buckingham was now the parliament's favorite, as well as the King's and Prince's, both houſes openly took his part, and addreſſed his Majeſty, declaring, the duke had ſaid nothing which could give offenſe to the King of Spain, and thanking him for his faithful relation atteſted by his royal Highneſs. James was ſo delighted with this addreſs, that he went and thanked the two houſes in a ſpeech, wherein he forgot not to trumpet forth the praiſes of his favorite. He ſaid, he could not doubt the veracity of his report, becauſe he made the very ſame to himſelf at his return from Spain. But King James muſt have been wilfully blind not to ſee the falſity of his ſaid grace's relation, or been moſt unaccountably over-awed by that favorite, if he was made to atteſt before the parliament what he knew to be ungenuine.

The parliament ſides with James. Ruſhworth, p. 126.

Ibid. p. 127.

It highly pleaſed the parliament to find his Majeſty diſpoſed to break off the Spaniſh match, not knowing, or feigning not to know it was really broken by the affront put upon the Catholic Monarch; but King James having affirmed, it was yet "Res "integra," the two houſes could not uſe other language: ſo, forgeting all former occaſions of diſcontent, and applying themſelves wholly to the affair propoſed by his Majeſty, they jointly preſented a petition, adviſing him to diſcontinue the treaty on foot with Spain, as well for reſtitution of the Palatinate, as for the marriage. They grounded their advice upon four principal reaſons: the firſt was, that, when the treaty commenced, the Spaniards inſiſted only upon liberty of conſcience to the Infanta and her family, with the free exerciſe of their religion: but that afterwards, taking advantage of the Prince's being in their power, they importuned a general toleration, contrary to the uſage of other Catholic Princes in the like treaties: that beſide, the Popiſh faction had ſo increaſed, during the negociation, that there was no way to ſuppreſs them as long as the treaty ſubſiſted.

The parliament adviſes him to break the Spaniſh match. Wilſon. p. 780. Annals p. 94. Ruſhworth, p. 128.

The ſecond reaſon was, that while this treaty continued, the Proteſtant party in Germany was oppreſſed, and the Palatinate invaded: that the Spaniards had impoſed on his Majeſty, and offered indignity to his royal Highneſs, by importuning him to change his religion, contrary to the law of hoſpitality and privilege of Princes.

The third was grounded on the Spaniards inſincerity, as well in the former overture of marriage for the late Prince Henry, as in this; on the affrontive propoſal made his Majeſty, of Prince Charles's becoming a Papiſt; and on the deceit uſed in the treaty of Bruſſels, whoſe ſole end was the reduction of Heidelberg.

Laſtly, the parliament added as a fourth reaſon; tranſlating the electorate to the duke of Bavaria; the King of Spain's letter to count Olivarez, with that miniſter's anſwer; whereby it was evidently manifeſt the Spaniards never intended to accompliſh the marriage; the ſhift deviſed by a Junto of theologians, to ſend home Prince Charles without the Infanta.

All theſe reaſons were ſo many indirect reproaches to King James, for ſuffering himſelf to be ſo long amuſed. But that Monarch, feigning not to perceive it, went to the houſe and made a ſpeech, to ſhew he could not break off the treaties without knowing how to maintain the war which would unavoidably follow, ſince the Palatinate was to be recovered by arms. He declared therefore, if they thought proper to ingage in a war with Spain, he would readily conſent the ſupply to be granted ſhould be managed by commiſſioners of the parliament's nomination: moreover, he promiſed the two houſes, he would not make a peace without their advice. He concluded with ſaying: "I am ſo deſirous to forget all rents in former par- "liaments, that it ſhall not be my default, if I am "not in love with parliaments, and call them "often, and deſire to end my life in that inter- "courſe between me and my people, for the "making of good laws, reforming of ſuch abuſes "as I cannot be well informed of but in par- "liament, and maintaining the good government "of the commonwealth".

King James conſents to the breach, and demands aid. Ruſhworth, p. 129. Annals, p. 94.

How different is this ſpeech from thoſe which James made to the former parliaments! But this King's own ſentiments are not ſo viſible in theſe expreſſions as is the policy of Buckingham, who, after breaking the Prince's marriage, had a mind to puſh his point, and proclaim war with Spain. To ſucceed, a parliament muſt be called, and to gain their affection, the King muſt talk after this manner.

James I. An' 1624.

Some days after, the commons addreſſed his Majeſty, offering to grant him three intire ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, on his public declaration for diſſolving the marriage and Palatinate treaties: but they took him at his word, as to his offer that the money ſhould be diſpoſed of by commiſſioners of their own nomination. James thanked them for their affectionate expreſſions, and told them, he was reſolved for the future ſolely to confide in his parliament: after which, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the court of Spain, with his ultimate determination to break off the treaty: but hearing of a ſharp petition againſt Popiſh recuſants, preparing in parliament in order to preſent it him, he himſelf wrote to ſecretary Conway in theſe very terms.

The commons offer him money. Wilſon, p. 782. Ruſhworth, p. 135. Annals, p. 97.

Wilſon, p. 780.

He has notice of a ſtinging petition againſt the recuſants.

"I Doubt not but you heard what a ſtinging pe- "tition againſt the Papiſts the lower-houſe have "ſent to the higher-houſe this day, that they may "jointly preſent it unto me. You know my firm "reſolution, not to make this a war of religion; "and ſeeing I would be loth to be cony-catched "by my people, I pray you ſtay the poſt which "is going to Spain, 'till I meet with my ſon, who "will be here to morrow morning: do it upon "pretext of ſome more letters ye are to ſend by "him; and if he ſhould be gone, haſten after him "to ſtay him upon ſome ſuch pretext; and let none "living know of this, as you love me. And before "two in the afternoon, to morrow, you ſhall without "fail hear from me. Farewell".

Seemingly, James ſurmiſed that, in this addreſs, the houſes would have demanded things he had no deſign to grant; and therefore, for fear of being forced to diſſolve the parliament, he would not haſten a breach with Spain: but afterwards, being told the petition (1) contained nothing of what he dreaded, he ſuffered the meſſenger to depart. The people no ſooner knew a rupture with Spain was reſolved, but the whole city of London was illuminated, which ſufficiently denoted a general diſlike of the Spaniſh match, and the danger whereto religion had been expoſed. It was not yet known, that another no leſs dangerous marriage was already negociating in France.

The people expreſs great joy at breaking the match. Coke.

(1) The ſtinging petition, which was framed by the commons, and ſent to the lords, was afterwards reduced to another form, and preſented to the King. This which follows here ſeems to be an extract of the firſt before it was reduced, the other being reduced to two petitions. See Wilſon, p. 784.

Petition of both houſes to the King. Ruſhworth, p. 141. Wilſon. Annals of James I. p. 100.

The petition, preſented to his Majeſty by both houſes, contained the ſeven ſubſequent articles:

" I. That all Jeſuits and ſeminary prieſts may " be commanded forthwith to depart the realm, " and not to return hither again, on peril of the " ſevereſt penalty of the laws now in force againſt " them.

" II. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to give " charge to all juſtices of the peace, that they take " from Popiſh recuſants all ſuch armor, gun- " powder and amunition of any kind, as are found " in their poſſeſſion.

" III. That all Popiſh recuſants be commanded " forthwith to retire themſelves from or about " London, to their ſeveral dwelings, or places by " the laws appointed, and there to remain confined " within five miles of their habitations: and for " that purpoſe to diſcharge all by-paſſed licenſes " granted them; and that they preſume not any " time thereafter to enter London, or come within " ten miles of London, or to the King's or Prince's " court whereſoever.

" IV. That his Majeſty would forbid and re- " ſtrain the great reſort of his own ſubjects for the " hearing maſs, to the houſes of foreign em- " baſſadors.

" V. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to diſ- " charge Popiſh recuſants from thoſe places of " truſt, by which they have that power in the " country where they live as is not fit to be put " into the hands of perſons ſo affected.

" VI. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed gene- " rally to put the laws in due execution againſt " Popiſh recuſants; and that all his judges, juſtices, " &c. may be commanded to do their duty therein.

" VII. That ſeeing they were happily delivered " from that danger which the treaties with Spain " would certainly have drawn upon England, his " Majeſty would be pleaſed to ingage his royal " word, that, upon no occaſion of marriage or " treaty, or other requeſt in that behalf from any " foreign Prince or ſtates whatſoever, he will take " off or ſlacken due execution of the laws againſt " Popiſh recuſants (1)."

To which petition his Majeſty returned this anſwer.

My lords and gentlemen of both houſes,

The King's anſwer. Ruſhworth, p. 143. Wilſon. Annals of James I. p. 101.

" I Cannot but commend your zeal in offering " this petition to me: yet, on the other ſide, I " cannot but hold my ſelf unfortunate, that I " ſhould be thought to need a ſpur to do that " which my conſcience and duty bind me unto. " What religion I am of, my books do declare, " my profeſſion and behavior do ſhew; and I hope " in God I ſhall never live to be thought otherwiſe; " ſurely I ſhall never deſerve it; and for my part, " I wiſh it may be written in marble, and remain " to poſterity as a mark upon me, when I ſhall " ſwerve from my religion; for he who doth diſ- " ſemble with God, is not to be truſted with men.

" My lords, for my part, I proteſt before God, " that my heart hath bled when I have heard of " the increaſe of Popery: God is my judge, it " hath been ſuch a great grief to me, that it hath " been as thorns in my eyes, and pricks in my " ſides; and ſo far have I been, and ſhall be from " turning another way. And, my lords and gen- " tlemen, you ſhall be my confeſſors, that one " way or other it hath been my deſire to hinder " the growth of Popery; and I could not be an " honeſt man if I ſhould have done otherwiſe. " And this I may ſay farther, that if I be not a " martyr, I am ſure I am a confeſſor; and in ſome " ſenſe I may be called a martyr, as, in the ſcrip- " ture, Iſaac was perſecuted by Iſhmael, by mock- " ing words: for never King ſuffered more ill " tongues than I have done, and I am ſure for no " cauſe; yet I have been far from perſecution; " for I have ever thought that no way more in- " creaſed any religion than perſecution, according " to that ſaying, 'Sanguis martyrum eſt ſemen " eccleſiæ.'

James I. An' 1624.

" Now, my lords and gentlemen, for your pe- " tition, I will not only grant the ſubſtance of what " you crave, but add ſomewhat more of my own; " for the two treaties being already annulled (as I " have declared them to be) it neceſſarily follow- " eth of it ſelf that which you deſire, and there- " fore it needs no more; but that I do declare by " proclamation (which I am ready to do) that all " jeſuits and prieſts do depart by a day; but it can- " not be as you deſire by our proclamation, to be " out of all my dominions; for a proclamation " here extendeth but to this kingdom.

" This I will do and more; I will command " all my judges when they go their circuits to keep " the ſame courſes, for puting all the laws in exe- " cution againſt recuſants, as they were wont to do " before theſe treaties, for the laws are ſtill in " force, and were never diſpenſed with by me: " God is my judge, they were never ſo intended " by me, but as I told you in the begining of the " parliament, you muſt give me leave, as a good " horſeman, ſometimes to uſe the reins, and not " always to uſe the ſpurs: ſo now there needs no- " thing but my declaration for diſarming them; " that is ready done by the laws, and ſhall be " done as you deſired: and more, I will take or- " der for the ſhameful diſorder of the reſorting of " my ſubjects to all foreign embaſſadors; for this " I will adviſe with my council how it may be beſt " reformed. It is true, that the houſes of embaſſa- " dors are privileged places; and tho' they cannot " take them out of their houſes, yet the lord mayor " and Mr. recorder of London, may take ſome of " them as they come from thence, and make them " examples. Another point I will add concerning " the education of their children, of which I have " had a principal care, as the lord of Canterbury " and the biſhop of Wincheſter, and other lords of " my council can bear me witneſs, with whom I " have adviſed about this buſineſs; for, in good " faith, it is a ſhame their children ſhould be bred " here as if they were at Rome: ſo I do grant not " only your deſire, but more. I am ſorry I was " not the firſt mover of it to you, but had you not " done it I would have done it my ſelf.

" Now for the ſecond part of your petition, you " have here given me the beſt advice in the world; " for it is againſt the rule of a wiſdom, that a " King ſhould ſuffer any of his ſubjects to tranſgreſs " the laws, by the interceſſion of other Princes; " and therefore aſſure your ſelves, that (by the " grace of God) I will be careful that no ſuch " conditions be foiſted in upon any other treaty " whatſoever; for it is fit my ſubjects ſhould ſtand " and fall to their own laws."

What a bleſſed harmony is here between the King and his parliament! Nothing can be more affable, more obliging than this anſwer, and the free and eaſy manner wherewith he came into the two houſes meaſures. To render complete their happineſs, nothing was wanting but the performance of his Majeſty's promiſes, which how carefully he obſerved will appear immediately.

The parliament preſents his Majeſty a liſt of the Papiſts in poſts. Wilſon, p. 785.

James had artfully avoided anſwering the two main articles of the petition, viz. the third and fifth, wherein the parliament required, that all Papiſts ſhould be removed from London and the court, and diſcharged from all places of truſt. Had he acquieſced to theſe two demands his court would have intirely changed countenance. Buckingham's mother, who by her ſon's means diſpoſed of all imploys, muſt have been removed. His ducheſs would likewiſe have been of this number, as well as one of the ſtate-ſecretaries, with many others who had conſiderable charges at court, and in the country (1). His Majeſty's ſilence on this head, occaſioned the parliament to draw a liſt of fifty ſeven Popiſh lords and knights, who were in public offices, and preſent it to the King: but it appears not that he took much notice of it. As it nearly concerned the duke of Buckingham, very probably, he hindered James from giving the parliament any ſatisfaction in this point, and the houſes did not much inſiſt upon it, that they might not too openly offend a perſon of ſuch great credit with both King and Prince.

The Spaniſh embaſſador privately informs againſt Buckingham. Coke, p. 154. Ruſhworth, p. 144.

But tho' no Engliſhman durſt attack the favorite directly, a foreigner however undertook to ruin him with his Majeſty. This was marquis Ynojoſa, the Spaniſh embaſſador, who deing inraged at Buckingham's unworthy manner of breaking off the marriage, burned with deſire to revenge the inſult offered his royal maſter and the Infanta. One day, as King James was very ſlenderly attended, he took opportunity to deliver him a paper, with a wink that he ſhould conceal it. The King put it in his pocket, and withdrew alone to his cloſet to read it. He was exceſſively ſurpriſed at finding herein the ſubſequent particulars.

Buckingham on the point of being diſcarded. Hacket. Wilſon. Coke. Weldon, p. 153, 154.

King James diſcourſed with the ſecretary, and had likewiſe a private conference with Padre Maeſtro, a Spaniſh Jeſuit. It is not known what theſe men told him (2); but the King was, after theſe converſations, obſerved to grow extremely ſad, and his temper to be quite changed. He affected, in ſpeaking to the Prince and duke, to uſe broken and myſterious expreſſions, which ſhewed ſomething lay heavy upon his mind (3). At length James, one day, as he was taking coach for Windſor, ordered the duke (4), on ſome ſlight pretenſe, to ſtay behind. Buckingham thereupon, no longer doubting his diſgrace, beſought him for God's ſake, to tell him what was laid to his charge. The King only anſwered, he was the unhappieſt man alive, to be forſaken of thoſe who were moſt dear to him (5), and, taking with him the Prince his ſon, left Buckingham at London. The duke overwhelmed with grief, retired home, deeming himſelf irrecoverably ruined: but, by the advice of the lord-keeper Williams, he went inſtantly to Windſor,

(1) This obſervation is grounded upon our author's miſtake, in imagining the petition, containing the ſeven articles, was preſented to the King; whereas it was new modeled, and the IIId and Vth articles, &c. omited. So it is no wonder King James ſhould not take notice of them in his ſpeech. The petition, as it was preſented to his Majeſty, is to be ſeen in Wilſon, p. 784.

(2) Weldon ſays, Maeſtro had learned, under confeſſion, that the King was by Buckingham, or his procurement, to be killed, but whether by poiſon, piſtol, or dagger, he could not tell, p. 153. Whereupont he King ſaid to Buckingham at the next interview, Ah! Steiny, Steiny, wilt thou kill me? The duke, aſtoniſhed at this expreſſion, indeavored with the ſtrongeſt proteſtations to juſtify his integrity, which the King readily believed. Wilſon, p. 783.

(3) The King required of them particular proofs; but all their anſwers conſiſted in arguments againſt declaring the names of the conſpirators; whereupon the King's privy-council, and others of the principal men of the nation were examined upon oath; but nothing was diſcovered. where he found means to remove the King's ſuſpicion: at leaſt James feigned to be cured of them. But the earl of Clarendon, in his hiſtory, confirms what is by others aſſerted, viz. that the duke had intirely loſt his Majeſty's favor. Mean while, James was naturally ſo timorous, that, inſtead of freeing himſelf from a favorite whom he might eaſily have diſcarded, he gave himſelf up more and more to him, ſo apprehenſive was he of his union with the Prince. He impatiently waited for the earl of Briſtol's arrival, to uſe his advice: but means were found to prevent him from declaring his mind, or even ſpeaking to him.

The Prince and duke cauſe the treaſurer to be condemned in ſpite of the King. Wilſon, p. 78. Clarendon. Weldon, p. 142, 166. Howes. Coke.

Before the parliament broke up, James received from the Prince and duke a freſh mortification. While they were in Spain, Lionel Cranfield, lord-treaſurer, lately created earl of Middleſex, having the reſolution ſometimes to refuſe them the exorbitant ſums they demanded, they reſolved to ruin him at their return. To effect this, they imployed their credit with the parliament, and cauſed him to be by their creatures accuſed of miſmanagement in the diſcharge of his office. James, knowing this came from them, deſired them, for God's ſake, to uſe their intereſt with the two houſes to drop the impeachment: but they remained immovably inflexible to all his Majeſty's intreaties. So the lord treaſurer was condemned in a fine of fifty thouſand pounds, and declared incapable of ever ſiting in the houſe of peers. All the hiſtorians agree he deſerved not a treatment ſo rigorous. But the duke, who had raiſed him from the duſt, was willing to ſhew he was powerful enough to reduce him to his primitive ſtate, by way of example to all who ſhould dare to reſiſt him. After this it muſt not be thought ſtrange if James, when he ſpake to this parliament, appeared ſo different from what he was with reſpect to the two former: not that he had changed his ſentiments and maxims, but durſt not do any thing without direction from Prince Charles and Buckingham, who had formed projects wherein they ſtood in need of a parliament. Lord Clarendon affirms, the King was extremely ſurpriſed, in the begining of this parliament, when he was informed of the contents of the duke of Buckingham's report, concerning the marriage treaty: "a narration (ſays "that illuſtrious hiſtorian) which, for the moſt "part, the King himſelf knew to be untrue." However, as has been obſerved, he had the weakneſs to atteſt the truth of it, and to affirm the duke to have made to himſelf a like narrative. There cannot be a clearer evidence of his ſubjection to the Prince and favorite.

James awed by the Prince and duke.

Vol. I.

Obliged to diſgrace the earl of Briſtol. Clarendon. Wilſon.

Here follows likewiſe another remarkable proof of King James's weakneſs or timidity. He ſaw no remedy but in ſuch counſels as he hoped for from the earl of Briſtol, whoſe return he impatiently expected: nevertheleſs that nobleman was no ſooner arrived in England, but his Majeſty was forced, by expreſs orders ſent him at Dover, to forbid his approaching the court, but that he ſhould remain at his own houſe 'till he had anſwered certain queſtions which ſhould be put to him by ſome of the council.

May 29.

The parliament being ſoon after prorogued, Briſtol wrote frequently to his Majeſty, intreating that he might be examined. James wiſhed it; but it was not the intereſt of either Prince Charles or Buckingham, who ſtill found freſh excuſes to defer ſuch examination. Briſtol was however, after much ſollicitation, at length examined, and returned ſuch anſwers that his examiners could not help declaring his conduct was irreproachable: but this could not procure his liberty, or admitance into his Majeſty's preſenſe. Buckingham ſent him notice, that he was much miſtaken if he imagined his anſwers were ſatisfactory to the King, Prince, or to himſelf: but his only way to come into favor again, was to make the confeſſion he had ſent him. This Briſtol refuſed; and the King told Buckingham, it was horrible tyranny to make an innocent perſon confeſs faults whereof he was not guilty. Notwithſtanding all this, it was not in his power to ſpeak with the earl, becauſe the Prince and duke thought it not convenient.

JAMES I. AN' 1624.

The parliament being prorogued, it was neceſſary to think of the war. The aids granted his Majeſty were really conſiderable. It was computed that, with this money, he might ſend into the Palatinate twenty five thouſand men, conducted by ſome Engliſh general: but the court had already taken other meaſures. Six thouſand only were ſent into Holland, to ſerve in the ſtates army, under command of the Prince of Orange, and other troops were levied for count Mansfeldt, who was, during winter, to open himſelf a paſſage into the Palatinate.

James ſends ſix thouſand men into Holland. Wilſon, p. 787. Ruſhworth, p. 151. Annals, p. 103.

Mean while, the earl of Holland, who had been diſpatched into France, having notified, that Lewis XIII was inclined to liſten to the overture of a marriage between the Prince of Wales and Princeſs Henrietta Maria, his ſiſter, King James appointed the earl of Carliſle to negociate the affair, jointly with his ſaid excellency. The two embaſſadors repairing to Compiegne, where the Gallic court was then reſident, commiſſioners were nominated to treat with them, of whom marquis Vieuville, ſuper-intendent of the finances, was chief. The conferences commenced a few days after prorogation of the parliament, when James, purſuant to his ingagement, was puting in execution the laws againſt Popiſh recuſants, particularly againſt friers and prieſts, of whom ſome were actually impriſoned.

This ſeverity raiſed loud clamors among the Catholics, who, but a few months before, expected a very different treatment. They could not forbear complaining, that, whereas the negociation of the Spaniſh match had procured them great eaſe, this with France ſeemed on the contrary to ſerve only to redouble their miſeries. Several wrote to France in that ſtrain, intimating they had nothing to truſt to but the piety, zeal and protection of King Lewis. Among others, a certain Scotiſh Cordelier wrote upon this ſubject to Hugo, archbiſhop of Ambrun, who had been general of the Franciſcan order, and to whom he was known. The archbiſhop ſhewed King Lewis the letter, and agravated the ſufferings of the Engliſh Catholics, who expected relief only from his mediation. The Gallic Monarch had already done his utmoſt to pacify the Papiſts of England, aſſuring them, by De Tilliers, his embaſſador at London, that they ſhould not be abſent from his memory. But their reiterated complaints obliged him finally to take ſome ſteps in their favor, and the rather, as he was apprehenſive they might, ſome how or other, impede the Roman Pontif's diſpenſation, which would ſoon be wanted. He therefore determined on diſpatching over to James a ſecret agent, to intercede for the Catholics, and choſe for that purpoſe the archbiſhop of Ambrun, who repaired to London in diſguiſe, and paſſed for a counſellor of the parliament of Grenoble. At his arrival he waited on Buckingham, who ſeemed very much inclined to countenance his negociation. The counteſs of Buckingham, the duke's mother, the earl of Rutland, and ſome other Catholics did the archbiſhop great ſervices, and acquainted him with diverſe particulars neceſſary to be known, in order to ſucceed in his deſigns. James being informed that the ſaid prelate deſired a private audience, ſent for him to Royſton, where he then lay confined to his bed with the gout. The archbiſhop's firſt conference with his Majeſty was followed by the releaſe of ſeveral Popiſh recuſants, impriſoned ſince the parliament's petition. Moreover, James gave the the archbiſhop leave to adminiſter confirmation, in the French embaſſador's houſe, to all who ſhould apply for it. This was done in ſo public a manner, that not only the houſe but the very ſtreet was crouded. If this prelate's own narrative may be credited, he confirmed upwards of ten thouſand perſons, which to me ſeems exagerated. However this be, the number muſt have been great, ſince the magiſtrates of London complained of it to the King, who owned it was done with his leave: and yet he had very lately told the parliament, it was a ſhame to ſuffer ſuch crouds of Papiſts at embaſſadors houſes.

Conferences between King James and the archbiſhop of Ambrun. Deageant's Mem. Welwood. Notes on Wilſon, p. 786.

Thenceforwards James had ſeveral conferences with this prelate, and one day, as he was expreſſing his earneſt deſire to live in ſtrict union with his Gallic Majeſty, the archbiſhop took occaſion to tell him, that one of the beſt means to effect it, was to grant a full toleration to the Catholics. James hereupon, ſqueezing his hand, ſpake theſe words: "I perceive you are the man ſent me from God, "to whom I may freely open my mind." Adding, "He had always a good opinion of the Catholic "religion, and for it had often been in danger of "aſſaſſination during his minority: he intended to "grant a full toleration to the Catholics; and in "order to ſucceed, deſigned to cauſe an aſſembly "of divines, as well foreign as Engliſh, to be "held, and therein to be decided, that it was "neceſſary to grant univerſal liberty of conſcience: "and he had already caſt his eyes on the Engliſh "divines to be ſent thither: if the aſſembly could "not be held at Dover, he would agree it ſhould "be at Boulogne, as ſoon as his ſon's marriage "ſecured him the aſſiſtance of France: he judged it "requiſite that the archbiſhop ſhould now return to "France, under color of waiting on the Princeſs, and "he would ſend him two letters under his own hand, "one for the Pope, the other for the King of France, "wherein his project ſhould be more fully explained: "he would alſo give him a memorial on the ſame "ſubject, that being armed with theſe two papers, "he might go and negociate at Rome with the "Pope, for whom he had a very great reſpect, "being obliged to him for a copy of verſes he "had formerly made upon the Queen his mother, "and the houſe of Stuart." At the ſame time he ſhewed thoſe verſes to the archbiſhop, and then ſaid, "If he returned from Rome with his Sanctity's "approbation concerning the aſſembly, it ſhould "be immediately held, and he did not queſtion, "it would be very advantageous to the Catholic "religion. In the mean time, he intended to ne-"gociate with the Proteſtant Princes of Germany, "and indeavor to gain ſome of the chief Puritan "lords in England and Scotland."

Deageant's Mem.

On ſuppoſition of the truth of this extract from the archbiſhop of Ambrun's narrative, at the end of Deageant's memoirs, all can thence be infered is, that James had formed a chimerical project of a mutual toleration throughout Chriſtendom, and thought himſelf qualified to effect it, with the aſſiſtance of France. But Deageant ſays ſomething more. He affirms, James to have written a letter to the Pope, and ſent it by a certain Engliſh gentleman, a Papiſt. In this letter, according to that author, "He owns the Pope for Chriſt's vicar "upon earth, and head of the church univerſal. "He aſſures him, he intends to declare himſelf a "Catholic, as ſoon as he has provided againſt "ſome inconveniences which he foreſees his declara-"tion may cauſe. He promiſes that no diſtur-"bance ſhall be given to ſuch prieſts, &c. as are "ſent into England by his Holineſs or the King "of France, except they are Jeſuits. He more-"over deſires the Pope not to think of having re-"ſtored to the church the abby-lands granted or "ſold to the principal families in the kingdom, "for fear of ruining the whole project. He ſays "farther, nothing hinders him from openly pro-"feſſing the Catholic religion, but his hopes of "gaining firſt his brother-in-law, the King of "Denmark, whom he had, on ſome pretext in-"vited over to England: and when they two ſhall "be cloſely united in the ſame deſign, he does not "doubt but they ſhall prevail upon moſt of the "other Proteſtant Princes."

King James's ingagement, according to Deageant.

James I. An' 1624.

Deageant affirms, that none knew of this letter but Buckingham and the bearer: however he does not ſay how he himſelf came to know the contents. To ſpeak the truth, I can ſcarcely believe that James really intended to declare himſelf a Catholic: or, if he did intend it, would write ſuch a letter to the Pope, in his preſent circumſtances. In ſhort, I think it very unlikely this letter ſhould fall into Deageant's hands: ſo, I ſuſpect this author's relation is only what had been communicated to him by ſome Engliſh Papiſts, on whoſe teſtimony it is a queſtion whether we may venture to rely.

Remark on this ſubject.

The archbiſhop of Ambrun's narrative carries with it much more probability: firſt, becauſe that prelate relates only what he had himſelf from the King's own mouth: ſecondly, becauſe he ſays nothing but what is agreeable to that Prince's conduct thro' the whole courſe of his life. His religious notions were very particular, and not imbraced by the Proteſtants. He believed, that difference of opinion, with reſpect to the doctrines of tranſubſtantiation, invocation of Saints, and the other tenets which diſtinguiſhed the two religions, and were by him conſidered as ſchool-queſtions, was not ſufficient to juſtify a ſchiſm. Conſequently the Roman and Proteſtant churches were one and the ſame church; whence he infered, it was incumbent on all Chriſtians mutually to ſupport each other, and live like brethren. It followed equally from this principle, that Proteſtants ought not to perſecute or moleſt the Catholics, nor Catholics the Proteſtants. He himſelf moſt punctually obſerved this rule, but without any juſt foundation that the Catholic Princes would follow the ſame maxim: ſo the ſcheme of univerſal toleration, which he pretended to eſtabliſh among all Chriſtians, was properly but a chimera, ſince he had not ſufficient authority to make all the world come into his meaſures. Mean while, as his maxims obliged him to look upon Catholics with a different eye from thoſe of other Proteſtants, it is no wonder that he paſſed with the Proteſtants, nay even with the Papiſts, for a Prince well-affected to the Catholic religion: and indeed, ſo far was he from having any averſion to that religion, that he conſidered the church of Rome as the mother-church, whence the Proteſtant church drew its origin, and doubtleſs, had it been in his power to unite them, he would have given to the firſt all the advantages by leaving every one free to believe what he pleaſed in points of doctrine. A ſingle article only imbaraſſed him; and that was the exorbitant power aſcribed to the Pope, and that damnable maxim of the legality of murdering Kings on account of religion. To be delivered from this perplexity, he ſtrove to deceive himſelf, by imagining a very ſmall number of Catholics only were prepoſſeſſed in favor of the Roman Pontif's unbounded authority, and that the King-killing principle was peculiar to the Jeſuits. On the other hand, Puritaniſm in the Reformed religion was to him ſo hateful that, ſeemingly, had it been in his power, he would have excluded all Puritans from that general toleration he was willing to allow all other Chriſtians. This Prince had the misfortune always to direct himſelf by general maxims, without reflecting that ſuch maxims could not be adapted to all caſes. His notions in religion were were of a like nature with his ſentiments concerning royalty, the general principles whereof he applied to the government of England, contrary to that kingdom's particular conſtitution.

Treaty of Prince Charles's marriage carried on in France.

While the archbiſhop of Ambrun was in England, the marriage treaty was carrying on in France, between the Engliſh embaſſadors and French commiſſioners. The Engliſh at firſt propoſed a continuation of the treaty formerly ſet on foot for Prince Henry's marriage with Princeſs Chriſtine, who eſpouſed the duke of Savoy: but this motion was rejected by the French commiſſioners: firſt, becauſe that negociation was properly but juſt hinted: ſecondly, becauſe France would not be contented with leſs than was offered by the King of England for the Prince of Wales's marriage with Coke, p. 169. the Spaniſh Infanta. So the French commiſſioners demanded, in their turn, that thoſe articles touching religion granted to Spain would ſerve for foundation to the preſent treaty. The embaſſadors expected this demand, and by their private inſtructions knew how to proceed, but pretended, they could not grant what was demanded, without freſh orders. They therefore diſpatched away a courier to London; but the Gallic court knew it was not upon that account: ſo, they were preſſed the more earneſtly, to declare what they would grant concerning religion. At length, after ſome ſollicitation, they offered the articles agreed on with Spain, four only excepted, viz. Liberty of conſcience to Papiſts: A church in London: Educating the children by the Queen 'till ten years old: A biſhop with eccleſiaſtical authority over her royal Highneſs's houſhold. Theſe four articles were very warmly debated, and at length, the embaſſadors yielded the two latter: but for the other two, they ſaid abſolutely, that they could not grant them, by reaſon of his Majeſty's ſolemn promiſe to the parliament. This reaſon appeared to the French commiſſioners ſo forcible, that they deemed it fruitleſs any longer to inſiſt on thoſe two articles. The portion was ſettled without much difficulty. His Gallic Majeſty offered eight hundred thouſand crowns, on condition the Prince aſſigned a jointure of ſixty thouſand crowns annually; which offer, with the condition, was accepted: ſo, in all appearance, this affair was to be terminated very ſpeedily; but two particulars retarded its concluſion.

Firſt, his Holineſs approved not this alliance, becauſe, hearing that the Engliſh embaſſadors had propoſed a league to the King of France, he was apprehenſive its deſign might be to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Bavaria of the Palatinate and electoral dignity; which occaſioned his, at firſt, indeavoring to diſſuade Lewis XIII from giving his ſiſter to a heretical Prince: but finding Lewis did not much regard his arguments, he declared he would not grant a diſpenſation except the marriage was made on the ſame terms as were granted to Spain; whereupon King Lewis determined on ſending father Berulle, general of the oratory prieſts, to ſollicit
Coke, p. 171. the diſpenſation. His inſtructions, ſigned the thirty-firſt of July, imported among other particulars; "That, by the articles agreed on, the Princeſs, "as well as all her domeſtics, were very ſecure as "to religion: ſhe had a biſhop with twenty-eight "prieſts or monks; and a chapel in every place "where ſhe ſhall reſide: ſhe was to educate her "children 'till the age of thirteen years, whereas "in the Spaniſh articles, the time was fixed to ten "years. In fine, ſhe was well inſtructed and very "firm in the faith; and inſtead of having any "thing to fear for her, it was to be hoped, conſidering how well inclined the King of England "was to be a Catholic, ſhe would convert him as "well as the Prince her ſpouſe, after the example "of Bertha of France, who made a convert of "King Ethelbert."

Marquis Vieuville's diſgrace, which now occurred, was the other cauſe of delaying this affair, and ſtayed father Berulle, who was about to depart. Cardinal Richelieu, who was commiſſioned to treat with the Engliſh embaſſadors, in the diſgraced ſuperintendant's ſtead, pretended that Vieuville had acted without orders, or at leaſt without the approbation of King and council. James, having notice of this new obſtacle, believed the French court uſed this pretext to break off the treaty, and made loud complaints to marquis D'Effiat, who was lately arrived at his court in De Tillier's room: but cardinal Richelieu was far from breaking off a negociation ſo advantageous to France, on diverſe accounts. So, contenting himſelf with ſomewhat diſgracing Vieuville by this accuſation, he renewed the treaty.

James I. An' 1624.

Life of cardinal Richelieu, p. 14.

The late change in King Lewis's miniſtry inſpired his Sanctity's nuncio with freſh hopes. He repreſented to the cardinal, that his own and the Roman Pontif's honor obliged him not to abate any thing of the Spaniſh articles, and that, aſſuredly, the diſpenſation would not be granted on any other conditions. His eminence replied, that the King of England and Prince of Wales had complied with whatever they really intended to grant his Catholic Majeſty, tho' not with what was extorted from them while Prince Charles was as a priſoner at Madrid, and what was not in their power. Moreover, he intimated to him, that there was no abſolute occaſion for a diſpenſation, and tho' deſired, it was not ſo much thro' neceſſity as reſpect for his Holineſs's perſon. So, father Berulle departed with his inſtructions, ſpite of the nuncio's oppoſition.

Had the Gallic court ſhewed leſs reſolution, this affair would never have been accompliſhed. The Pope's behavior on this occaſion evidently manifeſted, he only wanted a pretext to refuſe the diſpenſation, or at leaſt, to delay it as long as poſſible. He retarded the buſineſs by laying it before a congregation, where freſh difficulties were continually ſtarted. They were not ſatisfied that the King of England and Prince of Wales ſhould ſwear to the articles, they would have alſo the King of France to be guarantee, like the King of Spain; and Lewis was at length forced to promiſe it. They inſiſted particularly on demanding a public church in London for the Catholics, tho' they were told, it was not in the King of England's power to perform the ſaid article, if granted. In a word, there was no delay, no artifice, but what was by the Holy Father put in practiſe to gain time, 'till at laſt the French embaſſador had orders to declare, if the diſpenſation was much longer defered, the affair might be tranſacted without it. This menace giving the Pontif apprehenſion that he might very unſeaſonably expoſe his authority, he promiſed the diſpenſation, after a tedious ſollicitation, which would have been of longer continuance had prolonging it been the Gallic court's intereſt: but cardinal Richelieu was apprehenſive leſt a farther delay would bring with it alterations which might occaſion a breach of the marriage, as happened in Spain; ſo the treaty was ſigned, at Paris, the tenth of November. It contained thirty public with three ſecret articles, wherein much the ſame advantages were ſtipulated for the Catholics as in thoſe of Madrid. The articles of this treaty were,

VIII. To that end, Madame ſhall have a chapel in all the royal palaces, and in every place of the King of Great Britain's dominions, where ſhe ſhall be, or reſide.

IX. The ſaid chapel ſhall be beautified with decent ornaments, and the care and cuſtody thereof ſhall be commited to ſuch as Madame ſhall appoint. The preaching of God's word, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments ſhall be intirely free, and the maſs, with all other parts of divine ſervice, ſhall be celebrated according to the cuſtom of the holy Roman church, with all jubilees and indulgences which Madame ſhall procure from Rome. There ſhall be alſo a church-yard allowed in the city of London, where, according to the cuſtom of the Roman church, ſhall be buried ſuch of Madame's attendants as ſhall happen to die, which ſhall be done in a decent manner. The ſaid church-yard ſhall be incloſed, that it may not be profaned.

X. Madame ſhall have for her almoner a biſhop, who ſhall have all neceſſary authority and juriſdiction in matters relating to religion, and ſhall have power to proceed according to the canons againſt ſuch as ſhall be under his charge. And in caſe the civil court ſhall lay hold on any of the ſaid eccleſiaſtics, for ſome ſtate-crime, and information be made againſt him, he ſhall be ſent to the ſaid biſhop, with the informations and proceedings, and the ſaid biſhop, after degrading him, ſhall put him again into the hands of the ſecular court. For any other crimes the civil court ſhall ſend back the ſaid eccleſiaſtic to the biſhop, who ſhall proceed againſt him according to the canons: and in caſe of abſenſe or ſickneſs, the biſhop's vicar ſhall have the ſame authority.

XI. Madame ſhall have in her houſe twenty eight prieſts or eccleſiaſtics, almoners and chaplains included, to ſerve in her chapel, and if there are any regulars, they ſhall wear the habit of their order.

XII. The King and Prince ſhall oblige themſelves, by oath, not to attempt, by any means whatever, to perſuade Madame to change her religion, or to ingage in any thing repugnant thereto.

XIII. Madame's houſhold ſhall be ſettled with as much dignity, and conſiſt of as many officers as any Princeſs of Wales ever had, and in the ſame manner as was agreed on for the marriage of the moſt ſerene Prince with the Infanta of Spain.

XIV. All the domeſtics Madame ſhall bring into England ſhall be French Catholics, choſen by the moſt Chriſtian King, and in the room of thoſe who ſhall die, ſhe ſhall take other French Catholics, with the conſent however of the King of Great Britain.

XV. Madame's domeſtics ſhall take the following oath to the King, Prince and Madame.

"I promiſe and ſwear to be faithful to the King "of Great Britain, to the moſt ſerene Prince "Charles, and to Madame Henrietta Maria, "daughter of France, and to keep truly and in- "violably this my promiſe. And if I know of "any thing to be attempted againſt the perſons of "the ſaid King, Prince and Madame, or againſt "the ſtate, or public good of the ſaid King's "realms, I will diſcover the ſame to the ſaid King, "Prince and Madame, or to thoſe who ſhall have "charge thereof."

XVI. Madame's portion ſhall be eight hundred thouſand French crowns, one half to be paid, in London, by his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty on the day before the eſpouſals, and the other half within a year after the firſt payment.

XVII. If the Prince dies before Madame, without iſſue, the whole portion ſhall be reſtored to Madame, to be diſpoſed of as ſhe pleaſes, whether ſhe ſtays in England, or returns to France, in which latter caſe, it ſhall be in her option to bring the money with her.

XVIII. But in caſe of children, only two thirds of the portion ſhall be reſtored, the other third remaining for the children, whether Madame returns to France, or ſtays in England: but in this caſe, ſhe ſhall be paid the intereſt at five per cent.

XIX. The children which ſhall be born of this marriage, ſhall be brought up by Madame their mother, 'till the age of thirteen years.

XX. The children ſhall inherit alſo the two thirds reſtored to their mother, unleſs ſhe marries again: and then, the children of the ſecond bed ſhall have equal ſhare with thoſe of the firſt.

XXI. If Madame dies firſt without children, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty grants that, in ſuch caſe, only half of the portion ſhall be paid back to him; but if there are children, the whole ſhall go to them.

XXII. Madame's jointure ſhall be ſixty thouſand French crowns, which ſhall be aſſigned her by the King of Great Britain.

XXIII. The King of Great Britain ſhall preſent Madame, on account of the marriage, with fifty thouſand crowns worth of jewels and diamonds, which ſhall be Madame's own property, as well as thoſe ſhe has now, or which ſhall be given her hereafter.

XXIV. The King of Great Britain ſhall be obliged to maintain Madame and her houſhold; and in caſe ſhe becomes a widow, ſhe ſhall injoy her portion and jointure, with all other things to her granted.

XXV. In caſe the Prince dies firſt without iſſue, Madame ſhall freely injoy, whereſoever ſhe pleaſes to reſide, her jointure which ſhall be aſſigned her in lands, caſtles, or houſes, whereof one ſhall be fit for her to reſide in, and furniſhed ſutably to a Princeſs of her quality.

XXVI. Madame ſhall have the free diſpoſal of the offices and benefices of the ſaid lands, part of which ſhall have the title of duchy or earldom.

XXVII. Madame ſhall be at liberty, whether ſhe have children or not, to return to France with her houſhold-goods, jewels, diamonds and portion, as ſpecified in the articles above. And in this caſe, the King of England ſhall be obliged to conduct her at his charge to Calais, in a manner ſutable to her quality.

James I. An' 1624.

XXVIII. Madame ſhall renounce all paternal, maternal and collateral inheritance, as to the lands of the royal domain ſubject to reverſion, by apenage, or otherwiſe.

XXIX. The marriage-contract ſhall be inroled in the court of the parliament at Paris, ratified by the parliament of England, and regiſtered in the uſual courts: and the ſaid King and Prince ſhall promiſe not to act contrary to any clauſe or condition of the ſame.

XXX. Moreover, it is agreed, that he of the two Kings who ſhall refuſe to accompliſh the preſent treaty, ſhall be obliged to pay the other the ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns, as a penalty for the ſaid refuſal.

Private or ſecret articles.

Ruſhworth, p. 169.

1. That the Catholics, as well eccleſiaſtics as temporal, impriſoned ſince the laſt proclamation, which followed the breach with Spain, ſhould all be ſet at liberty.

2. That the Engliſh Catholics ſhould be no more ſearched after, nor moleſted for their relgion.

3. That the goods of the Catholics, as well eccleſiaſtical as temporal, which were ſeized ſince the fore-mentioned proclamation, ſhould be reſtored to them.

Ib. p. 152.

In this, as well as the Madrid treaty, we ſee the French and Spaniſh court's unwearied ſedulity for the Catholic religion's intereſt, and King James's, the Prince's and duke of Buckingham's ſmall zeal for the Proteſtant. The XIXth article, touching the childrens education, was of moſt fatal conſequence to England: it wanted very little of proving the utter deſtruction of both church and ſtate.

Should it be aſked, what mighty advantages his Britannic Majeſty found in this marriage, to purchaſe it with ſuch hard terms to the religion profeſſed by himſelf, and almoſt the whole kingdom, in my opinion, two only can be aſſigned. The firſt was, to give the Prince his ſon a wife royally deſcended, deeming any other Princeſs beneath him. The ſecond was, the portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns, which might excite his avidity. As to what detriment might accrue to the Proteſtant religion from this treaty, it little concerned him, for he never had much at heart the intereſts of that religion (1).

Recuſants no longer proſecuted.

The treaty being ſigned at Paris, M. Lomenie, ſecretary of ſtate, arrived at London, to ſee it ſworn to by the King and Prince. Immediately after, all proſecutions againſt Papiſts ceaſed, and his Majeſty promiſed all the priſoners ſhould, on conſummation of the marriage, be releaſed.

Contempt of the King and conncil.

On the earl of Carliſle's departure for France, to haſten the marriage-treaty, he had orders for propoſing to that court a league againſt the houſe of Auſtria. This was the Prince's and Buckingham's grand aim. There was then, between the Kings of France and Spain, a conteſt concerning the Valtoline, which made the court of England imagine Lewis would readily liſten to ſuch a propoſal: and indeed he did ſo; but it was purely to intimidate his Holineſs and the Spaniard, and not with deſign to conclude the league. The duke of Bavaria had in the French court certain friends who procured his being abundantly more regarded than the elector Palatine, a Prince expulſed his dominions, and a refugee in Holland: ſo Lewis's miniſters told the Engliſh embaſſadors, that the league and marriage were two diſtinct affairs which could not be treated of together, but on concluſion of the marriage the league ſhould be negociated. By this anſwer they held the Engliſh in hope, and the Spaniards in fear. On the other hand, count Mansfeldt ſtayed at or near Paris, and the Spaniards knew he confered very frequently with Lewis's miniſters.

James I. An' 1624.

The King ſends Manſfeldt with an army to the Palatinate. Wilſon, p. 788, 789. Ruſhworth, p. 152, 153. Annals. Howes.

Some time after Mansfeldt paſſed over to England, where he was received with extraordinary careſſes, and lodged by the Prince in his palace at St. James's. There, after ſome conferences, he agreed with the King, Prince Charles and Buckingham, that he ſhould have twelve thouſand men, to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. This project being formed, James preſſed the court of France touching the league: but his propoſal was, on ſundry pretexts artfully evaded, tho' not peremptorily denied. He was therefore obliged, to content himſelf, 'till the league ſhould be concluded, with demanding of King Lewis a paſſage thro' his dominions for Mansfeldt's army. His ſaid Gallic Majeſty, in terms general or ambiguous, made him hope not only his granting a paſſage, but likewiſe his reinforcing this army with a body of his own troops. The event manifeſted that his meaning was, this ſhould be after concluding the league, whereas the Engliſh took it for a poſitive promiſe, whether the league was or was not concluded. Purſuant to this ſcheme, the forces to be commanded by Mansfeldt were levied in England.

He demands Frankendal of the Infanta. Sept. 30. Ruſhworth, p. 151. and {paſſage for a gariſon thro' the Empire;

While this army was making ready for the expedition, James got preſented to the Infanta Iſabella a memorial, demanding the city of Frankendal, which ſhe held in ſequeſtration, and, by the treaty of London, was to keep only 'till the truce expired, viz. the twenty ſixth of October. In the ſame memorial, he alſo demanded a free paſſage for the gariſon he was ſending to Frankendal, not only thro' the Infanta's and his Catholic Majeſty's territories, but likewiſe thro' thoſe of their friends and allies. The Infanta replied; ſhe would order the governor of Frankendal to ſurrender the place on the day appointed, to ſuch as ſhould produce a power from the King of England: that ſhe would grant a paſſage thro' her own and the King of Spain's dominions, to the fifteen hundred foot and two hundred horſe, which, according to the treaty of London, were to take poſſeſſion of Frankendal, and, in general, would punctually execute the treaty: but as to his Majeſty's farther demand, to procure him a paſſage for his troops thro' the Imperial ſtates, ſhe declared, it was not in her power, neither was ſhe obliged to it. Thus the court of England experimentally found their error, in not inſerting, in the treaty of London, what they were afterwards forced to demand, and what the Infanta might juſtly refuſe. It is very true, in withdrawing the Engliſh gariſon from Frankendal James met not with any obſtacle; but he could not expect the like facility in their return thither. Some have reported that, on the fifteenth of October, the governor of Frankendal marched out thence with his gariſon; but, not finding without the gates of that city any to take poſſeſſion for the King of England, re-entered immediately.

which latter demand the Infanta cannot grant.

This was not the only error of the Engliſh court, then the moſt impolitic in Europe. The twelve thouſand men whom Mansfeldt was to conduct into the Palatinate, were imbarked in December, in extreme cold weather, without the leaſt doubt of their paſſage thro' France. Nevertheleſs, when

(1) No! Why then ſhould he write ſo much and ſo zealouſly in its behalf? Sure our author never peruſed this learned Prince's works; particularly that elaborate piece ſhewing from the Revelations the Pope to be Antichriſt.

A GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE POSTERITY OF

We have in this Genealogical Table, as in ye foregoing, taken care 1. To place on ye same horizontal Line, all ye Princes & Princesses equally distant from ye same common Stock, viz. from William ye Conqueror, Thus James ye 1st. being on ye 18 Line, & the 24th King, his Descendants are placed on ye following Lines, in proportion as they are more or less removed. ——

2. We have carefully distinguished the different Branches — that are formed by the Posterity of James ye 1st. So that the — Fathers and Mothers are placed in the Line above their Children, as nigh in the middle as possible ——

3. As the Males are, in the Order of Succession, preferred to the Female, we have placed the Males before their Sisters tho' ye last were older, that ye Reader might more easily — discern what Pretension each of them may have to ye Crown of England. But having this we have placed both Males & Females, according to the time of their Birth. ——

4. That this Table might not be carried to an excessive — length on both Sides, we have in some places been obliged to put the Children of the same Father and Mother one above another, especially between Lines 23. & 24.

5. We have set down in small Characters, under each Prince, the name of his Wife, and under each Princess ye name of her Husband, together with the time of their Birth & Death, as far as was necessary. ——

James I. An' 1624.

this army came before Calais, the French would not ſuffer them to land. Abundance of time paſſed in the diverſe goings and comings between Calais and the court, and all to no purpoſe: the King of France conſtantly aſſerted, he had never poſitively promiſed to grant theſe troops a paſſage. The Engliſh authors term this a real breach of faith. I know not whether they are in the right, and whether the court of England is not rather to be blamed, for not taking better meaſures, and ſecuring a paſſage thro' France before the army's imbarcation. However this be, the army ſuffering greatly on board the ſhips, where the ſoldiers lay very cloſely ſtowed, Mansfeldt was forced to ſail for Zealand, where he met with like difficulties. The Zealanders ſaid, they had not proviſions for ſuch a number of troops, having had no notice of their coming. Much time was imployed in negociating. Meſſengers were ſent to the Hague, and afterwards to London. Mean while, the peſtilence raging among the ſoldiers, more than two thirds periſhed before they were ſuffered to land. Moſt of thoſe who eſcaped, either deſerted, or liſted among the ſix thouſand Engliſh then in the ſtates ſervice. Thus, by the court's wrong meaſures, this army became uſeleſs, and the money all loſt which was expended in levying it.

An' 1625. Difficulties about the diſpenſation.

It was February, 1625, before the arrival of Pope Urban's promiſed diſpenſation. When it came to Paris, two new conditions, not mentioned in the treaty, were, not without ſurpriſe, found inſerted, viz. 1. That the domeſtics of the children, born of this marriage, ſhould be Catholics. 2. That the Princeſs ſhould appoint them; and his Holineſs abſolutely required the King of England, and the Prince his ſon, to ſwear to theſe two articles, otherwiſe the diſpenſation was invalid. King Lewis was very angry with father Berulle for accepting ſuch a diſpenſation: but his ſaid paternity was ſo far from thinking it a fault, that he himſelf, as is ſaid, inſinuated to the Pontif, that it would be proper to annex theſe two articles, as having been forgot in the treaty. The Gallic court was therefore under a freſh concern, fearing King James would reject theſe new conditions: but nothing was farther from his thoughts than breaking for ſuch a trifle. He accepted them without being much importuned, and only refuſed taking a ſecond oath, ſaying his word was ſufficient: but without ſuch oath, the diſpenſation was not valid. To ſatisfy therefore his Sanctity, the King of France and the Princeſs his ſiſter were forced to write to him, that they would warrant due performance of the two laſt articles. Notwithſtanding this, a new diſpenſation was to be ſollicited, which was ſome months in coming, and in this interval died King James, without having the pleaſure of ſeeing the marriage conſummated.

A new diſpenſation demanded.

Death of K. James. Wilſon, p. 790. * At Theobalds.

About mid-March, he was ſeized with a tertian ague, of which he had ſome fits. But tho', generally ſpeaking, ſuch agues are not dangerous in the ſpring, this brought him to his grave. He died * the twenty-ſeventh of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a twenty-two years reign in England.

Suſpicions againſt Buckingham. Wilſon. Weldon, p. 171. Coke, p. 175, 176.

His death, happening as I may ſay ſuddenly and unexpectedly, cauſed many ſuſpicions, which fell on the duke of Buckingham. As one of his Majeſty's fits was going off, the duke cauſed certain plaſters to be applied to his ſide and wriſts, and gave him twice with his own hands a medicine to drink, in abſenſe of the phyſicians: nay, he would have given it a third time, but could not perſuade him to take it. The King, finding himſelf much worſe, ſent for his phyſicians, who ſaid poſitively, they would not preſcribe if the plaſters were not immediately removed: however, the King died within a few days. Buckingham was afterwards impeached by the commons, not directly for poiſoning the King, but for daring to apply remedies without the advice of his phyſicians (1).

James I. An' 1625.

King James left only a ſon and a daughter. His daughter was married to a Prince who had loſt his dominions, and was fled for refuge to Reenen, in the province of Utrecht, where he held his little court in no ſmall indigence. King James, who was ſo liberal, is accuſed of having but ſparingly contributed to the maintenance of this diſconſolate family: but I am not certain there is any ground for this accuſation. Charles, Prince of Wales, who ſucceeded his father, was ſtill more unfortunate than his ſiſter. Wilſon. Coke. Weldon. Annals. Sanderſon.

James I, as I have elſewhere obſerved, has had for hiſtorians men very much prepoſſeſſed in his favor, or extremely prejudiced againſt him. This naturally followed from the diviſions to which he himſelf had given birth. Some repreſent him as a perfect pattern of a good King: others blacken his reputation as much as poſſible, by agravating his failings. The reaſon of this diverſity proceeds from the hiſtory of his reign being penned at the time when the animoſity of the two parties was at the height, whence both have happened to leave in their writings evident marks of their paſſion. Therefore the character of this Prince muſt not be formed either upon the praiſes of the one, or the invectives of the other, but on his manner of governing, on his ſpeeches and actions. This might be done by recollecting the principal circumſtances of his reign: but to ſave my readers that trouble, I ſhall briefly relate what is ſaid on both ſides, of which they may judge at diſcretion.

The principal ingredients in King James's panegyric is the conſtant peace he cauſed his ſubjects to injoy. This cannot be ſaid to be the effect of chance, ſince it clearly appears to have been his ſole, or at leaſt chief aim in his adminiſtration. Nothing, ſay his friends, is more noble or more worthy a great King than ſuch a deſign. But this deſign loſes all its merit, if the Prince is diſcovered by his conduct, to preſerve peace only thro' timidity, ſupine indolence, and exceſſive love of eaſe and repoſe, and King James's whole deportment evidences his having acted by theſe motives, tho' he colored it with the pretenſe of affection for his people.

If ſome take care to extol his knowledge in philoſophy, divinity, hiſtory and polite literature, others affirm it was but real pedantry, and that from all his acquired knowledge he learned to talk moſt impertinently on every ſubject, inſtead of framing ſolid and ſure rules for the government of his dominions. Bacon. Coke, p. 176.

His munificence, which ſome extol, is by others exclaimed againſt as prodigality. Theſe pretend, he made donatives without meaſure and diſcretion, without any regard to his own wants, or the merits of thoſe on whom he laviſhed his beneficence. Coke, p. 180.

A like contrariety occurs between King James's hiſtorians, with regard to his capacity. Some ſtile him, for his wiſdom, "The Solomon of his times." Williams. Coke, p. 176.

(1) Wilſon ſays, one of Buckingham's chief motives was thought to be his fear the King would ſet up Briſtol, his deadly enemy, againſt him, to pull him down. And if what Burnet ſays be true, he had reaſon likewiſe to fear the King's old favorite Somerſet. He ſays, the King being reſolved to bring the earl of Somerſet into favor again, met him at night in the gardens at Theobalds: two bed-chamber-men were only in the ſecret: the King imbraced him tenderly, and with many tears: the earl of Somerſet believed the ſecret was not well kept, for ſoon after, the King was taken ill with an ague, and died at Theobalds. Burnet (p. 17.) ſays, he had this from ſome who were told it by the earl himſelf. Dr. Craig, the King's phyſician, was diſgraced, for ſaying, he believed the King was poiſoned.

Others

James I. An' 1625.

Others labor to diſplay all his errors, particularly in the two ſole momentous affairs of his reign, wherein he come off very indifferently; I mean, the Prince his ſon's marriage, and his ſon-in-law's election to the crown of Bohemia.

Some extol him for maintaining the prerogative royal in its full luſter, ſpite of the efforts of thoſe who were continually attacking it. Others pretend that he had conceived very erroneous ideas of the Engliſh conſtitution, and, by aiming to carry the regal authority too high, and inſtilling the ſame principles into his ſucceſſor, was the original cauſe of his family's ruin.

Echard. Weldon, p. 179. 186. Coke, p. 71.

Concerning his morals, writers are no leſs divided. Some deſcribe him as a moſt wiſe and virtuous Prince; while others ſpeak of him as a Prince of a diſſolute life, given to drinking, and ſwearing in common converſation, eſpecially when in a paſſion. He is likewiſe reproached for diſſolving the earl of Eſſex's marriage; pardoning the earl and counteſs of Somerſet; for the death of ſir Walter Ralegh, and for confidently calling God to witneſs, in full parliament, that he never had any thoughts of granting the Papiſts a toleration, which he could affirm only by means of ſome mental reſervation.

Burnet, p. 17.

Coke. Burnet.

In fine, while ſome praiſe his moderation and equity to the Catholics, others pretend to demonſtrate he was cordially a Papiſt, and only profeſſed the Proteſtant religion thro' dread of what might inſue if he openly declared for Popery. If ſome urge, in proof of his being a good Proteſtant, that he made conſtant profeſſion of the eſtabliſhed religion, perſevered in it to his death, and when expiring injoined the Prince his ſon to protect the church and clergy; others anſwer, this is far from a demonſtration. They pretend, the point is not to know what he would appear to be, but what he was in reality, and that his actions belied his outward profeſſion: that the ſame thing had happened to him in Scotland, where 'till the age of thirty-ſix years he had profeſſed a perſuaſion which he mortally hated, as plainly appeared afterwards: that, when he came to England, he bare-facedly declared himſelf protector of the Papiſts; took their part on all occaſions; promoted them to honors, dignities, public offices; that in his reign the laws againſt them were never duly executed, of which he boaſted to the Catholic Princes in his apology concerning the oath of allegiance: that in all his ſpeeches, whether in parliament or the ſtar-chamber, his conſtant aim was to move his ſubjects to conſent to a full toleration for the Catholics; but not finding the parliament inclined as he wiſhed, he granted, by his ſole authority, a toleration in effect, by hindering the execution of the laws, and diſcharging the condemned recuſants from fines, and other penalties: that in his conventions with Spain and France, he poſitively promiſed to cauſe no more laws to be inacted againſt the Papiſts, and thoſe already in force not to be executed: that, on all occaſions, he affected to make appear he found nothing amiſs in the Romiſh religion except the Pope's exorbitant power over Princes: that by ſtiling the Pontif, Holy Father, his Holineſs, and by conſenting his ſon's children ſhould be educated in the Roman creed 'till the age of thirteen years, he plainly diſcovered he ſhould not be ſorry for their continuance in that belief. Finally, his ingagements with the archbiſhop of Ambrun is a recent and manifeſt proof of his being truly a Papiſt. To this the others reply, it is not poſſible to conceive that, if King James had been in his heart a Papiſt, he would have imployed a very conſiderable part of his time in writing brooks againſt the Popiſh creed, and combating the arguments of Bellarmine and Du Perron.

James I. An' 1625.

Having related what is urged for and againſt King James, as to his religion, I ſhall take the liberty to offer my own ſentiment or conjecture, which is, that this Prince was truly neither a good Proteſtant nor Catholic. One can ſcarce but acknowledge that he had never much at heart the intereſt of the Proteſtant religion, as on the other hand, it cannot be denied, he made thereof public and conſtant profeſſion, even to his lateſt gaſp. This induces me to imagine he had formed a ſcheme of religion different from that of others, according to which he counted of no moment what the Proteſtants and Catholics looked on as eſſential. The difference between the two religions, with regard to tenets, was not what moſt affected him. He ſeemingly believed every religion to be good, provided it taught obedience to Sovereigns, and preſerved the hierarchy, which he conſidered as the capital point. It is therefore no wonder, that, agreeably to this ſcheme, he ſhould refuſe entering into the Engliſh Proteſtants meaſures to hinder the growth of Popery in England, or not ſcruple to continue in the religion he profeſſed, ſince, according to his notions, the two religions were equally good, provided the Pope's deſpotic power was aboliſhed. I ſcarce doubt that, in his conferences with the archbiſhop of Ambrun, he had in view the chimerical project of reconciling the two religions, without troubling himſelf about the tenets which divided them, and which, in one of his ſpeeches, he termed ſcholaſtic queſtions. But, very probably, if he could have executed this project according to his ideas, all the advantage would have been on the ſide of Catholiciſm. This, in my opinion, is the only way to excuſe his condeſcenſion to the Papiſts, and his zeal to protect them: otherwiſe, I perceive not how his behavior, with reſpect to religion, can well be accounted for. This may alſo ſerve to diſcover the reaſon of his rejecting, with ſo much animoſity, the doctrines of the Puritans, whoſe principles he believed directly oppoſite to the project he had framed.

But whatever may be alledged for or againſt King James's perſon, it is certain England was never in a leſs flouriſhing condition than during his reign, and the Engliſh ſaw themſelves expoſed to the inſults and railleries of other nations, while the whole blame was univerſally caſt on the King. In France, in his time was made the following epigram, which clearly manifeſts how he was eſteemed among his neighbors (1):

L'Anglois fut d'Eſpagne l'effroy.
Maintenant, deviſe et caquette,

Containing the firſt Fifteen Years of the Reign of CHARLES I.

CHARLES I. Twenty-fifth King of ENGLAND ſince the CONQUEST.

CHARLES I AN' 1625.

Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 166.

CHARLES I, ſon and ſucceſſor of James I, was tinctured from his infancy with thoſe very principles touching ſovereign authority, and prerogative royal, which the deceaſed King had, during his life, ſo improved. He had the ſame favorite; the ſame council; the ſame miniſters; and all the imploys and charges, as well at court as throughout the whole realm, remained poſſeſſed by the duke of Buckingham's creatures: ſo nothing was changed except the King's perſon. Charles's journey to Spain had ſo indeared to him this duke, that King James's affection for that favorite was nothing, as I may ſay, in compariſon of the new King's. It was believed, and not without foundation, that had James ſurvived he would have diſcarded Buckingham, with whom he was, on diverſe accounts, not a little diſpleaſed. 1. Becauſe of the Spaniſh journey, whereof he was the ſole adviſer, and which had expoſed his Majeſty to the cenſure of all Europe. 2. On account of breaking off the Spaniſh match without any juſt reaſon. 3. For this duke's ingaging him, as it were againſt his will, to a rupture with Spain. 4. For cauſing, by the Prince's credit and his intereſt with the parliament, the lord-treaſurer Middleſex to be condemned, in ſpite of the King himſelf, who did his utmoſt to ſave him, and even ſued to the Prince and duke for his pardon, without being able to obtain it. Thus James died very opportunely for the favorite, who, probably to ſupport himſelf, muſt have ſet the Prince at variance with his father, which might have had terrible conſequences. This raiſed againſt Buckingham violent ſuſpicions, which were ſtill farther corroborated by his preſuming to apply a plaſter to the King's ſide, and giving him, with his own hand, a potion to drink, without the advice of his phyſicians. Indeed, the duke could not be directly charged with accelerating the death of his royal benefactor by the remedies he gave him; but when the time and circumſtances of this unexpected death, cauſed by a tertian ague, not uſually very dangerous in the ſpring, were conſidered, jointly with the perplexities from which it delivered this favorite, and the advantages it procured him, it was difficult not to ſuſpect him: and yet, on the other hand, when the new King was ſeen ſtrongly perſevering in his affection for the duke, it could not be imagined he doubted his innocence in that reſpect. Howſoever this be, the duke of Buckingham was the ſon's favorite, as he had been the father's; nay, with ſtill greater power and credit than he had under the preceding reign.

CHARLES I AN' 1625.

Charles's projects concerning arbitrary power and the Palatinate.

Charles I, at his acceſſion to the throne, formed two projects equally difficult to be executed. The firſt was, to wreſt from the Emperor and duke of Bavaria both the Palatinates, which had been taken from his brother-in-law the elector Palatine. The ſecond, to carry the regal authority abundantly higher than had been done by the King his father, or any of his predeceſſors. Theſe two ſchemes, which ſeparately would, in all appearance, meet with great obſtacles, became, when united, in a manner impracticable. Charles however was of opinion, that they mutually ſupported each other: that, under color of the Palatinate war, he ſhould put the parliament on a foot not to refuſe him any thing: that, in time, he ſhould have both houſes at command, and, after rendering himſelf independent, diſpoſe as he pleaſed of the kingdom's treaſures in executing the deſigns he had formed in favor of the King of Bohemia. As Charles's ſaid two projects are the ſubject of his firſt fifteen years, after acceding to the crown, to which period I at preſent confine my ſelf, it will be requiſite thoroughly to explain them, that the ſequel may with more facility be comprehended.

Concerning the Palatinate.

As to the firſt, I mean that of wreſting from the Emperor and duke of Bavaria the two Palatinates, I think it needleſs to repeat what, in the reign of James I, has been advanced on that topic. It will ſuffice to remind the reader, that it was by the intrigues of Prince Charles and Buckingham, and thro' that duke's miſrepreſentation of what was tranſacted in Spain, that the parliament was induced to counſel King James to break the treaties, which were in effect broken already, and promiſe to ſupport that war which this breach would ſeemingly produce: this was the Prince's and duke's real aim in diſguiſing the truth. Afterwards the Prince, when King, miſſed no opportunity to take advantage of the parliament's haſty counſel and ingagement, as if the parliament had really been ſole authors of this breach, and original cauſe of the war for recovering the Palatinate. Of theſe artifices King James was the firſt victim. He was made to break a treaty which he had been laboring ſeven years, and to loſe the portion he had reaſon to expect for his ſon's marriage with the Infanta. He was ingaged, againſt his will and inclination, in a war with the houſe of Auſtria (1); and, what he deemed the greateſt of all misfortunes, conſtrained to have recouſe to a parliament; he who was ſo diſſatisfied with the two former ones that, to all appearance, he would never have called another, had it not been for this rupture. The ſecond victim was the duke of Buckingham. No ſooner was the truth known but he became the object of public hatred, tho', before his intrigues were diſcovered, he had been conſidered as a guardian-angel, for breaking the intended match. Finally, Prince Charles, aſcending the throne, reſolved to ſupport that war wherein the parliament had unadviſedly ingaged: but becauſe he found not in the houſe of commons ſuch a readineſs to aſſiſt him as he expected, he, ſolely on that account, diſſolved ſeveral parliaments. This bred in the minds of his ſubjects jealouſy and diſcontent, which being inflamed by other cauſes, finally brought on him the greateſt calamity can poſſibly befal a Sovereign. Hitherto the Prince's and duke's real motive in breaking the treaty with Spain is unknown. It is not conceived how, after loſing the Palatinate, they could imagine it eaſier to recover that country from the Emperor and duke of Bavaria, by force of arms, than by managing the King of Spain's friendſhip, by means of the marriage already concluded: but the uſe Prince Charles, now become King, deſigned to make of this war, adviſed by the parliament, can be no ſecret; viz. to accuſtom the houſe of commons, under pretext of the urgent neceſſity of this war, to ſupply him in a few days with the money he demanded, without deliberating on any other buſineſs. This will manifeſtly appear in the ſequel: but before I deſcend to the particulars of this ſecond project, it is requiſite ſome remarks on this ſubject be premiſed.

The ſecond project, concerning arbitrary power.

I have, in the reign of James I, evidenced, that this firſt Monarch of Great Britain labored, as long as his monarchy laſted, that is, while he was King of England, to extend the prerogative royal. This was not only in ſome points, and on certain occaſions, but by general principles, which being once admited would, by neceſſary conſequences, cloath the Sovereign with unlimited authority. Whatever had been ſaid by the moſt furious ſticklers for abſolute power in Sovereigns, he readily applied to the Kings of England, without ever examining, whether the power of a King admited of degrees, according to the ſeveral ſtates, or the conſtitution of the government whereof he was ſupreme: and yet this was the point in queſtion. Otherwiſe, it from his principles followed, that the regal power was the ſame every where, and a King of Poland, for inſtance, ought to be as abſolute as a King of Perſia. This was in effect what he always ſuppoſed in the affair of Bohemia, and what prevented him from eſpouſing his ſon-in-law's quarrel. So long as he was ſatisfied with inſinuating ſuch maxims, by certain expreſſions in his public ſpeeches, the people, and even the parliament, took not thereof any great notice: but when he was for reducing to practiſe the various conſequences which naturally might thence be drawn, he met with ſtrong oppoſition, which obliged him to diſſolve ſundry parliaments, becauſe they were not ſo tractable and prone to imbibe his inſtructions as he wiſhed and expected. This oppoſition put him out of humor: nay, he began to expreſs himſelf in plainer terms, and aſſert, that parliaments owed their very exiſtence only to the royal conceſſion, and that this conceſſion might be revoked when they became unworthy of it, juſt as a charter granted to a corporation, on certain expreſs conditions, might be taken away, if theſe conditions were not complied with. But the parliament would never admit any ſuch principle. It was readily agreed, that the King had power to call, prorogue, and diſſolve the parliament: nay, that he might forbear ſummoning it for ſome time: but that England might, or ought to be governed without parliaments, whenſoever the King thought proper, is what could not be allowed him, much leſs that he could diſpenſe with, or act contrary to the laws. Nevertheleſs, to this height would James I have carried his prerogative; a term equivocal, wherein his meaning was abſolute power, or ſomething very near it. But the Engliſh, generally ſpeaking, underſtood by that word, only a power in the Sovereign's perſon to command or act in matters not repugnant to the laws, or for which the law had not provided, and certain acts of grace and favor, which the King might exerciſe with regard to ſome private perſons, provided theſe acts were not very prejudicial to the reſt of his ſubjects. Thisc onſtantly occaſioned all the differences between James I, and his parliaments. It could not be preciſely ſpecified wherein conſiſted the King's prerogative and the peoples privileges, theſe points having never been expreſly determined. Such of the Engliſh Kings as had paſſed for the wiſeſt and moſt prudent, avoided as rocks thoſe kinds of diſputes, which can only breed hatred and animoſity between King and people. On the other hand, former parliaments choſe rather to ſee the prerogative royal ſometimes ſtretched beyond its due limits, than debate ſuch difficult points, which, in caſe of obſtinacy on both ſides, muſt have been decided by the ſword, there being no higher tribunal to which either could appeal. Beſide, ſince Richard II, whoſe attempt coſt him his crown and life, there had not been any King who had aimed at carrying the prerogative royal ſo far as to claim a power of acting directly contrary to the laws. If any of them, on ſome occaſions, offered to paſs the juſt boundaries, the parliaments, for one of the three ſubſequent reaſons, were not under any concern. 1. Becauſe it was in matters of ſmall importance. 2. Becauſe, repoſing intire confidence in their Sovereign, they believed he would not make any ill uſe of their indulgence. 3. Becauſe they ſaw the King's aim and motive were advantageous, or at leaſt not very prejudicial to the nation.

Charles I An' 1625.

But no ſooner had James I aſcended the throne of England, but queſtions concerning the royal prerogative became frequent and abſolutely neceſſary. This Monarch was perpetually ſtriving to eſtabliſh principles whoſe conſequences had no leſs tendency than to ſubvert the government's whole conſtitution. I ſhall re-touch on ſome which have already appeared in the hiſtory of this reign, but which it is the more neceſſary to repeat here, as King Charles trod exactly in his father's ſteps, and as one cannot have a too clear idea of thoſe matters, they being the principal theme of this reign.

From the principle, that the parliament owed its exiſtence to conceſſions of the Kings, and that theſe conceſſions might be revoked, it naturally followed, that the King might govern without a parliament, and conſequently tax his people as he judged requiſite for the government's ſupport. From the principle, that the King was above the laws, it neceſſarily followed, that there was no ſecurity for the ſubjects, and their honor, fortunes, liberty and life itſelf were at the Sovereign's diſpoſal. From the principle, that the parliament had no right to interfere in any affairs wherein his Majeſty aſked not their advice, it could not but be infered, that the King was to be ſuffered to do whatever he pleaſed, even what was highly to the nation's detriment. From the principle, that to complain of the adminiſtration was want of reſpect to his Majeſty, it followed of courſe, that the parliament could take no grievances into conſideration, nor make any complaints, ſince grievances are generally acts of injuſtice commited by the King, or his miniſters. From the principle, that the parliament had at moſt

but a right of repreſenting grievances to his Majeſty, after which the redreſs was ſilently to be expected from himſelf, it followed, that the King might vex and moleſt his ſubjects juſt as he pleaſed, without being obliged to redreſs their ſufferings any farther than he thought proper. From the principle, that to diſpute the extent of his Majeſty's prerogative was wounding him in the moſt ſenſible part, the conſequence muſt have been; that the prerogative was without bounds, or that it could be limited only by the King's wiſdom and bounty. All theſe principles, as it is eaſy to perceive, tended only to eſtabliſh a deſpotic power. Had his ſaid Majeſty been ſatisfied with granting occaſionally ſome favor founded on any of theſe principles, it might have been looked on as a matter of no conſequence: but he was ſeen, on all occaſions, laboring to inſtil theſe principles into the minds of his ſubjects, and to eſtabliſh them upon inſtances, picked up here and there, of the conduct of his predeceſſors. He himſelf was, by his actions, ſeen to draw from thence the moſt extenſive conſequences; fill the kingdom with monopolies; compel his ſubjects to lend or give him money; diſſolve parliaments for not allowing his principles; impriſon ſuch members as ventured to ſpeak freely, and even openly to declare that he would call no more parliaments. Thus was there no medium: his pretenſions were either to be complied with, or oppoſed with bare-faced violence.

King James had the happineſs to die before this diviſion was carried any higher. Breaking off the Spaniſh match produced a reconciliation between him and his parliament. He perceived he could not proceed without parliaments, and the people judged that, while his Majeſty was ingaged in a war with the houſe of Auſtria, he would be conſtrained to ſhew a regard to the nation's liberties and parliament's privileges. Thus both ſides ſeemed inclinable to be reconciled, and to forget all occaſions of complaint.

James being dead, Charles I, his ſon and ſucceſſor, who by his leſſons had improved wonderfully, aſcended the throne, plentifully poſſeſſed with theſe principles: but being young, and his paſſions ſtrong, he could put no conſtraint upon himſelf, nor think of managing the parliament's affection. He ſoon diſcovered by what maxims he intended to proceed in the government of his dominions. He not only refuſed correcting the abuſes introduced during his father's reign, but even added diverſe new ones ſtill leſs tolerable. He affected giving his ſubjects to underſtand not only that their grievances touched him not, but that to petition a redreſs was offenſive. In a word, he very plainly intimated, both in his ſpeeches and conduct, that he looked on parliaments as no other than aſſemblies ſolely deſigned to ſupply him with money, and in caſe of refuſal, he could proceed without their aſſiſtance. Accordingly, he diſſolved diverſe parliaments, becauſe they were not prompt enough to grant the ſums he demanded; offered violence to ſeveral members; and extorted from his ſubjects what money he wanted, by forced loans, or taxes impoſed by his own authority: nor ought this to ſeem ſtrange, ſince, beſide the leſſons taught him by his father, he had the ſame favorite, the ſame miniſters, and the ſame council.

All this I purpoſe to ſet forth clearly and diſtinctly: nor will I do it by reaſonings and conſequences, but by unconteſted facts; by authentic vouchers of what I ſhall advance, and finally by this King's own conduct, which the moſt zealous of his partiſans have no otherwiſe gone about to vindicate than by a certain affected ſilence, or at leaſt by very ſuperficially gliding over the firſt fifteen years of his reign. My ſole view in thus entering on theſe particulars, which are of a large extent, is that a reader may be the better inabled to comprehend the real cauſes of that war wherewith the realm was afterwards afflicted.

James's funeral.

Soon as the deceaſed King's obſequies were ſolemniſed (1), Charles ſpeedily ſent eight thouſand men to Plymouth (2), to be imbarked for an expedition to Spain. As his exchequer was very low, the charge of coat and conduct was ordered to be diſburſed by the country, and the country to be reimburſed at a more convenient ſeaſon. This was done after the precedent of former times, tho' the cuſtom had been long diſuſed. Theſe troops having commited great diſorders in their march, the King granted a commiſſion for martial law to puniſh the offenders. This was looked on as an innovation which took from the uſual judges the cogniſance of crimes commited by the ſoldiery, and yet, in general, it was not much regarded.

The King's marriage, having been concluded in his father's life-time, was celebrated at Paris with great magnificence, on a theater erected before Notre-Dame church, the duke of Chevreuſe performing the office of proxy for the King of England. Preſently after, the duke of Buckingham was ſent into France to conduct over the Queen to her royal conſort. She arrived, June 12, at Dover, where the King met her next morning, and that evening the marriage was conſummated at Canterbury. The ſixteenth of that month, their Majeſties made their entry into London, and the parliament met two days after. King Charles made the following ſpeech to both houſes on opening this his firſt parliament.

" I Thank God, that the buſineſs to be treated on at this time is of ſuch a nature, that it needs no eloquence to ſet it forth; for I am neither able to do it, neither doth it ſtand with my nature to ſpend much time in words. It is no new buſineſs, being already happily begun by my father of bleſſed memory, who is with God; therefore it needeth no narrative: I hope in God you will go on to maintain it, as freely as you adviſed my father to do it. It is true, he may ſeem to ſome to have been ſlack to begin ſo juſt and ſo glorious a work; but it was his wiſdom which made him loth to begin a work, until he might find a means to maintain it. But after he ſaw how much he was abuſed in the confidence he had with other ſtates, and was confirmed by your advice to run the courſe we are in, with your ingagement to maintain it, I need not preſs to prove how willingly he took your advice; for the preparations which are made are better able to declare it, than I to ſpeak it. The aſſiſtance of thoſe in Germany, the fleet which is ready for action, with the reſt of the preparations, wherein I have only followed my father, do ſufficiently prove that he entered into this action.

It is true, " I came into this buſineſs willingly and freely, " like a young man, and of conſequence raſhly; " but it was by your intereſt, your ingagement: " ſo that, tho' it were done like a young man, " yet I cannot repent me of it; and I think none " can blame me for it, knowing the love and " fidelity you have borne to your King, having " myſelf likewiſe ſome little experience of your " affections. I pray you remember, that this " being my firſt action, and begun by your advice " and intreaty, what a great diſhonor it were to " you and me if this action, ſo begun, ſhould fail " for that aſſiſtance you are able to give me. His lordſhip farther commended three circumſtances:

" Secondly, ſupply; if ſubſidies be thought too " long and backward, his Majeſty deſires to hear, " and not to propound the way.

" Thirdly, the iſſue of action; which being the " firſt, doth highly concern his Majeſty's honor " and reputation, for which he relies upon their " loves, with the greateſt confidence that ever " King had in his ſubjects; witneſs his royal poſy, " Amor Civium Regis Munimentum:" and he " doubts not, but as ſoon as he ſhall be known in " Europe to be their King, ſo ſoon ſhall they be " known to be a loving and loyal nation to " him."

The parliament petition Charles againſt Popiſh recuſants. His general anſwer. Ruſhworth, p. 173.

Tho' Charles in his ſpeech aſſerted, that no Prince was ever more deſirous to maintain the religion he profeſſed, the parliament ſeems not to have been fully convinced of it, ſince both houſes joined very early in petitioning him againſt recuſants. His Majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer, ſaying, he was exceedingly glad to ſee their zeal for religion, and was ready to concur with them in whatever they ſhould propoſe on that head. He however defered replying to each particular article of the petition, 'till he had examined it.

Montague cited to account for a book of his. Ruſhworth. Ibid. Annals, p. 109. Coke, p. 199.

Mr. Richard Montague, a divine, had lately got printed a book bearing title, " An Appeal to " Cæſar," wherein were ſeveral propoſitions tending to the diſturbance of church and ſtate (3). It was complained of to the commons, who citing the author to appear before them, and examining him, thought fit to refer him to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. That prelate, who was looked on with no good eye at court, becauſe he was ſuſpected of being a friend to the Puritans, contented himſelf with exhorting him to write no more upon ſuch topics. The commons procedure diſpleaſed his Majeſty; for Montague, being one of his chaplains, he pretended the bringing him to their bar was incroaching on his prerogative. He expreſſed his diſpleaſure with the commons, and took occaſion to bring this cauſe before the council. It was generally ſuſpected that, as Montague's book contained Arminian doctrines, Laud, biſhop of St. David's (4) the King's moſt intimate counſellor for religious affairs, had done this to ſtop the proſecution. Laud was by many conſidered as head and protector of the Arminians, who were now very numerous in England. He had inſinuated himſelf into Buckingham's favor, and by that means into the King's, who readily followed his counſels in all matters concerning religion.

The diſguſt Charles expreſſed againſt the commons, hindered not that houſe from granting him two ſubſidies. His Majeſty accepted them graciouſly,

(3) Here our author is ſomewhat miſtaken.——Montague (in 21 Jac.) publiſhed a book, which he called, " A new Gag for " an old Gooſe," being in anſwer to a Popiſh book, intitled, " A Gag for the new Goſpel;" and for this book he was queſtioned by the parliament, and commited to the archbiſhop, who diſmiſſed him with an admonition. Afterwards the biſhops of the Arminian party conſulting the propagation of the five articles condemned at the ſynod of Dort, concluded, that Montague ſhould publiſh his " Appeal to Cæſar," at firſt atteſted by their joint authorities, which they afterwards withdrew by ſubtilty. However, the book was printed and dedicated to King Charles. The houſe appointed a commitee to examine the errors therein, and thanked the archbiſhop for his admonition formerly to the author, and voted his books to be contrary to the articles eſtabliſhed by the parliament, and took bond for his appearance. but withal intimated this ſupply to be far ſhort of what was neceſſary for the war (1) to which his father was adviſed by the parliament. The act for two ſubſidies was no ſooner paſſed than Charles adjourned the parliament to Oxford, there to re-aſſemble, Auguſt the firſt, next inſuing, on account of the peſtilence then raging at London.

Six ſhips lent the French King to ſerve againſt Rochel. Ibid. Annals, p. 109. Coke, p. 190, &c.

King James, a little before his deceaſe, had ingaged to lend the King of France five or ſix ſhips, to ſerve againſt the Genoeſes; at leaſt on that pretext they were borrowed: but afterwards, Lewis XIII, wanting theſe ſhips for the ſiege of Rochel, did by Buckingham's means prevail with King Charles, that he might imploy them where he pleaſed, and accordingly they were ſent to Diepe, under command of vice-admiral Pennington (2). The commanders of this ſquadron, finding they were to go againſt Rochel, weighed anchor and returned to England. Pennington, having thereof informed the duke of Buckingham, received expreſs orders, confirmed by another from the King, that he ſhould repair to Diepe with the ſhips, and deliver them to the French, which accordingly was executed: but the mariners all deſerted, abſolutely refuſing to ſerve againſt Rochel.

Complaints againſt Buckingham; Auguſt 1. Ruſhworth, p. 176.

This buſineſs made much noiſe at Oxford, where the parliament was re-aſſembled. Buckingham's ill conduct in this and other reſpects was loudly exclaimed againſt in the houſe of commons. It was ſaid, the money granted by parliament to the late King had been miſapplied, and put to uſes very different from thoſe for which it was deſigned. That the ſeas were ſo ill guarded, that the corſairs had done great damage to the Engliſh merchants. That Popery and Arminianiſm were countenanced by a ſtrong party in England. Neile biſhop of Wincheſter, and Laud biſhop of St. David's, were generally looked on as heads and protectors of the Arminians (3), nay, as favorers of Popery, by reaſon of their rigid and paſſionate zeal for all the ceremonies of the church of England, even for ſuch as ſeemed the leaſt neceſſary. This zeal appeared to many as myſterious as uncommon, and cauſed them to ſuſpect, that the two prelates, under color of maintaining religion, had formed a project to reſtore Popery. They could not be perſuaded that men ſhould have ſuch a ſtrong attachment to things in themſelves of ſo little moment, without ſome concealed views. Wherefore Montague was ſummoned a ſecond time before the houſe of commons, and ſeverely reprimanded.

The King ſends for the two houſes.

Mean while Charles, finding the parliament had imployed the firſt three or four days of their ſeſſion in diſcourſing of grievances, without any mention of the money he expected for ſupporting the war, ſent for both houſes, and in Chriſt-Church hall made them this ſpeech.

My lords, and you of the commons,

The King's ſpeech to both houſes. Auguſt 4. Ruſhworth, p. 177. Annals, p. 110.

"WE all remember that, from your deſires and advice, my father, now with God, brake off thoſe two treaties with Spain which were then in hand. Well you then foreſaw, that, as well for regaining my diſpoſſeſſed brother's inheritance, as home defenſe, a war was likely to ſucceed; and that as your counſels had led my father into it, ſo your aſſiſtance in a parliamentary way to purſue it ſhould not be wanting. That aid you gave him by advice, was for ſuccor of his allies, the guarding of Ireland, and the home parts, ſupply of munition, preparing and ſeting forth his navy. A council you thought of, and appointed for the war, and treaſurers for iſſuing the monies: and to begin this work of your advice, you gave three ſubſidies, and as many fifteenths, which with ſpeed were levied, and by direction of that council of war (in which the preparation of this navy was not the leaſt) diſburſed.

CHARLES I AN' 1625.

"It pleaſed God, at the entrance of this preparation (by your advice begun) to call my father to his mercy, whereby I entered as well to the care of your deſign, as his crown. I did not then, as Princes do of cuſtom and formality, re-aſſemble you, but that, by your farther advice and aid, I might be able to proceed in that which, by your counſels, my father was ingaged in. Your love to me, and forwardneſs to farther thoſe affairs, you expreſſed by a grant of two ſubſidies yet ungathered, altho' I muſt aſſure you, by my ſelf and others upon credit taken up, and aforehand diſburſed, and as far ſhort, as yet to ſet forth that navy now preparing; as I have lately the eſtimate from thoſe of care, and who are ſtill imployed about it, whoſe particular of all expenſes about the preparation ſhall be given you, when you pleaſe to take an account of it."

The ſecretaries ſpeeches. Ruſhworth, p. 178. * Lord Conway and ſir John Cook.

His Majeſty having done ſpeaking, the ſecretaries of ſtate * made ſpeeches, the deſign whereof, like that of the King's, was to demonſtrate the abſolute neceſſity the commons were under, to grant his Majeſty a large ſum for the war wherein he was ingaged. They forgot not to repeat, that the war was commenced by his late Majeſty, purely thro' the advice of both houſes of parliament; for this was what Charles conſidered as a reaſon unanſwerable. But the parliament being now better informed how the King and duke procured that advice from the former parliament theſe two ſpeeches produced no great effect. The commons being returned to their houſe, proceeded to examine grievances, and in this examination diverſe complaints were exhibited againſt the duke of Buckingham. It was alſo complained; that Popery was not only tolerated, but even countenanced, contrary to the King's expreſs promiſe: that pardons were granted to recuſants, ſigned by lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, who pretended to be authoriſed by his Majeſty, and that theſe pardons obſtructed the courſe of juſtice and execution of the laws. Charles hereupon thought himſelf obliged to return poſitive anſwers to the petition preſented to him at London by the two houſes, to which he had hitherto only anſwered in general. It is abſolutely neceſſary to inſert here the petition, with King Charles's replications to each article, that readers may the better judge how this King's promiſes were afterwards executed.

Petition of both houſes againſt Popiſh recuſants. Ruſhworth, p. 181.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

"IT being infallibly true, that nothing can more eſtabliſh the throne, and aſſure the peace and proſperity of the people, than the unity and ſincerity of religion; we your moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons of this preſent parliament aſſembled, hold our ſelves bound in conſcience and duty to repreſent the ſame to your ſacred Majeſty, together with the dangerous

" conſequences of the increaſe of Popery in this " land, and what we conceive to be the principal " cauſes thereof, and what may be the remedies.

The dangers appear in theſe particulars.

" I. In their deſperate ends, being, both the " ſubverſion of church and ſtate, and the reſtleſs- " neſs of their ſpirits to attain theſe ends; the doc- " trine of their teachers and leaders, perſuading " them that therein they do God good ſervice.

" II. Their evident and ſtrict dependency upon " ſuch foreign Princes, as no way affect the good " of your Majeſty and this ſtate.

" III. The opening a way of popularity to the " ambition of any who ſhall adventure to make " himſelf head of ſo great a party.

The principal cauſes of the increaſe of Papiſts.

" I. The want of due execution of the laws a- " gainſt jeſuits, ſeminary-prieſts, and Popiſh re- " cuſants; occaſioned partly by the connivency of " the ſtate, partly by defects in the laws them- " ſelves, and partly by the manifold abuſes of offi- " cers.

" II. The interpoſing of foreign Princes by their " embaſſadors and agents in their favor.

" III. Their great concourſe to the city, and " frequent conferences and conventicles there.

" IV. The open and uſual reſort to the houſes " and chapels of foreign embaſſadors.

" V. The education of their children in ſemina- " ries, and houſes of their religion in foreign parts, " which of late have been greatly multiplied and " inlarged for the entertainment of the Engliſh.

" VI. That, in ſome places of your realm, your " people be not ſufficiently inſtructed in the know- " ledge of true religion.

" VII. The licencious printing and diſperſing of " Popiſh and ſeditious books.

" VIII. The imployment of men ill-affected in " religion in places of government, who do, ſhall, " or may countenance the Popiſh party.

The remedies againſt this outrageous and dangerous diſeaſe we conceive to be theſe inſuing:

" I. That the youth of this realm be carefully " educated by able and religious ſchool-maſters, " and they to be injoined to catechiſe and inſtruct " their ſcholars in the grounds and principles of " true religion. And whereas, by many com- " plaints from diverſe parts of the kingdom, it doth " plainly appear, that ſundry Popiſh ſcholars, diſ- " ſembling their religion, have craftily creeped in, " and obtained the places of teaching in diverſe " counties, and thereby infected and perverted " their ſcholars, and ſo fited them to be tranſported " to the Popiſh ſeminaries beyond the ſeas; that " therefore there be great care in chuſing and admit- " ing ſchool-maſters, and that the ordinaries make " diligent inquiries of their demeanors, and pro- " ceed to the removing ſuch as ſhall be faulty, or " juſtly ſuſpected.

His Majeſty's anſwer.

This is allowed of; and for the better perform- ance of what is deſired, letters ſhall be written to the two archbiſhops, and from them letters go to all the ordinaries of their ſeveral provinces to ſee this done; the ſeveral ordinaries to give account of their doings herein to the archbiſhops reſpectively, and they to give account to his Majeſty of their proceedings herein.

" II. That the ancient diſcipline of the univerſi- " ties be reſtored, being the famous nurſeries of li- " terature and virtue.

Anſwer. This is approved by his Majeſty, and the chancellor of each univerſity ſhall be required to cauſe the due execution of it.

" III. That ſpecial care be taken to inlarge the " word of God, throughout all the parts of your " Majeſty's dominions, as being the moſt power- " ful means for planting true religion, and rooting " out the contrary: to which end, among othe: " things, let it pleaſe your Majeſty to adviſe your " biſhops, by fatherly intreaty and tender uſage, " to reduce to the peaceable and orderly ſervice of " the church, ſuch able miniſters as have been for- " merly ſilenced that there may be a profitable " uſe of their miniſtry in theſe needful and dange- " rous times; and that non-reſidency, pluralities " and commendams may be moderated. Where " we cannot forbear moſt humbly to thank your " Majeſty for diminiſhing the number of your own " chaplains; not doubting of the like princely care " for the well-beſtowing the reſt of your benefices, " both to the comfort of the people, and the in- " couragement of the univerſities; being full of " grave and able miniſters unfurniſhed of livings.

CHARLES I An' 1625.

Anſwer. This his Majeſty likes well, ſo as it be applied to ſuch miniſters as are peaceable, orderly and conformable to the church-government. For pluralities and non-reſidencies, they are now ſo mo- derated, that the archbiſhops affirm, there be now no diſpenſations for pluralities granted; nor no man now is allowed above two benefices, and theſe not above thirty miles diſtant: and for avoiding non- reſidence, the canon in that caſe provided ſhall be duly put in execution. For commendams, they ſhall be ſparingly granted, only in ſuch caſe where the exility and ſmalneſs of the biſhoprick requireth. Alſo his Majeſty will cauſe that the benefices belong- ing to him ſhall be well beſtowed. And for the better propagating religion, his Majeſty recom- mendeth to the houſe of parliament, that care may be taken and proviſion made, that every pariſh ſhall allow a competent maintenance for an able mini- ſter; and that the owners of parſonages impropriate would allow to the vicars, curates and miniſters, in villages and places belonging to their parſonage, ſufficient ſtipend and allowance for preaching mi- niſters.

" IV. That there may be ſtrict proviſion againſt " tranſporting Engliſh children to the ſeminaries " beyond the ſeas, and for the recalling them who " are already there placed, and for the puniſhment " of ſuch your ſubjects as are maintainers of thoſe " ſeminaries, or of the ſcholars; conſidering that, " beſide the ſeducing your people, great ſums of " money are yearly expended upon them, to the " impoveriſhing this kingdom.

Anſwer. The law in this caſe ſhall be put in exe- cution: and farther, there ſhall be letters written to the lord-treaſurer, and alſo to the lord-admiral, that all the ports of this realm, and the creeks and members thereof be ſtrictly kept, and ſtrait ſearches made to this end: a proclamation ſhall be, to recall both the children of noblemen, and the children of any other men, and they to return by a day; alſo maintainers of ſeminaries or ſcholars there ſhall be puniſhed according to law.

" V. That no Popiſh recuſant be permited to " come within the court, unleſs your Majeſty be " pleaſed to call him upon ſpecial occaſion, agree- " ably to the ſtatute of 3 Jac. And whereas " your Majeſty, for the preventing apparent miſ- " chiefs both to your Majeſty and the ſtate, hath " in your princely wiſdom taken order that none " of your natural-born ſubjects, not profeſſing the " true religion as by law eſtabliſhed, be admited " into the ſervice of your royal conſort the Queen. " We give your Majeſty moſt humble thanks, and " deſire that your order herein may be obſerved.

Anſwer. If his Majeſty ſhall find, or be inform- ed of any concourſe of recuſants to the court, the law ſhall be ſtrictly followed: and his Majeſty is pleaſed that, by proclamation, the Britiſh and Iriſh ſubjects ſhall be put in the ſame caſe. And as his Majeſty hath provided in his treaty with France, ſo his purpoſe is to keep it, that none of his ſubjects ſhall be admited into his ſervice, or into the ſervice of his royal conſort the Queen, who are Popiſh recuſants.

" VI. That all the laws now ſtanding in force " againſt Jeſuits, ſeminary prieſts and others, " having taken orders by authority derived from " the See of Rome, be put in due execution. " And, to the intent they may not pretend to be " ſurpriſed, that a ſpeedy and certain day be pre- " fixed, by your Majeſty's proclamation, for their " departure out of this realm, and all other your " dominions, and not to return upon the ſevereſt " penalties of the laws now in force againſt them; " and that all your Majeſty's ſubjects may be " thereby admoniſhed not to receive, comfort, " entertain, or conceal any of them, upon the " penalties which may be lawfully inflicted: and " that all ſuch Papiſts, Jeſuits and recuſants, who " are and ſhall be impriſoned for recuſancy, or " any other cauſe, may be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained as " that none ſhall have conference with them, there- " by to avoid the contagion of their corrupt re- " ligion: and that no man who ſhall be ſuſpected " of Popery, be ſuffered to be a keeper of any " of his Majeſty's priſons.

Anſwer. The laws in this caſe ſhall be put in execution, and a proclamation ſhall be to the effect deſired; and ſuch reſtraint ſhall be made as is deſired, and no man who is juſtly ſuſpected of Popery, ſhall be ſuffered to be a keeper of any of his Majeſty's priſons.

" VII. That your Majeſty be pleaſed to take " ſuch order as to your princely wiſdom ſhall be " expedient, that no natural born ſubject, or ſtrange " biſhops, nor any other by authority from the " See of Rome, confer any eccleſiaſtical orders, " to exerciſe any eccleſiaſtical function whatſoever, " toward or upon your Majeſty's natural ſubjects " within your dominions.

Anſwer. This is fit to be ordered according as is provided, and it ſhall be ſo publiſhed by proclamation.

" VIII. That your Majeſty's learned council " may receive order and commandment, to conſider " of all former grants of recuſants lands, that ſuch " of them may be avoided as are made to the " recuſants uſe or intereſt, out of which the recuſant " receiveth any benefit, which are either void, or " voidable by the law.

Anſwer. The King will give order to his learned council to conſider of the grants, and will do according as is deſired.

" IX. That your Majeſty will be likewiſe pleaſed " ſtrictly to command all your judges and miniſters " of juſtice, eccleſiaſtical and temporal, to ſee the " laws of this realm againſt Popiſh recuſants to be " duly executed; and namely, that the cenſure of " excommunication be declared and certified againſt " them; and that they be not abſolved upon " public ſatisfaction by yielding to conformity.

Anſwer. His Majeſty leaves the laws to their courſe, and will order, in the point of excommunication, as is deſired.

" X. That your Majeſty will be pleaſed to re- " move, from places of authority and government, " all ſuch perſons as are either Popiſh recuſants, or, " according to direction of former acts of ſtate, " to be juſtly ſuſpected.

Anſwer. This his Majeſty thinks fit, and will give order for it.

" XI. That preſent order be taken for diſarming " all Popiſh recuſants, legally convicted, or juſtly " ſuſpected, according to the laws in that behalf, " and the orders taken by his late Majeſty's privy- " council upon reaſons of ſtate.

Anſwer. The laws and acts in this caſe ſhall be followed and put in due execution.

" XII. That your Majeſty be alſo pleaſed, in re- " ſpect to the great reſort of recuſants to and about " London, to command forthwith, upon pain of " your indignation and ſevere execution of the " laws, that they retire themſelves to their ſeveral " countries, there to remain confined within five " miles of their places.

CHARLES I AN' 1625.

Anſwer. For this the laws in force ſhall be forthwith executed.

" XIII. And whereas your Majeſty hath ſtrictly " commanded and taken order, that none of the " natural born ſubjects repair to the hearing maſſes, " or other ſuperſtitious ſervice at the chapels, or " houſes of foreign embaſſadors, or in any other places " whatſoever; we give your Majeſty moſt humble " thanks, and deſire that your order and com- " mandment therein may be continued and ob- " ſerved, and that the offenders herein may be " puniſhed according to the laws.

Anſwer. The King gives aſſent thereto, and will ſee that obſerved which herein hath been commanded by him.

" XIV. That all ſuch inſolencies as any who are " Popiſhly affected have lately commited, or ſhall " hereafter commit, to the diſhonor of our religion, " or to the wrong of the true profeſſors thereof, " be exemplarily puniſhed.

Anſwer. This ſhall be done as is deſired.

" XV. That the ſtatute of 1. Eliz. for the " payment of twelve pence every Sunday, by ſuch " as ſhall be abſent from divine ſervice in the " church, without a lawful excuſe, may be put in " due execution, the rather, for that the penalty " by law is given to the poor, and therefore not to " be diſpenſed withal.

Anſwer. It is fit that this ſtatute be executed, and the penalties ſhall not be diſpenſed withal.

" XVI. Laſtly, that your Majeſty would be " pleaſed to extend your princely care alſo over " the kingdom of Ireland, that the like courſes " may be there taken for the reſtoring and eſtabliſh- " ing true religion.

Anſwer. His Majeſty's cares are, and ſhall be extended over the kingdom of Ireland; and he will do all a religious King ſhould do for the reſtoring and eſtabliſhing true religion there.

" And thus (moſt gracious Sovereign) according " to our duty and zeal to God and religion, to " your Majeſty and your ſafety, to the church and " commonwealth, and their peace and proſperity, " we have made a faithful declaration of the preſent " eſtate, the cauſes and remedies of this increaſing " diſeaſe of Popery; humbly offering the ſame to " your princely care and wiſdom. The anſwer of " your Majeſty's father, our late Sovereign of " famous memory, upon the like petition, did give " us great comfort of reformation; but your Ma- " jeſty's moſt gracious promiſes made, in that kind, " do give us confidence and aſſurance of the con- " tinual performance thereof. In which comfort " and confidence repoſing ourſelves, we moſt " humbly pray for your Majeſty's long continuance " in all princely felicity."

The King's promiſes ill executed.

The gracious anſwers of his Majeſty to the ſeveral articles of the petition of both houſes, wanted only performance of the promiſes. But, if it may be judged by the continual complaints of the parliaments throughout this whole reign, concerning theſe ſame articles, whereon this Prince ſeems to have given intire ſatisfaction, it will readily appear that King Charles's promiſes were no better performed than his father's. Charles expected, that his anſwers to the petition would gain him the affection of the commons. But theſe anſwers, gracious and poſitive as they were, ſufficed not to ingage them to do what he deſired, that is, to lay aſide all other buſineſs, and think only of furniſhing him with money.

Occaſion of Charles's complaint againſt the commons.

He

CHARLES I. An' 1625.

He was ingaged in a war, to which he pretended the parliament had induced his late Majeſty, whence he infered it to be a ſignal piece of injuſtice not to inable him to ſupport it; and that very ſpeedily. This was, in one ſenſe, certainly true. The parliament adviſed King James to break off the treaties with Spain, and promiſed to aſſiſt him in caſe the breach ſhould occaſion a war, of which there was a probability. But, on the other ſide, it was now no longer a ſecret in England, that the former parliament was moved to give King James ſuch counſel merely thro' Buckingham's report; a report falſe in every particular, tho' atteſted by his late Majeſty and the then Prince of Wales. So the parliament's advice being gronnded on a bad foundation, and, as I may ſay, extorted by a mere fetch, the preſent parliament deemed not themſelves bound to any very punctual performance of a promiſe which the court had obtained rather by artifice than by fairly ſtating the caſe. Nevertheleſs this promiſe ſtill ſubſiſted; and if the commons had gone about to convince the public that they were not obliged to keep it, they could not have done it without grievouſly affronting the King, by ſuch diſcovery of the artifices he had uſed to procure it. This extremity they were willing to avoid: and therefore, leaving the promiſe to ſubſiſt without any diſobliging reflection on the King, their aim was to excuſe themſelves from granting him freſh ſupplies for a war raſhly undertaken, and without any likelihood of ſucceſs: at leaſt, if they ſhould be conſtrained to ſupply more money, rather than enter into a diſcuſſion of cauſes which had ingaged the kingdom in this war, they intended Charles ſhould in ſome meaſure purchaſe them with the redreſs of grievances under which the nation lay groaning. Wherefore, inſtead of the money-bill, as his Majeſty wiſhed, they began with examining and even inquiring after the public's grievances, and the ſtate of religion (1). In this examination, Buckingham and Charles's other miniſters were not ſpared.

Reaſons for the commons.

Ruſhworth, p. 119. Aug. 9. 10. Clarendon.

Charles determines on diſſolving the parliament.

Charles, perceiving how matters were carrying on in the houſe of commons, was highly offended. Firſt, as by their flowneſs they broke all his meaſures for the preſent campain. Secondly; he deemed it a manifeſt affront and contempt of his perſon, to preſume openly to attack his favorite and miniſters, or rather himſelf under their name. So, perceiving no likelihood of a ſpeedy ſupply, which was the ſole end of calling this parliament, he was determined to diſſolve it. The commons having thereof ſome notice, haſtily drew up the ſubſequent declaration, in order to throw the blame of this diſſolution on the King, for fear he ſhould himſelf lay it on them, under color of their not being over and above prompt to perform their promiſe.

The commons draw up a declaration.

Ruſhworth, p. 190.

"WE the knights, citizens and burgeſſes of "the commons houſe of parliament, being "the repreſentative body of the whole commons of "this realm, abundantly comforted in his Ma- "jeſty's gracious anſwer touching religion, and "his meſſage for the care of our health, do "ſolemnly proteſt and vow before God and the "world, with one heart and voice, that we are all "reſolved, and do hereby declare, that we will "ever continue moſt loyal and obedient ſubjects to "our moſt gracious ſovereign lord King Charles; "and that we will be ready, in convenient time, to "and in a parliamentary way, freely and dutifully "to do our utmoſt indeavors to diſcover and re- "form the abuſes and grievances of the realms and "ſtate, and in like ſort to afford all neceſſary ſup- "ply to his moſt excellent Majeſty, upon his preſent, and all other his juſt occaſions and deſigns; "moſt humbly beſeeching our ſaid dear and dread "Sovereign, in his princely wiſdom and goodneſs, "to reſt aſſured of the true and hearty affections "of his poor commons, and to eſteem the ſame "to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greateſt "worldly reputation and ſecurity a juſt King can "have; and to account all ſuch as ſlanderers of "the peoples affections, and enemies to the com- "monwealth, who ſhall dare to ſay the contrary."

CHARLES I. An' 1625.

It manifeſtly appears in this declaration, that the commons aim was to intimate to the people, that they deſigned not to refuſe money to his Majeſty for his juſt occaſions: but believed to have a right to demand firſt the redreſs of grievances, as a condition, tho' they avoided uſing that term. This is the method conſtantly obſerved by parliaments on like occaſions, and which is ſo neceſſary that, otherwiſe, they would never be ſure of procuring the people any ſatisfaction with reſpect to their grievances: for, grievances being properly acts of injuſtice, and breaches of the laws commited by the King or his miniſters, the deſire of obtaining money from the parliament is commonly the court's ſole inducement to deſiſt from oppreſſing the people. Of this the Hiſtory of England produces many examples. But James and Charles, the firſt of thoſe names, took a courſe quite different from that of their predeceſſors. They choſe rather to diſſolve parliaments than to give them ſatisfaction by redreſſing their ſubjects grievances. This gave occaſion to aſcribe to them a formal deſign to free themſelves from the yoke of parliaments, or confine them to furniſhing the Sovereign with money, and taxing the ſubjects. They could not comprehend that what flowed from the royal authority ſhould be deemed a grievance. On this only account was this firſt parliament diſſolved, the twelfth of Auguſt, not having ſat, to do buſineſs, more than three weeks, both at Weſtminſter and Oxford. His Majeſty pretended to diſſolve it, becauſe the plague drew near the place where it was aſſembled; but the true reaſon was, becauſe he found not in this parliament a compliance and diſpoſition anſwering his deſigns.

Parliament diſſolved. Jour. Parl. Ruſhworth, p. 191.

The parliament's diſſolution prevented not Charles's purſuing his deſign of continuing or rather commencing the war with Spain: for notwithſtanding his late Majeſty had taken ſome meaſures tending to a war, there had not however been any action ſince breaking off the treaty. The ſending count Mansfeldt to the Netherlands, in order to march into the Palatinate, was in a manner what alone could be conſidered as a ſort of declaration againſt Spain, tho' the project had miſcarried. Charles therefore, reſolving to imbark in this war, whereof he was the principal author and promoter, ſent the duke of Buckingham and earl of Holland to the Hague, to negociate a league with the United Provinces. Mean while, a navy was equiping in England, to act againſt the Spaniards: but as he wanted money, he found no ſpeedier or better method to raiſe it, than by borrowing of perſons able to lend, to whom he directed letters under his privy-ſeal, requiring, by way of loan, ſuch ſums as each was taxed at. This was the firſt effect of the parliament's diſſolution. Theſe forced loans, practiſed by ſome Kings of England, have ever been conſidered as great grievances, and tending to render parliaments uſeleſs. It will hereafter appear, that the next parliament ſuffered them not to paſs uncomplained of. However, to molify the peoples minds, and induce them to lend their money more Fleet ſent againſt Spain; Annals. Howes. Coke. p. 207, 208. Rym. Fœd Vol. XVIII. p. 181, &c.

The naval force deſigned againſt Spain was not ready to ſail 'till the begining of October, under command of Edward Cecil (2), lately created viſcount Wimbleton, who had for vice-admiral the earl of Eſſex. This fleet conſiſted of eighty ſail, on board which were ten regiments. The intent of this expedition was to wait in ſome convenient ſtation for the Spaniſh plate-fleet which was expected from Weſt-India in November. As the admiral had time enough, he might have attacked a great number of traders in Cadiz bay; but the difficulty of that enterpriſe, or ſome other motive, occaſioned his neglecting this advantage. He was contented with landing ſir John Burroughs with a few troops, who, meeting no oppoſition, only pillaged certain villages, and abuſed themſelves with wine more to their own than to their enemies detriment: whereupon they were forced to a precipitate re-imbarcation. Soon after, a contagious diſtemper raging among his troops, the admiral returned, with his whole fleet, to England in November, King Charles not reaping any benefit from this armament, which had been to him very expenſive. This ill ſucceſs greatly prejudiced the King, as well as Buckingham, who was looked on as the contriver and director of all the court-projects.

A new parliament. Ruſhworth, p. 198. Coke, p. 216.

Charles finding himſelf monileſs, and conſequently unable to continue the war, finally determined on ſummoning a new parliament: but to avoid the inconvenience of ſeeing in the lower houſe ſuch members as had moſt oppoſed him, and clamored againſt Buckingham in the late parliament, the court deviſed this expedient. All theſe perſons were named for ſheriffs, and conſequently could not be elected repreſentatives in parliament. Sir Edward Coke was of this number: nevertheleſs he and ſome others were choſen, prefering the ſervice they owed their country in parliament to that which they could render it as ſheriffs. The parliament was therefore ſummoned to meet on the ſixth of February 1625-6, and on the ſecond, being Candlemas-day, King Charles was crowned by archbiſhop Abbot; William Laud, biſhop of Bath and Wells, his Majeſty's favorite prelate, officiating as dean of Weſtminſter, in the room of biſhop Williams, who, thro' the King's diſfavor, was ſequeſtered from this ſervice (3).

Injunction concerning knighthood. Ruſhworth, p. 199. Annals.

Before the coronation, Charles by proclamation injoined all ſuch as were poſſeſſed of forty pounds per annum, or upwards, and were not knights, to receive knighthood at his hands. This was conſidered as a new grievance, whereof farther mention will be made hereafter. It ſuffices to ſay at preſent, that when this cuſtom was firſt authoriſed by act of parliament, with regard to ſuch as had annually twenty pounds in land, twenty pounds were then equivalent to three hundred at the time of which I am now ſpeaking. But King Charles fancied it was doing his ſubjects a favor to include ſuch only in his order as had forty pounds of yearly revenue.

The King's coronation. Ruſhworth, p. 200. Annals.

The coronation was performed with the uſual ceremonies. But when all was over, his Majeſty being ſeated on the throne ready to receive the peers homages, Laud, approaching him, read a very extraordinary paſſage, of which there appeared no inſtance in former coronations. The writing contained theſe words, viz.

"Stand and hold faſt, from henceforth, the place "to which you have been heir by the ſucceſſion of "your forefathers, being now delivered to you by "the authority of Almighty God, and by the "hands of us, and all the biſhops and ſervants of "God: and as you ſee the clergy to come nearer "to the altar than others, ſo remember that (in all "places convenient) you give them greater honor, "that the mediator of God and man may eſtabliſh "you in the kingly throne to be a mediator betwixt the clergy and the laity; and that you may "reign for ever with Jeſus Chriſt, the King of "Kings, and Lord of Lords."

The parliament being aſſembled on the ſixth of February, the lord-keeper Williams, in his Majeſty's name, thus harangued the two houſes,

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

Ruſhworth, p. 201. The lord-keeper's ſpeech, p. 202.

And " when the royal diadem deſcended upon himſelf, " preſently, in the midſt of his tears and ſighs " for the departure of his moſt dear and royal " father, in the very firſt conſultation with his " privy council, was reſolved to meet his people " in parliament: and no ſooner did the heavy hand " of that deſtroying angel forbear thoſe deadly " ſtrokes, which for ſome time did make this " place inacceſſible (1), but his Majeſty preſently " reſolved to recal it, and hath now brought you " together, and in a happy time I truſt, to treat " and conſult, with uniform deſires and united " affections, of thoſe things which concern the " general good.

" And now being thus aſſembled, his Majeſty " hath commanded me to let you know, that his " love and affection to the public moved him to " call this parliament; and looking into the danger, " and the ſpreading of that late mortality, and " weighing the multitude of his Majeſty's preſſing " occaſions, and urging affairs of ſtate, both at " home and abroad, much importing the ſafety " and ſtate of this kingdom; the ſame affection " which moved him to call it, doth forbid him to " prolong the ſiting of this parliament: and there- " fore his Majeſty, reſolving to confine this meeting " to a ſhort time, hath confined me to a ſhort " errand; and that is, that as a thing moſt agree- " able to the Kingly office, to the example of the " beſt times, and to the frame of modern affairs, " his Majeſty hath called you together to conſult " and to adviſe of provident and good laws, pro- " fitable for the public, and fiting for the preſent " times and actions; for upon ſuch depends the " aſſurance of religion, and of juſtice, which are " the ſureſt pillars and butteresſes of good govern- " ment in a kingdom: for his Majeſty doth con- " ſider, that the royal throne, on which God, out " of his mercy to us, hath ſet him, is the fountain " of all juſtice, and that good laws are the ſtreams " and quits by which the benefit and uſe of this " fountain is diſperſed to his people; and it is his " Majeſty's care and ſtudy that his people may ſee, " with comfort and joy of heart, that this fountain " is not dry, but they and their poſterity may reſt " aſſured and confident in his time, to receive as " ample benefit from this fountain, by his Majeſty's " mercy and juſtice, as ever ſubjects did in the time " of the moſt eminent Princes among his noble pro- " genitors; wherein as his Majeſty ſhews himſelf " moſt ſenſible of the good of the public, ſo were it " an injury to this great and honorable aſſembly, " if it ſhould be but doubted, that they ſhould not " be as ſenſible of any thing which may add to " his Majeſty's honor; which cannot but receive " a high degree of love and affection, if his Ma- " jeſty, ſucceeding ſo many religious, wiſe and re- " nowned Princes, ſhould begin his reign with " ſome additions unto thoſe good laws which their " happy and glorious times have afforded. And " this his Majeſty hath cauſed me to deſire, at this " time eſpecially above others; for his Majeſty " having, at his royal coronation, lately ſolemniſed " the ſacred rights of that bleſſed marriage between " his people and him; and therein, by a moſt " holy oath, vowed the protection of the laws, and " maintenance of peace, both to church and people, " no time could be fit for his Majeſty to adviſe and " conſult at large with his people, as at this preſent " time, wherein ſo lately his Majeſty hath vowed " protection to his people, and they have proteſted " their allegiance and ſervice to him.

" This is the ſum of that charge which I have " received from his Majeſty to deliver unto you; " wherein you ſee his Majeſty's intent to the public: " and therefore his deſire is that, according to that " conveniency of time which his affairs may afford, " you may apply yourſelves to diſpatch the buſineſs " of this parliament."

Charles I An' 1625.

Tho' it appeared not in this ſpeech, that Charles deſigned aſking a ſupply of the commons, nevertheleſs, as was afterwards ſeen, that was the real motive of his convening a parliament. But the commons deemed not themſelves obliged to gueſs his Majeſty's intention, or prevent his demand: ſo, after chuſing a ſpeaker, their firſt care was to thank the King for his gracious anſwer to the petition againſt recuſants, preſented him at Oxford. Then they imployed ſome days in examining national grievances, among which were reckoned, the miſcarriage of the late fleet, evil counſellors about his Majeſty, and the miſ-imploying thoſe three ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, granted the deceaſed King for recovering the Palatinate. To examine the grievances with more order and perſpicuity, commitees were appointed, one for ſecret affairs, another for grievances, and a third for religion. This latter, whereof Mr. Pym was chairman, re-called in queſtion Montague's books (2), intitled, " An Anſwer to the late Gagg of Pro- " teſtants; An Appeal to Cæſar, and A Treatiſe of " the Invocation of Saints," and brought in his report of the falſe, erroneous, Papiſtical and Arminion opinions found therein, repugnant to the church of England's articles. For inſtance, " That " the church of Rome hath ever remained firm " upon the ſame foundation of ſacraments and " doctrines inſtituted by God. That the contro- " verted points are of a leſſer and inferior nature, " of which a man may be ignorant without any " danger of his ſoul. That images may be uſed for " inſtruction of the ignorant, and excitation of " devotion. That men juſtified may fall away " and depart from the ſtate of grace;" with other Arminian tenets.

Charles, finding the commons intent on the examination of religious matters, ordered his attorney-general to acquaint the judges*, that it was his pleaſure they ſhould proceed rigorouſly againſt Popiſh recuſants. This he had promiſed, ſix months before, in his anſwer to the former parliament's petition: but, in all appearance, this article had been neglected by the court, or by thoſe who were commiſſioned to execute the orders. It is certain that, during this reign, orders of that nature were never executed with much punctuality.

His Majeſty had demanded a ſupply of money to carry on the war; but the commons were in no haſte to grant it. On the contrary, they ſtill proceeded in the examination of grievances, and, among others, of certain repriſals ſomewhat too precipitately made upon France, to the Engliſh merchants (3) exceſſive detriment. The council of war, appointed by parliament to manage the three ſubſidies granted King James, were likewiſe obliged to render account of their procedure.

CHARLES I AN' 1625.

The lords follicit them in vain.

King Charles, bearing this delay moſt impatiently, preſſed the commons to conſider of ſupplying what he wanted. The peers alſo uſed ſome efforts to that purpoſe, in a conference they deſired on this occaſion; but all in vain. On the contrary, they heard the commitee's report concerning public grievances, wherein they had always in view the duke of Buckingham, and even cauſed him to be informed of the articles whereon the complaints againſt him were grounded. Hereupon Charles ſent a letter to the ſpeaker, with a meſſage to the houſe, by ſir Richard Weſton.

His Majeſty's letter to the ſpeaker. Ruſhworth, p. 214. Annals. p. 115.

Truſty and well-beloved,

"HAving aſſembled the parliament early in the begining of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs; and having of late, not only by meſſage, but alſo of ourſelf, put our houſe of commons in mind of our preſſing occaſions, and of the preſent eſtate of Chriſtendom, wherein they have equal intereſt with us, as well in reſpect of their own former ingagements, as of the common cauſe: we ſhall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have, in the midſt of our neceſſities, attended their reſolutions; but becauſe their unſeaſonable ſlowneſs may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole eſtate of things abroad; we have thought fit, by you the ſpeaker, to let them know that, without more loſs of time, we look for a full and perfect anſwer of what they will give for our ſupply, according to our expectation, and their promiſes; wherein, as we preſs for nothing beyond the preſent ſtate and condition of our ſubjects, ſo we accept no leſs than is proportionable to the greatneſs and goodneſs of the cauſe: neither do we preſs them to a preſent reſolution in this, with a purpoſe to precipitate their counſel, much leſs to enter upon their privileges, but to ſhew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Chriſtendom may break in upon us on the ſudden, to our diſhonor, and the ſhame of this nation. And for the buſineſs at home, we command you to promiſe them in our name, that after they have ſatisfied us in this our reaſonable demand, we ſhall not only continue them together at this time, ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, but call them ſhortly again to perfect thoſe neceſſary buſineſſes which ſhall be now left undone; and now we ſhall willingly apply fit and ſeaſonable remedies to ſuch juſt grievances as they ſhall preſent unto us in a dutiful and mannerly way, without throwing an ill odour upon our preſent government, or upon the government of our late bleſſed father. And if there be yet who deſire to find fault, we ſhall think him the wiſeſt reprehender of paſſed errors who, without reflecting backward, can give us counſel how to ſettle the preſent eſtate of things, and to provide for the future ſafety and honor of the kingdom."

The meſſage brought at the ſame time and delivered to the houſe by Weſton, contained five articles to be provided for; viz.

Heads of the expenſe to be provided for. Ruſhworth, p. 215.

"1. That his Majeſty's fleet being returned, and the victuals expended, the men muſt of neceſſity be diſcharged, and their wages paid, or elſe mutiny will aſſuredly follow, which may be many ways dangerous at this time.

"2. That his Majeſty hath made ready about forty ſhips, to be ſet forth on a ſecond voyage, to hinder the enemy, which want only victuals and ſome men, which, without preſent ſupply of money, cannot be ſet forth and kept together.

"3. That the army which is appointed in every coaſt, muſt preſently be diſbanded, if they be not preſently ſupplied with victuals and clothes. CHARLES I AN' 1625.

"4. That if the companies of Ireland, lately ſent thither, be not provided for, inſtead of defending that country, they will prove the authors of rebellion.

"5. That the ſeaſon of providing healthful victuals will be over, if this month be neglected.

"And therefore his Majeſty commandeth me to tell you, that he deſired to know, without farther delay of time, what ſupply you will give him for theſe his preſent occaſions, that he may accordingly frame his courſe and counſel."

The commons diſguſted; and why.

The commons were not very well pleaſed with the letter or meſſage, wherein were ſeveral particulars which they could not approve. 1. The manner of demanding the ſupply, which ſhewed it to be not ſo much a free-gift on their part, as an obligation. 2. The King ſet them a time, by ordering it to be done without delay, and before all other buſineſs whatever. 3. He would not accept of leſs than what was neceſſary, and this could relate only to the five articles of expenſe, which was properly ſpecifying to them the ſum they were to give. 4. The King demanded money with extraordinary and unprecedented haughtineſs. 5. He grounded his demands on King James's promiſe to the laſt parliament; a promiſe fraudulently obtained by the duke of Buckingham's miſ-report. 6. The war, for which ſo much money was to be given, had been raſhly undertaken, at a time when there was no proſpect of ſucceſs, and the King and duke of Buckingham were known to be the authors of it, tho' his Majeſty perpetually inſiſted on the parliament's advice to his father. Had it been undertaken at the begining of the quarrel between his Bohemian Majeſty and the Emperor, or even before loſing the Palatinate, when there was room to hope for aſſiſtance from the Proteſtant Princes, it might have been expected to be crowned with ſucceſs: but it commenced at a juncture when all the Princes of Germany were either ſubdued by, or united with the Emperor, at a juncture when there remained not a ſingle place which might afford the Engliſh any entrance into the Palatinate, or which they could poſſibly approach. How then could it be expected to wreſt the two Palatinates from the Emperor and duke of Bavaria? The whole therefore was reduced to attacking the Spaniard. Upon what account? It was either to oblige him to imploy his intereſt for reſtitution of the Palatinate, in which caſe a war was needleſs, ſince he had promiſed his mediation, and even ingaged to render it effectual before breaking off the marriage; or elſe, to conſtrain him to imploy his arms in wreſting the Palatinates from the two Princes in poſſeſſion: a project which appeared extravagant, and would have drained England of men and money to no purpoſe. Beſide, the late expedition of the fleet was no great incouragement to proſecute this undertaking. 7. Finally, tho' the commons cared not openly to enter into all theſe diſcuſſions, they were however willing to ſhew the King they meaned not to be amuſed with a promiſe extorted by mere artifice, and, if they granted him money, would reap at leaſt the advantage of procuring redreſs of the national grievances: but Charles took care to ſhut the door againſt them, by defering the redreſs of grievances to another time. As they perceived, and the King himſelf intimited to them, that the deſired ſupply would not be the laſt, they could not be ſure but, in the next ſeſſion of parliament, his Majeſty would again expect the money-bill to paſs before grievances, and ſo there would be no end. Theſe were the true cauſes of the commons tardineſs, and their being ſo luke-warm for the King's affairs, tho' they would not openly declare then, for fear of ingaging in debates offenſive to his Majeſty. Nevertheleſs they were willing to intimate them to him, and, very likely, he perceived them well enough, tho' it was thought proper on both ſides to conceal them from the public. For this reaſon, the commons determined on replying to the King's meſſage, and that their anſwer ſhould abound with reſpect, ſubmiſſion, expreſſions of their zeal for his ſervice, and even promiſes of aiding him in his wants, tho' in a general manner. But withal, they artfully intimated to him, that redreſs of grievances ought to precede the ſupply they intended to grant him. Their anſwer was in theſe terms: viz.

Their anſwer to his Majeſty. Ruſhworth, p. 210.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

"YOUR Majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, "the commons now aſſembled in parliament, "in all humility, preſent unto your royal wiſdom "this their loyal anſwer to the meſſage, which "your Majeſty was pleaſed, by the chancellor of "your exchequer, to ſend unto them, deſiring to "know, without any farther defering of time, what "ſupply they would give to your Majeſty for your "preſent and extraordinary occaſions, that you "might accordingly frame your courſes and coun-"ſels. Firſt of all, they moſt humbly beſeech "your Majeſty, to know and reſt aſſured, that no "King was ever dearer to his people than your "Majeſty; no people more zealous to maintain "and advance the honor and greatneſs of their "King than they; which, as upon all occaſions "they ſhall be ready to expreſs, ſo eſpecially for "the ſupport of that cauſe wherein your Majeſty, "and your allies, are now juſtly ingaged. And "becauſe they cannot doubt but your Majeſty, in "your great wiſdom, even out of juſtice, and ac-"cording to the example of your moſt famous "predeceſſors, will be pleaſed graciouſly to accept "the faithful and neceſſary information and advice "of your parliament, which can have no end but "the ſervice of your Majeſty, and ſafety of your "realm, in diſcovering the cauſes, and propoſing "the remedies of theſe great evils, which have oc-"caſioned your Majeſty's wants, and your peoples "grief.

"They therefore, in confidence and full aſſu-"rance of redreſs therein, do with one conſent "propoſe (tho' in former time ſuch courſe hath "been unuſed) that they really intend to aſſiſt and "ſupply your Majeſty in ſuch a war, and in ſo "ample a meaſure, as may make you ſafe at home, "and feared abroad; for the diſpatch whereof "they will uſe ſuch diligence as your Majeſty's "preſſing and preſent occaſions ſhall require."

Charles perfectly well comprehended the houſe's drift in ſending him this anſwer: but he had not the ſame reaſons as the commons to be reſerved in his expreſſions. It was rather his intereſt to ſpeak freely, for fear, by diſſembling his principles and pretenſions, he ſhould incourage that houſe to attack the duke of Buckingham, who was deemed the original author of all the grievances. His Majeſty therefore wrote to the ſpeaker this ſecond letter.

The King's reply. Ruſhworth, p. 216.

Mr. Speaker,

"THE anſwer of the commons delivered by "you, I like well of, and do take it for a "full and ſatisfactory anſwer, and I thank them "for it; and I hope you will, with all expedition, "take a courſe for performance thereof, the which "will turn to your own good as well as mine; but "for your clauſe therein of preſenting grievances, "I take that but for a parentheſis in your ſpeech, "and not a condition; and yet for anſwer to that "part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear "your grievances as my predeceſſors have been, "ſo that you will apply yourſelves to redreſs grie-"vances, and not to inquire after grievances. I "muſt let you know, that I will not allow any of "my ſervants to be queſtioned among you, much "leſs ſuch as are of eminent place, and near unto "me. The old queſtion was, 'What ſhall be "done to the man whom the King will honor?' "But now it hath been the labor of ſome, to ſeek "what may be done againſt him whom the King "thinks fit to honor. I ſee you ſpecially aim at "the duke of Buckingham; I wonder what hath "ſo altered your affections towards him. I do "well remember, that in the laſt parliament, in "my father's time, when he was the inſtrument "to break the treaties, all of you (and yet I can-"not ſay all, for I know ſome of you are changed, "but yet the houſe of commons is always the ſame) "did ſo much honor and reſpect him, that all the "honor confered on him was too little; and what "he hath done ſince to alter and change your "minds, I wot not; but can aſſure you, he hath "not meddled, or done any thing concerning the "public or commonwealth, but by ſpecial direc-"tions and appointment, and as my ſervant; and "is ſo far from gaining or improving his eſtate "thereby, that I verily think he hath rather im-"paired the fame. I would you would haſten for "my ſupply, or elſe it will be worſe for yourſelves; "for if any ill happen, I think I ſhall be the laſt "ſhall feel it."

CHARLES I An' 1625.

This letter hindered not the commons from proceeding in the examination of Buckingham's conduct, it being reſolved to impeach him in form. The queſtion was moved by a member, named Dr. Turner *, "Whether common fame be a good "ground of proceeding for the houſe?" This queſtion was decided in the affirmative, after conſulting ſome lawyers, whereat his Majeſty was highly offended, and ſhewed his diſpleaſure to the commons, demanding withal, that Turner might be puniſhed for moving ſuch a queſtion. But this meſſage ſignified very little, and the houſe ſtill continuing to proceed againſt Buckingham, it was the members general opinion that, in granting money to his Majeſty, redreſſing the public grievances was not to be neglected.

*A phyſician. Turner's queſtion approved.

The King demands juſtice of Turner.

Mean while, to take from Charles that pretext wherewith all theſe delays might furniſh him, the commons unanimouſly voted him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, to which, a month after, was added a fourth ſubſidy. They moreover fixed payment of the firſt to the laſt day of June †. Nothing is a clearer evidence of the deſign I aſcribed to the commons; viz. that, in granting the King money, they intended their liberality ſhould be repaid with a redreſs of grievances. By this expedient they ſhewed the public, how ready they were to aſſiſt their Sovereign in his neceſſities; but withal reſerved to themſelves the liberty of paſſing this vote into an act (without which it was of no uſe to the King) when they ſhould judge it proper. Now, according to their intention, this act was not to paſs 'till they had ſatisfaction concerning grievances. Thus was Charles deprived of the pretenſe to complain of their delays, tho' indeed what they did for him could not be to his advantage only on ſuppoſition he would regard their deſires. His Majeſty was hereby ſtrangely imbaraſſed. He plainly perceived the commons drift, and was the more offended, as all their proceedings were leveled at Buckingham, or rather at the King himſelf, who had publicly declared that duke had only followed his orders, without being able to prevail for his not being moleſted. As he found they acted with too little reſpect for his royal perſon, he was reſolved to let them know how much he was diſpleaſed with their proceedings, doubtleſs to frighten them into a different courſe. He ſent therefore for both houſes to Whitehall, where he ſpake to them in theſe terms:

My lords and gentlemen,

An' 1626. The King's ſpeech. March 29. Ruſhworth, p. 221.

" I Have called you hither to day, I mean both " houſes of parliament; but it is for ſeveral " and diſtinct reaſons: my lords, you of the upper " houſe, to give you thanks for the care of the " ſtate of the kingdom now; and not only for the " care of your own proceedings, but inticing your " fellow-houſe of the commons to take that into " their conſideration. Therefore (my lords) I " muſt not only give you thanks, but I muſt alſo " avow, that if this parliament do not redound to " the good of this kingdom (which I pray God it " may) it is not your faults. And you, gentlemen " of the houſe of commons, I am ſorry that I may " not juſtly give the ſame thanks to you; but that " I muſt tell you, that I am come here to ſhew " you your errors, and, as I may call it unparlia- " mentary proceedings in this parliament. But I " do not deſpair, becauſe you ſhall ſee your faults " ſo clearly by the lord-keeper, that you may ſo " amend your proceeding, that this parliament " ſhall end comfortably and happily, tho' at the " begining it hath had ſome rubs."

Then the lord-keeper, by the King's command, reſſumed the diſcourſe.

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of the houſe of commons.

The lord-keeper's ſpeech.

" YOU are here aſſembled by his Majeſty's " commandment, to receive a declaration of " his royal pleaſure; which altho' it be intended " only to the houſe of commons, yet his Majeſty " hath thought mete, the matter being of great " weight and importance, it ſhould be delivered " in the preſenſe of both houſes, and both houſes " make one geaeral council: and his Majeſty is " willing, that the lords ſhould be witneſſes of the " honor and juſtice of his reſolutions. And there- " fore the errand which, by his Majeſty's direction, " I muſt deliver hath relation to the houſe of com- " mons. I muſt addreſs my ſelf therefore to you, " Mr. ſpeaker, and the reſt of that houſe.

" And firſt, his Majeſty would have you to un- " derſtand, That there was never any King more " loving to his people, or better affectioned to the " right uſe of parliaments, than his Majeſty hath " approved himſelf to be, not only by his long pa- " tience ſince the ſiting down of this parliament, " but by thoſe mild and calm directions which " from time to time that houſe hath received by " meſſage and letter, and from his royal mouth; " when the irregular humors of ſome particular " perſons wrought diverſions and diſtractions there, " to the diſturbance of thoſe great and weighty af- " fairs, which the neceſſity of the times, the honor " and ſafety of the King and kingdom called upon. " And therefore his Majeſty doth aſſure you, that " when theſe great affairs are ſettled, and that his " Majeſty hath received ſatisfaction of his reaſon- " able demands, he will, as a juſt King, hear and " anſwer your juſt grievances, which in a dutiful " way ſhall be preſented unto him; and this his " Majeſty doth avow.

" Next his Majeſty would have you know of a " ſurety, that as never any King was more loving " to his people, nor better affectioned to the right " uſe of parliaments, ſo never King more jealous " of his honor, nor more ſenſible of the neglect and " contempt of his royal rights, which his Majeſty " will by no means ſuffer to be violated by any " pretended color of parliamentary liberty; where- " in his Majeſty doth not forget, that the parlia- " ment is his council, and therefore ought to have " the liberty of a council; but his Majeſty under- " ſtands the difference between counſeling and con- " troling, between liberty and the abuſe of liberty.

Charles I An' 1626.

" This being ſet down in general, his Majeſty " hath commanded me to relate ſome particular " paſſages and proceedings, whereat he finds him- " ſelf agrieved.

" Firſt, Whereas a ſeditious ſpeech was uttered " among you by Mr. Coke, the houſe did not, " as they ought to do, cenſure and correct him. " And when his Majeſty underſtanding it, did, by " a meſſage by Mr. chancellor of the exchequer, " delivered to the houſe, require juſtice of you, his " Majeſty hath ſince found nothing but protract- " ing and delays. This his Majeſty holds not a- " greeable to the wiſdom and the duty which he " expected from the houſe of commons.

" Secondly, Whereas doctor Turner, in a ſtrange " unparliamentary way, without any ground of " knowledge in himſelf, or offering any particular " proof of the houſe, did take upon him to adviſe " the houſe to inquire upon ſundry articles againſt " the duke of Buckingham, as he pretended, but " in truth to wound the honor and government of " his Majeſty, and of his renowned father; and " his Majeſty, firſt by a meſſage, and after by his " own royal mouth, did declare, That ſuch courſe " of inquiry was an example which by no way he " could ſuffer, tho' it were againſt his meaneſt ſer- " vant, much leſs againſt one ſo near him; and " that his Majeſty did much wonder at the fooliſh " inſolency of any man who can think, that his " Majeſty ſhould be drawn out of any end to offer " ſuch a ſacrifice, ſo unworthy of a King, or a " good maſter; yet for all this, you have been ſo " far from correcting the inſolency of Turner, that " ever ſince that time your commitees have walked " in the ſteps of Turner, and proceeded in an un- " parliamentary inquiſition, runing upon generals, " and repeating that whereof you have made fame " the ground-work. Here his Majeſty hath cauſe " to be exceeding ſenſible, that upon every parti- " cular he finds the honor of his father ſtained and " blemiſhed, and his own no leſs; and withal you " have manifeſted a great forwardneſs, rather to " pluck out of his boſom thoſe who are near about " him, and whom his Majeſty hath cauſe to affect, " than to truſt his Majeſty with the future reforma- " tion of thoſe things which you ſeem to aim at: " and yet you cannot deny but his Majeſty hath " wrought a greater reformation in matters of re- " ligion, execution of the laws, and concerning " things of great importance, than the ſhortneſs of " his reign (in which he hath been hindered, partly " thro' ſickneſs and the diſtraction of things, which " we could have wiſhed had been otherwiſe) could " produce.

" Concerning the duke of Buckingham, his Ma- " jeſty hath commanded me to tell you, That " himſelf doth better know than any man living, " the ſincerity of the duke's proceedings; with what " cautions of weight and diſcretion he hath been " guided in his public imployments from his Ma- " jeſty and his bleſſed father; what enemies he hath " procured at home and abroad; what peril of his " perſon, and hazard of his eſtate, he ran into, " for the ſervice of his Majeſty, and his ever- " bleſſed father; and how forward he hath been in " the ſervice of this houſe, many times ſince his " return from Spain. And therefore his Majeſty " cannot believe, that the aim is at the duke of " Buckingham, but findeth that theſe proceedings " do greatly wound the honor of himſelf, and of " his father. It is therefore his Majeſty's expreſs " and final commandment, that you yield obedi- " ence unto thoſe directions which you have for- " merly received, and ceaſe this unparliamentary in- " quiſition, and commit unto his Majeſty's care,

CHARLES I An° 1626.

" and wiſdom, and juſtice the future reformation of
" theſe things which you ſuppoſe to be otherwiſe
" than they ſhould be: and his Majeſty is reſolved
" that, before the end of this ſeſſion, he will ſet
" ſuch a courſe, both for the amending any thing
" that may be found amiſs, and for the ſettling of " his own eſtate, as he doubteth not but will give " you ample ſatisfaction and comfort.

" Next to this, his Majeſty takes notice that you
" have ſuffered the greateſt council of ſtate to be " cenſured and traduced in the houſe, by men whoſe
" years and education cannot attain to that depth:
" that foreign buſineſſes have been entertained in
" the houſe, to the hinderance and diſadvantage of " his Majeſty's negociations: that the ſame year,
" yea, the firſt day of his Majeſty's inauguration,
" you ſuffered his council, government and ſer-
" vants to be paralleled with the times of moſt ex" ception: that your commitees have preſumed to " examine the letters of ſecretaries of ſtate, nay, his " own; and ſent a general warrant to his ſignet-
" office, and commanded his officers, not only to " produce and ſhew the records, but their books
" and private notes, which they made for his Ma-
" jeſty's ſervice. This his Majeſty holds as unſuf-
" ferable, and it was in former times unuſual.

" Next I am to ſpeak concerning your ſupply of " three ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, which you
" have agreed to tender to his Majeſty. You have " been made acquainted with the greatneſs of his " affairs, both at home and abroad, with the " ſtrong preparation of the enemy; with the im" portance of upholding his allies; ſtrengthening
" and ſecuring both England and Ireland; beſide
" the incountering and annoying the enemy by a " powerful fleet at ſea, and the charge of all this
" having been calculated unto you, you have pro-
" feſſed unto his Majeſty, by the mouth of your
" ſpeaker, your carefulneſs to ſupport the cauſe
" wherein his Majeſty and his allies are juſtly in-
" gaged; your unanimous conſent, and real inten" tion to ſupply his Majeſty in ſuch a meaſure as
" ſhould make him ſafe at home, and feared
" abroad; and that in the diſpatch hereof, you will " uſe ſuch diligence as his Majeſty's preſſing and
" preſent occaſions did require.

" And now his Majeſty having erected a pro" ceeding ſutable to this ingagement, he doth
" obſerve that, in two days, only of twelve, this " buſineſs was thought of, and not begun 'till his
" Majeſty by a meſſage put you in mind of it,
" while your inquiſition againſt his Majeſty's di" rection proceeded day by day.

" And for the meaſure of this ſupply, his Ma-
" jeſty findeth it ſo far from making himſelf ſafe
" at home, and feared abroad; as contrariwiſe it
" expoſeth him both to danger and diſeſteem, for " his Majeſty cannot expect, without better help,
" but that his allies muſt preſently diſband, and
" leave him alone to bear the fury of a provoked
" and powerful enemy; ſo as both he and you ſhall
" be unſafe at home, and aſhamed and deſpiſed
" abroad. And for the manner of the ſupply, it " is in itſelf very diſhonorable and full of diſtruſt;
" for altho' you have avoided the literal word of a " condition, wherein his Majeſty himſelf did warn
" you, when he told you of your parentheſis; yet
" you have put to it the effect of a condition, ſince
" the bill is not come into your houſe 'till your " grievances be both prefered and anſwered. No
" ſuch thing was in that expreſſion and ingagement
" delivered by your ſpeaker, for which his Ma-
" jeſty holdeth, that you have receded both in mat" ter and manner, to his great diſadvantage and " diſhonor. And therefore his Majeſty comman-
" deth, that you go together and, by Saturday next,
" return your final anſwer, what farther ſupply you
" will add to this you have already agreed on, and " that to be without condition, either directly or " indirectly, for the ſupply of theſe great and im" portant affairs of his Majeſty; which, for the rea-
" ſons formerly made known unto you, can indure
" no longer delay; and if you ſhall not, by that " time, reſolve on a more ample ſupply, his Ma-
" jeſty cannot expect a ſupply this way, nor pro-
" miſe you to ſit longer together; otherwiſe, if " you do it, his Majeſty is well content that you
" ſhould ſit ſo long as the ſeaſon of the year will " permit; and doth aſſure you, that the preſent
" addition to your ſupply, to ſet forward the " work, ſhall be no hinderance to your ſpeedy ac-
" ceſs again.

CHARLES I An° 1626.

" His Majeſty hath commanded me to add this,
" that therein he doth expect your chearful obe" dience, which will put a happy iſſue to this meet" ing, and will inable his Majeſty not only to a
" defenſive war, but to imploy his ſubjects in fo" reign actions, whereby will be added to them
" both experience, ſafety and honor.

" Laſt of all, his Majeſty hath commanded me,
" in explanation of the gracious goodneſs of his " royal intention, to ſay unto you, that he doth
" well know, that there are among you many wiſe
" and well-tempered men, well affected to the pub" lic, and to his Majeſty's ſervice; and that thoſe
" who are willingly faulty are not many: and for
" the reſt his Majeſty doubteth not but, after his " gracious admonition, they will, in due time, ob-
" ſerve and follow the better ſort; which if they " ſhall do, his Majeſty is moſt ready to forget what-
" ſoever is paſſed.

This harangue ended, his Majeſty ſaid:

" I muſt withal put you in mind a little of times
" paſſed. You may remember, that in the time
" of my bleſſed father, you did with your coun-
" ſel and perſuaſion perſuade both my father and
" me to break off the treaties: I confeſs I was " your inſtrument, for two reaſons; one was, the " fitneſs of the time; the other was, becauſe I was
" ſeconded by ſo great and worthy a body as the " whole body of parliament: then there was no
" body in ſo great favor with you as this man,
" whom you ſeem now to touch; but indeed my " father's government and mine. Now that you " have all things according to your wiſhes, and " that I am ſo far ingaged, that you think there " is no retreat; now you begin to ſet the dice, and " make your own game: but I pray you be not " deceived, it is not a parliamentary way, nor is it
" a way to deal with a King.

" Mr. Coke told you, 'It was better to be " eaten up by a foreign enemy, than to be de-
" ſtroyed at home. Indeed I think it more honor
" for a King to be invaded, and almoſt deſtroyed
" by a foreign enemy, than to be deſpiſed by his " own ſubjects.

" Remember, that parliaments are altogether
" in my power for their calling, ſiting, and diſſo-
" lution; therefore as I find the fruits of them
" good or evil, they are to continue, or not to be:
" and remember, that if in this time, inſtead of " amending your errors, by delay you perſiſt in " your errors, you make them greater and irre-
" concilable: whereas, on the other ſide, if you
" do go on chearfully to mend them, and look to
" the diſtreſſed ſtate of Chriſtendom, and the af" fairs of the kingdom, as it lieth now by this " great ingagement; you will do your ſelves honor,
" you ſhall incourage me to go on with parliaments,
" and, I hope, all Chriſtendom ſhall feel the good
" of it."

The King's and keeper's ſpeeches were ſo plain, that they could not be miſunderſtood. His Majeſty's aim in general was to intimate to the parliament,

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

ment, they were only his council, whoſe advice he might follow or reject, and he could either not aſſemble this council, or govern without it. The commons inſtantly turned the houſe into a grand commitee, ordering the doors to be locked, and no member to depart 'till the houſe came to a reſolution concerning theſe ſpeeches. Charles, having thereof notice, and perceiving this could not but retard his affairs, ordered a conference between the two houſes, and commanded the duke of Buckingham to explain his intentions, and give his words a ſenſe ſomewhat leſs offenſive than what they obviouſly bore. Here follows what was ſaid by the duke on that ſubject.

Ruſhworth, p. 225. Annals, p. 118.

Buckingham's ſpeech, wherein he explains the King's. Ruſhworth, p. 225.

" WHereas it is objected by ſome, who wiſh
" good correſpondency betwixt the King
" and people, that to prefix a day to give or to " break was an unuſal thing, and might expreſs an " inclination in the King to break: to remove this,
" as his Majeſty was free from ſuch thoughts, he " hath deſcended to make this explanation.

" That as his Majeſty would not have you con" dition with him, directly or indirectly, ſo he " will not lie to a day for giving farther ſupply;
" but it was the preſſing occaſion of Chriſtendom
" which made him to pitch upon a day.

" His Majeſty hath here a ſervant of the King
" of Denmark, and another from the duke of " Weymer, and yeſterday received a letter from " his ſiſter the Queen of Bohemia; who ſignified,
" that the King of Denmark hath ſent an em-
" baſſador, with power to perfect the contract
" which was made at the Hague; ſo it was not
" the King, but time, and the things themſelves
" which preſſed a time.

" Therefore his Majeſty is pleaſed to give longer " time, hoping you will not give him cauſe to put " you in mind of it again; ſo that you have a " greater latitude, if the buſineſs require, to think
" of it.

" I am commanded farther to tell you, that if " his Majeſty ſhould accept of a leſs ſum than " will ſuffice, it will deceive your expectations,
" diſappoint his allies, and conſume the treaſure of " the kingdom: whereas, if you give largely now,
" the buſineſs being at the criſis, it comes ſo
" ſeaſonably, it may give a turn to the affairs of " Chriſtendom.

" But while we delay and ſuffer the time to paſs,
" others abroad will take advantage of it, as the " King of Spain hath done, by concluding a peace,
" as it is thought, in Italy, for the Valtoline,
" whereby our work is become the greater, be-
" cauſe there can be no diverſion that way.

" As it was a good rule to fear all things and " nothing, and to be liberal was ſometimes to be " thrifty; ſo in this particular, if you give largely,
" you ſhall carry the war to the enemy's door,
" and keep that peace at home which hath been:
" whereas, on the contrary, if you draw the war
" at home, it brings with it nothing but diſturbance
" and fear, all courſes of juſtice ſtoped, and each " man's revenue leſſened, and nothing which can " be profitable.

" Another explanation I am commanded to make,
" touching the grievances; wherein his Majeſty
" means no way to interrupt your proceedings,
" but hopes you will proceed in the ancient way of " your predeceſſors; and not ſo much ſeek faults,
" as the means to redreſs them.

" I am farther commanded to tell you, that his " Majeſty intends to elect a commitee of both
" houſes, whom he will truſt to take the view of " his eſtate, the defects of which are not fit for
" the eyes of a multitude; and this commitee will " be for your eaſe, and may ſatisfy you, without " caſting any ill odour on his government, or laying
" open any weakneſſes which may bring ſhame
" upon us abroad. That which is propoſed is ſo " little, that when the payment comes, it will " bring him to a worſe eſtate than now he is in;
" therefore wiſhes you to inlarge it, but leaves the " augmentation to your ſelves; but is ſorry, and " touched in conſcience, that the burden ſhould
" lie on the pooreſt, who want too much already;
" yet he will not preſcribe, but wiſh that you,
" who were the abettors and counſellors of this " war, would take a greater part of the burden to " your ſelves; and any man who can find out that " way, ſhall ſhew himſelf beſt affected, and do
" the beſt ſervice to the King and ſtate."

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

The duke having thus harangued for his Majeſty, addreſſed the houſes in his own behalf, taking this occaſion to vindicate his conduct, or rather to extol the ſervices he had done the ſtate. Lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, ſpake next, and among other matters pretended to ſhew, that the three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, granted his late Majeſty, had been imployed according to the parliament's intention, becauſe nothing was diſburſed but by the King's expreſs orders; a reaſon which to the commons muſt needs have appeared frivolous (1).

Ruſhworth, p. 227. p. 231.

This explication of his Majeſty's intentions ſeemed ſomewhat to pacify the commons. How highly ſoever they were diſguſted at what the King ſaid concerning parliaments, they thought not proper to cenſure it; whether they dreaded entering on ſo dangerous a diſcuſſion, or expected the lords would take in hand the buſineſs, themſelves being equally intereſted. The commons therefore were ſatisfied with preſenting to the King a remonſtrance, to juſtify their proceedings. This remonſtrance was preceded by an addreſs on the ſame ſubject: but as the addreſs was only abſtracted from the remonſtrance they were preparing, I ſhall paſs it over in ſilence, and inſert only the remonſtrance, which ran thus: viz.

Annals, p. 120.

Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

The commons remonſtrance to his Majeſty. Ruſhworth, p. 243.

" WHereas your Majeſty hath been pleaſed of " late, at ſundry times and by ſeveral
" means, to impart unto us your royal pleaſure,
" touching ſome paſſages and proceedings in this
" preſent parliament: we do firſt, with unſpeak-
" able joy and comfort, acknowledge your Ma-
" jeſty's grace and favor, in that it hath pleaſed
" you to cauſe it to be delivered unto us by the " lord-keeper of your great ſeal, in your own
" royal preſenſe, and before both houſes of par" liament, that never King was more loving to his " people, nor better affected to the right uſe of " parliaments; withal, profeſſing your moſt gra-
" cious reſolution, to hear and redreſs our juſt
" grievances. And with like comfort we acknow" ledge your Majeſty's goodneſs ſhining at the " very entrance of your glorious reign, in com" manding due execution of the laws eſtabliſhed to " preſerve the true religion of Almighty God, in
" whoſe ſervice conſiſteth the happineſs of all
" Kings and kingdoms.

" Yet let it not diſpleaſe your Majeſty, that we
" alſo expreſs ſome ſenſe of juſt grief, intermixed
" with that great joy, to ſee the careful proceedings
" of our ſincere intentions ſo miſrepreſented, as to " have wrought effects unexpected and, we hope,
" undeſerved.

(1) He ſhewed, that there had been paid, for the four regiments in the Netherlands; for the navy; for the ordnance and forts in England and Ireland; and for the ſervice under count Mansfeldt; in all, 278,497 l. Ruſhworth, Vol I. p. 232.

" Firſt;

CHARLES I An' 1626.

See Whitelock, p. 4.

" First; touching the charge againſt us in the " matter concerning Mr. Coke. We all ſincerely " proteſt, that neither the words mentioned in " your Majeſty's meſſage, nor any other of ſedi- " tious effect were ſpoken by him, as hath been " reſolved by the houſe, without one negative voice.

" Howſoever, in a ſpeech occaſionally uttered, " he let fall ſome few words which might admit " ill conſtruction; whereat the houſe being diſ " pleaſed at the delivery of them, as was expreſſed " by a general and inſtant check, he forthwith ſo " explained himſelf and his intention, that, for the " preſent, we did forbear to take them into con- " ſideration, which ſince we have done: and the " effect thereof had before this appeared, if by " importunate buſineſs of your Majeſty's ſervice " we had not been interrupted.

" The like interruption did alſo befal us in the " caſe of Dr. Turner; wherein the queſtion being " formerly ſtated, a reſolution was ordered to have " been taken that very day on which we received " your Majeſty's command to attend you.

" But for our own proceedings, we humbly be- " ſeech your Majeſty to be truly informed, that " before the overture from Dr. Turner (out of our " great and neceſſary care for your honor, and " welfare of your realm) we had taken into ſerious " conſideration the evils which now afflict your " people, and the cauſes of them, that we might " apply our ſelves unto the fiteſt remedies: in the " purſuit whereof, our commitees (whatſoever they " might have done) have in no particular proceeded " otherwiſe, than either upon ground of knowledge " in themſelves, or proof by examination of " witneſſes, or other evidence. In which courſe of " ſervice for the public good, as we have not " ſwerved from the parliamentary ways of our " predeceſſors, ſo we conceive that the diſcovery, " and reforming of errors, is ſo far from laying " any aſperſion upon the preſent time and govern- " ment, that it is rather a great honor and happineſs " to both, yielding matter to great Princes where- " in to exerciſe and illuſtrate their nobleſt virtues.

" And altho' the grievous complaints of the " merchants from all parts, together with the " common ſervice of the ſubjects well affected to " thoſe who profeſs our religion, gave us occaſion " to debate ſome buſineſſes which were partly " foreign, and had relation to affairs of ſtate; " yet we beſeech your Majeſty to reſt aſſured, it " was exceeding far from our intention, either to " traduce your counſellors, or diſadvantage your " negociations. And tho' ſome examples of great " and potent miniſters of Princes, heretofore " queſtioned in parliament, have been alledged, " yet was it without paralleling your Majeſty's " government or councils, to any times at all, " much leſs to times of exception.

" Touching the letter of your Majeſty's ſecre- " tary, it was firſt alledged by your advocate for " his own juſtification, and after, by direction of " the commitee, produced to make good his alle- " gation.

" And for the ſearch at the ſignet-office, the " copy of a letter being divulged, as in your " Majeſty's name, with pregnant cauſe of ſuſpicion, " both in the body and direction thereof, to be " ſuppoſititious, the commitee, out of deſire to " be cleared therein, did by their order ſend ſome " of themſelves to the ſignet-office, to ſearch " whether there were any records of letters of that " nature, without warrant to the officer for any, " much leſs for a general, ſearch.

" But touching public records, we have not " forborne, as often as our buſineſſes have required, " to make ſearch into them, wherein we have done " nothing unwarranted by the laws of your realm, " and the conſtant uſage of parliaments. And if, " for the eaſe of their labors, any of our com- " mitees have deſired the help of the officers, re- " pertories, or breviats of direction, we conceive " it is no more than any ſubject in his own affairs " might have obtained for ordinary fees,

CHARLES I An' 1626.

" Now concerning your Majeſty's ſervants, and " namely the duke of Buckingham, we humbly " beſeech your Majeſty to be informed by us your " faithful commons, who can have no private end " but your Majeſty's ſervice, and the good of " your country, that it hath been the ancient, " conſtant, and undoubted right and uſage of " parliaments, to queſtion and complain of all " perſons, of what degree ſoever, found grievous to " the common-wealth, in abuſing the power and " truſt commited to them by their Sovereign. A " courſe approved not only by the examples in " your father's days, of famous memory, but by " frequent precedents in the beſt and moſt glorious " reigns of your noble progenitors, appearing both " in records and hiſtories; without which liberty " in parliament, no private man, no ſervant to a " King, perhaps no counſellor, without expoſing " himſelf to the hazard of great enmity and pre- " judice, can be a means to call great officers into " queſtion for their miſdemeanors, but the com- " mon-wealth might languiſh under their preſſures " without redreſs: and whatſoever we ſhall do ac- " cordingly in this parliament, we doubt not but it " ſhall redound to the honor of the crown, and " welfare of your ſubjects.

The commons intention in this remonſtrance.

By this remonſtrance it is evident that, the commons deemed not Coke's offenſe as a crime meriting ſo rigorous a chaſtiſement as King Charles conceived, eſpecially as his ſaid Majeſty had been miſinformed. Moreover, in ſhewing reſentment againſt Coke, they were apprehenſive of diſcouraging their members, and hindering them from freely ſpeaking their minds, beſide that they ſhould thereby authoriſe the King to make complaints on like pretexts. But, on the other hand, if they declared Coke wholly blameleſs, blameleſs, they feared ingaging in a diſcuſſion they were willing to avoid. As for Turner, they could not condemn him, ſince the houſe had approved his motion. So, they only evaded the King's demand, for fear of offending him by a refuſal, preſuming his Majeſty would readily comprehend their meaning. But with regard to the duke of Buckingham, the caſe was different. King Charles having eſtabliſhed for a principle, that the lower houſe had not power to accuſe any of his ſervants without his permiſſion, they could not ſpeak too plainly, by reaſon of the importance of this Prince's pretenſions, which tended to deſpoil the commons of one of their greateſt privileges. As to ſupplies of money, it is ſufficiently obvious that the commons deſigned not their Sovereign ſhould have it in his power to preſcribe them terms, but were reſolved to preſerve the right of granting what they judged requiſite, and when they thought proper: and in reality, it is of ſo great conſequence to the commons not to loſe this right, that ſhould they ſuffer thereon the leaſt incroachment, they would aſſuredly become a mere empty name without authority.

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

The parliament adjourned. Ruſhworth, p. 246.

Charles, having received this remonſtrance, thought not proper to anſwer it, or at leaſt required time to have it examined. Mean while, he required the commons to adjourn for a week, as the lords had done; and they obeyed.

Charles conſents to the proſecution of his favorite.

Great was his Majeſty's imbaraſs. He wanted money, and the commons had voted him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, to which they had lately added a fourth ſubſidy: but it was plainly manifeſt that they deſigned not to paſs the bill 'till Buckingham's affair was finiſhed: wherefore Charles, not being able to divert the charge againſt the duke, without at the ſame time ſtoping the ſubſidy-bill, finally conſented that the houſe ſhould proceed in ſcrutiniſing his favorite's conduct; tho' with intention to ſtop it, if the matter was too far puſhed (1).

The commons acquaint Buckingham with their deſign.

A few days after, the commons notified to his grace of Buckingham, that they were paſſing articles of accuſation againſt him, of which he might be informed by the clerk's book; * and that they expected his anſwer, if he pleaſed to ſend any (2).

* And take thereof a copy.

Who is not ſuffered to anſwer. Ruſhworth, p. 247. Annals. p. 122.

Hereupon Buckingham applied to the upper houſe for leave to anſwer: but their lordſhips judged it not convenient to permit him, under color that he would thereby give the commons occaſion to defer the ſubſidy-bill, which they were inſtantly to take into conſideration. But the commons, without regarding this reaſon alledged by their lordſhips, which was ſignified to them by Buckingham, continued their proceedings: nay, they even determined on annexing to the charge a particular article concerning the plaſter and potion applied and given by the duke to King James in his ſickneſs, without advice of the phyſicians. Charles, hearing this, ſent a meſſage to the commons, "That he having conſented "to their proceedings againſt the duke of Buck- "ingham, and hearing there is new matter intend- "ed to be brought againſt him, nevertheleſs "leaves the houſe to their own way to preſent the "buſineſs to him, or to the lords, withal adviſing "them to conſider of the ſeaſon of the year. and "to avoid all loſs of time." He would ſeemingly have been well pleaſed, as he was principally concerned in the article relating to the King his father's death, the commons would have left it to his determination: but they feigned not to underſtand him, and only thanked him for his meſſage.

Articles annexed to the charge againſt Buckingham. Ruſhworth, p. 249.

Charles in vain attempts to evade the commons deſign.

Some interruption was given to the duke of Buckingham's accuſation, and conſequently to the ſubſidy-bill, by a new affair which unexpectedly aroſe, and which it will be neceſſary briefly to touch on, tho' I ſhall not here deſcend to particulars. The earl of Briſtol, who had been embaſſador in Spain for the marriage affair, which he had finally brought near a concluſion, according to King James's deſire, had however the misfortune to diſpleaſe the Prince and duke. As their aim was to prevent that earl's giving the parliament a direct account of what paſſed in Spain, they ſo managed that, at his return, he was confined to his houſe, and afterwards ſent to the Tower. King James was fully ſatisfied of the earl's innocence, but was, during the two laſt years of his life, ſo little maſter of his actions, that he dared not openly protect him: ſo, by the Prince and duke, he was conſtrained on diverſe pretenſes, to keep him in priſon that he might not ſpeak with him. After King James's deceaſe, the earl's caſe became ſo much the worſe, as the new King and favorite, his profeſſed enemies, were no longer obliged to uſe any ceremony. He remained therefore in priſon 'till this ſecond parliament, that is, about two years, without being brought to a trial, or even any charge entered againſt him. At length, knowing how the commons ſtood affected towards Buckingham, he reſolved to imbrace this opportunity, and attempt recovering his liberty. He likewiſe wiſhed to be in a condition to juſtify his conduct, which the duke had aſperſed, in order to caſt on him the whole blame of what had paſſed in the negociation of Prince Charles's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta. He preſented therefore a petition to the houſe of lords, ſhewing that, being peer of the realm, he had received no ſummons to the parliament, deſiring them to intercede for him, that he might injoy his privilege. Whereupon the lords prayed his Majeſty, to ſend a writ of ſummons as well to the earl of Briſtol as to ſome other peers, whoſe writs were alſo retained; which the King granted. A ſummons was therefore ſent to the earl, but withal, he received a letter from the lord keeper, acquainting him, that his Majeſty would have him forbear his perſonal attendance. Upon this, the earl ſent their lordſhips a ſecond petition, together with the keeper's letter, telling them, it was done thro' the credit of Buckingham, whoſe aim was to prevent him from diſcovering his crimes. Moreover, he beſought the lords to permit him to bring an accuſation againſt his ſaid adverſary, wherein he would demonſtrate how much this duke had abuſed their late and preſent Majeſties, the ſtate and parliament. Charles was ſo highly inſenſed at the earl of Briſtol's boldneſs, that he ſent a meſſage to the lords, declaring, he was determined to exhibit before them a charge of high-treaſon againſt the earl of Briſtol. After this declaration, the lords could not avoid puting the earl into the cuſtody of the black-rod. Some days after, the earl being brought to their lordſhips bar, the attorney-general read the charge againſt him in name of his Majeſty, who had corrected it in ſeveral places with his own hand: nevertheleſs, the lords received alſo the accuſation entered by the earl of Briſtol againſt the duke of Buckingham, and lord Conway ſecretary, of ſtate. His Majeſty's charge againſt the earl was divided into three heads; viz. his offenſes before the Prince's going to Spain; during the Prince's being in Spain; and after the Prince's return. But his lordſhip made ſuch anſwers to all the articles as covered his accuſers with confuſion. He evidently manifeſted how much the duke of Buckingham had deceived the parliament in his narrative of what was tranſacted in Spain. This reflected on the King himſelf, who had not only atteſted the relation, but perſiſted ſtill to atteſt it for truth: wherefore he thought not proper to proſecute a ſentence againſt the earl. As the charge againſt the earl of Briſtol, his defenſe and his accuſation againſt the duke of Buckingham and lord Conway, relate rather to the reign of King James, than to that of King Charles, I think it unneceſſary here to inſiſt any farther on this affair, which would lead me too far. However, as this is a curious point; as the earl's defenſe contains a very exact account of what paſſed in Spain while the projected marriage was negociating; and as the characters of James I, Charles I, and the duke of Buckingham may be there clearly ſeen, I ſhall, towards the cloſe of this book, inſert ſeveral papers upon this ſubject, which to me ſeem worthy the public's curioſity.

The commons charge againſt Buckingham. May 8. Ruſhworth, p. 202. Annals, p. 150, &c.

Some days after the earl of Briſtol had given his anſwer, and preſented his charge againſt Buckingham and lord Conway, the commons brought up to the lords their declaration and impeachment againſt the duke of Buckingham. It contained thirteen articles, which were explained and agravated by the managers appointed by the commons. It is uſual on ſuch occaſions for the commons to divide the taſk among ſeveral of their members, each of whom prepares to ſpeak to the article aſſigned him (1). Sir Dudley Diggs, who was appointed to explain and ſupport the begining of the charge, read the following preamble:

Their declaration and impeachment againſt the duke of Buckingham. May 8. Ruſhworth, p. 302.

"For the ſpeedy redreſs of great evils and miſ-
"chiefs, and of the chief cauſe of theſe evils and
"miſchiefs which this kingdom of England now
"grievouſly ſuffereth, and of late years hath ſuffer-
"ed, and to the honor and ſafety of our Sovereign

"and to the good and welfare of his people, the "commons in this preſent parliament, by the au"thority of our ſaid ſovereign lord the King, aſ-
"ſembled, do, by their bill, ſhew and declare a-
"gainſt George, duke, marquis and earl of Buck-
"ingham, earl of Coventry, viſcount Villers, ba"ron of Whaddon, great admiral of his kingdoms
"of England and Ireland, and of the principality
"of Wales, and of the dominions and iſlands of "the ſame; of the town of Calais, and of the "marches of the ſame; and of Normandy, Gaſ-
"coigne and Guienne; general-governor of the "ſeas and ſhips of the ſaid kingdom; lieutenant-
"general-admiral, captain-general and governor
"of his Majeſty's royal fleet and army lately
"ſet forth; maſter of the horſe of our ſovereign
"lord the King; lord warden, chancellor, and "admiral of the Cinque-ports, and of the members
"thereof; conſtable of Dover caſtle; juſtice in
"Eyre of the foreſts and chaces on this ſide the "river Trent; conſtable of the caſtle of Windſor;
"gentleman of his Majeſty's bed-chamber; one of "his Majeſty's moſt honorable privy-council in "his realms, both in England, Scotland and Ire"land, and knight of the moſt honorable order of "the garter: the miſdemeanors, miſpriſions, of"fenſes, crimes, and other matters, compriſed in
"the articles following; and him the ſaid duke do
"accuſe and impeach of the ſaid miſdemeanors,
"miſpriſions, offenſes and crimes."

This preamble being read, Diggs gave a general knowledge of the impeachment, without inſiſting on any particular article: he only reduced the charge to four principal heads. In the firſt, he ſhewed the grievances which ſprung from ſo many offices confered on a ſingle perſon, and pretended it was one of the chief cauſes of the evils which afflicted England, as decay of trade, loſſes at ſea, and that contempt into which the nation was fallen. In the ſecond, he ſpoke in general of honors being ſold or procured by the duke for undeſerving perſons. In the third, he ſaid, as the duke had raiſed all his poor kindred to honors, ſo he had exhauſted and miſ-imployed his Majeſty's lands and revenues. In the fourth, he ſpake of the remedies applied and given to the late King in his laſt ſickneſs; but thoſe he only juſt mentioned, becauſe that article was to be expatiated on by another manager.

Charles I An' 1626.

Sir Dudley Diggs explains and agravates the preamble.

As this charge was never decided, I think it needleſs to relate particulars, or give account of what was ſaid by each of the managers on the ſeveral articles. But that the reader may ſee in general what the duke was charged with, I ſhall inſert the ſubſtance of each article.

Theſe articles were expatiated on by the ſeveral managers, and ſir John Elliot was appointed to make the epilogue to the impeachment, wherein he ſummed up what had been ſaid againſt the duke, and ſpake of him in very offenſive terms, but however mentioned not the plaſter or potion.

house of lords, and made them the following speech.

My Lords,

Charles's speech to the house of lords. May 11. Rushworth, p. 357.

"THE cause and only cause of my coming to you this day, is to express the sense I have of all your honors; for he who toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great measure. I have thought fit to take order for the punishing some insolent speeches lately spoken. I have been too remiss heretofore in punishing such speeches as concern myself; not that I was greedy of their monies, but that Buckingham, thro' his importunity, would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his trial. And to approve his innocency touching the matters against him, I myself can be a witness to clear him in every one of them.

"I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent speeches against myself. And now I hope you will be as tender of my honor, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours.

The intent of this speech.

King Charles's aim in this speech was; First, to persuade the lords, they were all interested in the disrespectful expressions used by the managers against the duke of Buckingham and some others of their house, and that he had commited those two members to the Tower purposely to vindicate their injured honor: but he succeeded not in his design. Secondly, by offering to be a witness for Buckingham, and to clear his innocence in every article of his impeachment, he proposed to the lords a kind of dilemma, whence he imagined they could not extricate themselves; for they were either to declare the duke innocent upon his Majesty's evidence, or, by condemning him, openly reject his testimony, whereto he presumed they would not easily be persuaded: but their lordships, as will hereafter appear, were not to be duped by this artifice.

The commons require Buckingham may be commited.

Charles had no sooner departed the house, but the commons sent their lordships a message, requesting that Buckingham might be taken into safe custody: but the lords durst not commit him for fear of offending his Majesty.

They are very clamorous about the imprisonment of their members. Rushworth, p. 358. Annals, p. 179.

Mean while, the imprisonment of Diggs and Elliot made a terrible impression in the house of commons, who considered it as a gross violation of their privileges. One of the court party *, observing the unusual, and as he termed it, sullen silence of the house, stood up and justified the King saying, "His Majesty conceived that Diggs went "beyond his commission when, speaking of the "plaster and potion given to King James, he "said, 'That he did forbear to speak farther, "thro' regard to the King's honor.' And as for "sir John Elliot, he affected to speak of the duke "with great contempt, and in very injurious terms. "What most displeased the King was, that Elliot, "in speaking of the plaster and potion, used ex"pressions, intimating 'as if there was something "hidden, which it was not proper to reveal,' and, "in so doing, exceeded the commission he had "received from the house."

* Sir Dudley Carleton.

But, unluckily enough, what these two members were charged with contained not a syllable of truth, except the little respect they had shewn for the duke of Buckingham; for Elliot had not mentioned plaster or potion, and Diggs had said nothing like what he was accused of: wherefore, the house of commons taking advantage of these false charges, ordered, that all the members there present should sign the subsequent protestation.

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

Protestation of the commons. Rushworth, p. 360.

"I protest, before Almighty God and this "house of parliament, that I never gave consent, "that sir Dudley Diggs should speak these words "he is now charged withal, or any words to that "effect; and I have not affirmed to any that he "did speak such words, or any to that effect."

p. 361. Annals, p. 180.

Beside this, thirty-six lords, who were present at the conference whereat the duke's impeachment was presented, attested under their hands, that they did not hear sir Dudley Diggs utter any such words. It followed therefore from their lordships testimony and the commons protestation, either that his Majesty had been falsely and maliciously informed, or that the charge against Diggs was forged, purely to have opportunity of punishing him for speaking of the duke so disrespectfully.

Declaration of the same house. Rushworth, p. 363.

Elliot's crime was of a like nature; that is, he had spoken discourteously of the duke, tho' he was wrongfully accused of mentioning the plaster in terms injurious to his Majesty. But the commons took care to clear their two members, by publicly declaring, that neither had exceeded his commission. All this redounded not much to the honor of King Charles, who, seeing no way to support what he had done, caused the two imprisoned members to be released. In all appearance, his aim was to intimidate the commons; but he was disappointed.

The two prisoners released.

The lords demand the earl of Arundel's liberty. Ibid. Annals.

Charles's recent condescension towards the lower house drew on him a like affair from the peers. He had sent to the Tower the earl of Arundel for much the same crime as that of Diggs and Elliot; and their lordships had suffered it without complaining: but when they saw the commons had obtained the release of their members, by insisting upon their privileges, they thought proper to lay hold on this occasion to assert also their own rights. They presented therefore to his Majesty a petition, praying him to release the earl of Arundel, according to the tenor of their privileges. Charles perceived how prejudicial to him this petition was, the lords pretending, by means of their privileges, to limit the prerogative royal: for which reason he long resisted before he granted their lordships request. There were several remonstrances from the lords to his Majesty, and several messages from him to their lordships: nay, the peers went so far as to declare it to be expressly a breach of their privileges to imprison any of their members, the parliament siting, without sentence or order of their house (1), and to resolve on not taking into consideration any other business 'till they had satisfaction. Charles was at length, tho' much against his will, obliged to release the prisoner. As, by the custom of England, members of parliament are not privileged from arrests in cases of treason and felony, his Majesty pretended the house of lords ought not to take exception at his having commited one of their members. His reason was, because the prisoner might possibly be guilty of felony or treason, and consequently the house ought to wait 'till his Majesty should please to declare the cause of his imprisonment: but as, under color of this possibility, Charles had sent the earl of Arundel to the Tower, and had not yet declared the cause, their lordships readily comprehended the possibility alledged was only a mere artifice to elude their least disputable immunities. So, the King on one side urged that, as the unseasonable discovery of a treason might happen to be highly detrimental to the state, he could not allow to this pretended privilege of parliament-members all the extent their lordſhips required, becauſe there were caſes wherein, for the ſtate's benefit, there was abſolute neceſſity for its being limited. But the lords replied, if, on pretenſe of ſuch caſes, which were very rare, the King could impriſon a peer without conſent of the houſe and declaration of the cauſe, it would follow that, in all ſorts of caſes, he might detain a peer in cuſtody during his pleaſure, and thereby deprive the lords of their privileges. If it be aſked; Why this diſpute was never raiſed in former reigns? This queſtion is eaſily reſolved: for if a King chanced to ſend a peer to the Tower, the parliament ſiting, either the caſe was known, or, if a ſecret, the houſe took no offenſe, becauſe the lords, not having any diffidence of their Sovereign, apprehended not that he would draw it into a precedent to aboliſh their privilege: but it was not the ſame in the reign of Charles I. Beſide its being perfectly well known that the earl of Arundel was ſent to the Tower only for ſpeeking too freely in the houſe (1), this King's principles concerning the peoples privileges was no ſecret; and it was manifeſt that, on only a bare poſſibility, he was ſtriving to eſtabliſh a principle which tended to render utterly uſeleſs the privilege in queſtion: and therefore the lords, being warranted by the commons example, would not let ſlip this opportunity to maintain their privilege.

Buckingham choſen chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge; Ruſhworth, p. 371. whereat the commons are offended.

Before Buckingham had given in his anſwer to the commons impeachment, the chancellorſhip of Cambridge univerſity becoming vacant by the earl of Suffolk's death, Charles got elected, in the late chancellor's room, the duke his favorite. The houſe of commons were extremely offended at this election, conſidering as a manifeſt contempt that this duke ſhould be choſen while under impeachment, and when one of the articles againſt him was plurality of offices. They moreover urged a ſort of contradiction to be in this choice, ſince the univerſity themſelves, by their repreſentatives in parliament, had conſented to Buckingham's impeachment. But, ſpite of all the commons efforts, Charles openly ſupported the election.

The King ſupports him.

The duke gives in his anſwer. Ruſhworth, p. 375, &c. Annals, p. 187, &c.

Finally, on the eighth of June, the duke put in his anſwer to the lower houſe's impeachment. As I have not given the particulars of the accuſation, it would be needleſs to inſert here the anſwers, which had a neceſſary reference to what was alledged againſt the duke. This affair having never been decided, it is eaſy to judge that, as the accuſation was highly agravated, ſo the anſwers were moſt carefully paliated. The proofs and evidences of the facts produced, for or againſt, would be the only means to inform us of the truth; but the buſineſs was not carried ſo far. It will ſuffice therefore to ſay, that the commons deſiring a copy of the anſwer, his Majeſty, on the morrow, wrote as follows to the ſpeaker.

His Majeſty's letter to the ſpeaker. Ruſhworth, p. 390.

Truſty and Well-beloved, &c.

"OUR houſe of commons cannot forget, how often and how earneſtly we have called upon them for the ſpeeding that aid which they intended us for our great and weighty affairs, concerning the ſafety and honor of us and our kingdoms: and now the time being ſo far paſſed that, unleſs it be preſently concluded, it can neither bring us money nor credit by the time which themſelves have fixed, which is the laſt of this month, and being farther defered would be of little uſe; we being daily advertiſed, from all parts, of the great preparations of the enemy ready to aſſail us: we hold it neceſſary, by theſe our letters, to give them our laſt and final admonition, and to let them know, that we ſhall account all farther delays and excuſes to be expreſs denials. And therefore we will and require you to ſignify unto them, that we do expect they forthwith bring in their bill of ſubſidy, to be paſſed without delay or condition, ſo as it may fully paſs the houſe by the end of next week at fartheſt; which if they do not, it will force us to take other reſolutions. But let them know, if they finiſh this according to our deſire, that we are reſolved to let them ſit together for the diſpatch of their other affairs ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, and after their receſs, to bring them together again next winter. And if, by their denial or delay, any thing of ill conſequence ſhall fall out, either at home or abroad, we call God and man to witneſs, that we have done our part to prevent it, by calling our people together to adviſe with us, by opening the weight of our occaſions unto them, and by requiring their timely help and aſſiſtance in theſe actions. And we will and command you, that this letter be read publicly in the houſe."

Charles's view in this letter.

This letter, written juſt as the duke of Buckingham's trial was bringing on, very evidently was a mere artifice to prevent proſecution; it not being poſſible that, if the ſubſidy-bill was paſſed by the time which Charles had aſſigned, the duke's affair could by then be diſpatched. It is true, his Majeſty promiſed to let the parliament ſit, "ſo long as the "ſeaſon would permit;" but by that very promiſe he reſerved to himſelf the liberty of proroguing it when he pleaſed, on pretenſe the ſeaſon was too far advanced to ſit any longer, eſpecially as he feigned to preſs the ſubſidy-bill purely thro' apprehenſion of a pretended invaſion, wherewith he ſaid the kingdom was threatened. Buckingham's affair muſt therefore drop of courſe, in order to be revived next ſeſſion, ſince prorogation puts a period to all buſineſs.

The commons not thinking fit to comply with his Majeſty's demands, preſented him a freſh petition againſt Popiſh recuſants. This was to ſhew the public that Charles's anſwer to the Oxford parliament's petition contained only empty words, not followed by any effects. They were likewiſe willing to make appear, that the duke of Buckingham's male-adminiſtration was not the only grievance they would have redreſſed. Here follows the petition.

The commons petition to K. Charles concerning recuſants. Ruſhworth, p. 391. Annals, p. 195.

To the King's moſt excellent Majeſty,

"YOUR Majeſty's moſt obedient and loyal ſubjects the commons, in this preſent parliament aſſembled, do with great comfort remember the many teſtimonies which your Majeſty hath given of your ſincerity and zeal for the true religion eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, and in particular your gracious anſwer to both houſes of parliament at Oxford, upon their petition concerning the cauſes and remedies of the increaſe of Popery; that your Majeſty thought fit, and would give order to remove from all places of authority and government, all ſuch perſons, as are either Popiſh recuſants, or according to direction of former acts of ſtate, juſtly to be ſuſpected; and was then preſented as a great and principal cauſe of that miſchief. But not having received ſo full redreſs herein as may conduce to the peace of this church, and ſafety of this regal ſtate, they hold it their duty, once

(1) It does not appear that the earl of Arundel was commited for any thing ſaid in the houſe, but, as is thought, for his ſon's marrying the duke of Lenox's ſiſter, whom the King deſigned for lord Lorn. The earl of Arundel had five proxies, which were loſt by his impriſonment. Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 363, 364.

CHARLES I AN' 1626.

" more to reſort to your ſacred Majeſty, humbly " to inform you that, upon examination, they find " the perſons under-written to be either recuſants, " Papiſts, or juſtly ſuſpected according to the for- " mer acts of ſtate, who now do, or, ſince the " ſiting of the parliament, did remain in places of " government, authority and truſt, in your ſeveral " counties of this your realm of England, and do- " minion of Wales.

Then followed a liſt of fifty-nine recuſants, and ſuſpected Papiſts, who were in places of truſt and authority in ſeveral counties *.

* See their names in Ruſhworth, Vol. I. p. 391.

" Wherefore they humbly beſeech your Majeſty, " not to ſuffer your loving ſubjects to continue any " longer diſcouraged, by the apparent ſenſe of that " increaſe, both in number and power, which by " the favor and countenance of ſuch like ill-affect- " ed governors accrueth to the Popiſh party; but " that, according to your own wiſdom, goodneſs " and piety (whereof they reſt aſſured) you will be " graciouſly pleaſed to command that anſwer of " your Majeſty's to be effectually obſerved, and the " parties above-named, and all ſuch others to be " put out of ſuch commiſſions and places of autho- " rity wherein they now are in your Majeſty's " realm of England, contrary to the acts and laws " of ſtates in that behalf."

It was not very much for Charles's honor to be ſo often preſſed to perform what he had ſo poſi- tively promiſed. But it muſt be conſidered it was not eaſy for him to withſtand the ſollicitations and intrigues of the Queen, of the duke of Buckingham whoſe mother was a profeſſed Papiſt, of ſir Richard Weſton his chief counſellor, and lord Conway ſecretary of ſtate, both likewiſe Papiſts, ſince theſe were neareſt his perſon, and held him as we may ſay beſieged.

A few days after the commons reſolved to wait on his Majeſty in a body, and preſent him, by their ſpeaker, a declaration of their conduct, ſerving for anſwer to his letter, and a petition to remove from about him the duke of Buckingham. The audience they had deſired being granted, the ſpeaker, before he preſented the anſwer (1), uttered the ſubſequent harangue.

The ſpeaker's harangue to his Majeſty, on preſenting him the petition and delaration. Ruſhworth, p. 397. Annals, p. 198.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" ACcording to that liberty of acceſs, and li- " berty of ſpeech which your Majeſty and " your royal progenitors have ever vouchſafed to " your houſe of commons, your Majeſty's moſt " humble and loyal ſubjects, the commons now " aſſembled in parliament, have been ſuitors for " this acceſs to your royal throne.

" And out of their conſideration of the nature, " and of the weight and importance of the buſi- " neſs, they have thought the attendance of the " whole houſe, with their ſpeaker, not too ſolemn; " and yet they have not thought fit barely to com- " mit thoſe words which expreſs their thoughts, to " the truſt of any man's ſpeech, but are bold to " preſent them in writing to your gracious hands, " that they may not vaniſh, but be more laſting " than the moſt powerful words of a more able " ſpeaker are like to be.

" I have much to read, and ſhall therefore, as " little as I can, weary your Majeſty with long " ſpeeches.

" This parchment contains two things, the one " by way of declaration, to give your Majeſty ac- " count, and humble ſatisfaction of their clear and " ſincere indeavors and intentions in your Majeſty's " ſervice; and the other an humble petition to " your Majeſty for the removal of that great per- " ſon, the duke of Buckingham, from acceſs to " your royal preſenſe.

" For the firſt, they beſeech your moſt excellent " Majeſty to believe, that no earthly thing is ſo " dear and precious to them as that your Majeſty " ſhould retain them in your grace and good opi- " nion; and it is grief to them, beyond my ex- " preſſion, that any miſinformation or miſinterpre- " tation ſhould at any time render their words or " proceedings offenſive to your Majeſty.

" It is not proper for any one to hear the eccho " of a voice who hears not the voice; and if ec- " chos be ſometimes heard to double and redouble, " the eccho of the eccho is ſtill fainter, and ſounds " not louder.

" I need not make the application, words miſ- " reported, tho' by an eccho, or but the eccho of " an eccho, at a third or fourth hand, have oft a " louder ſound than the voice it ſelf, and may ſound " diſloyalty, tho' the voice had nothing undutiful " or illoyal in it.

" Such miſinformations, they fear, have begot " thoſe interruptions and diverſions which have de- " layed the ripening and expediting of thoſe great " counſels, which concern your Majeſty's important " ſervice, and have inforced this declaration.

" I paſs from that to the petition, in which my " purpoſe is not to urge thoſe reaſons, which your " Majeſty may hear expreſſed in their own words in " the language of the people.

" I am only directed to offer to your great wiſ- " dom, and deep judgment, that this petition of " theirs is ſuch as may ſtand with your Majeſty's " honor and juſtice to grant.

" Your Majeſty hath been pleaſed to give many " royal teſtimonies and arguments to the world, " how good and gracious a maſter you are; and " that which the Queen of Sheba onee ſaid to the " wiſeſt King, may without flattery be ſaid to " your Majeſty, 'Happy are thoſe ſervants which " ſtand continually before you.'

" But the relations by which your Majeſty ſtands " in a gracious aſpect towards your people, do far " tranſcend, and are more prevalent and binding " than any relation of a maſter towards a ſervant; " and to hear and ſatisfy the juſt and neceſſary " deſires of your people is more honorable than " any expreſſion of grace to a ſervant.

" To be a maſter to a ſervant is communicable " to many of your ſubjects; to be a King of peo- " ple, is regal and incommunicable to ſubjects.

" Your Majeſty is truly ſtiled with that name " which the greateſt Emperors, tho' they borrow- " ed names and titles from thoſe countries which " they gained by conqueſt, moſt delighted in, Pater " Patriæ; and deſires of children are prefered be- " fore thoſe of ſervants, and the ſervant abideth " not in the houſe for ever, but the ſon abideth " ever.

" The government of a King was truly termed, " by your royal father, a politic marriage betwixt " him and his people: and I may ſafely ſay, there " was never a better union between a married " pair, than is between your Majeſty and your " people."

Having thus harangued, the ſpeaker put into the hands of his Majeſty, the declaration and petition, wherewith he was ſo diſpleaſed that he determined to diſſolve the parliament. The commons having thereof intimation, reſolved to preſent him a re- monſtrance, of which every member was ordered to have a copy. While this remonſtrance was pre- pairng, the lords being by his Majeſty himſelf in- formed of his reſolution, preſented him a petition

Charles determines on diſſolving the parliament.

The lords try in vain to divert him from it. Ruſhworth, P. 398.

(1) Not two papers, according to our author; the contrary appearing in that ſpeech. Tho' the copy of this anſwer, containing a declaration and petition, is not to be found, it was ingroſſed and allowed of, and the ſubſtance was delivered to the ſpeaker, ſir Heneage Finch. Ruſhworth, Vol. I p. 396.

to divert him from his purpoſe. But he would not liſten to any allegations; and, on the fifteenth of June, by a commiſſion under the great ſeal, had the parliament diſſolved.

The parliament diſſolved. June 15.

None doubted the duke of Buckingham's intereſt being the ſole cauſe of this diſſolution. Of this the commons were ſo thoroughly perſuaded, that they chiefly inſiſted on the great prejudice that dake's credit occaſioned to the kingdom, in the remonſtrance they had prepared, but were hindered from preſenting by the parliament's being diſſolved. It will not however be amiſs to inſert here the ſaid remonſtrance.

The commons remonſtrance; not preſented. Ruſhworth, p. 400. Annals, p. 199.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

"WE your loyal and faithful ſubjects, the "commons now aſſembled by your Ma- "jeſty's moſt royal authority in this preſent parlia- "ment, having with all dutiful affection, "from the time of our firſt meeting, earneſtly in- "deavored to proceed ſpeedily in thoſe affairs "which might beſt and ſooneſt conduce to our "diſpatch of the intended ſupply for your Ma- "jeſty's great deſigns, to the inlargement of your "ſupport, and to the inabling our ſelves, and them "whom we repreſent, to the full and timely per- "formance of the ſame, have, notwithſtanding, "by reaſon of diverſe informations, interruptions "and other preventions been hitherto retarded in "the proſecution of thoſe affairs, that we now "thought it a neceſſary part of our moſt humble "duties thus to declare both thoſe interruptions "and preventions, with the true original and con- "tinual cauſe of them; as alſo our moſt earneſt "devotion of the parliamentary ſervice of your "moſt excellent Majeſty, and of the careful ſafety "and defenſe of your dominions, crown and dig- "nity: and we therefore moſt humbly beſeech "your moſt excellent Majeſty, to be graciouſly "pleaſed here to caſt your eye on ſome particulars, "which have relation as well to your firſt parlia- "ment as to this; out of which we cannot doubt, "but that your great goodneſs may receive ample "ſatisfaction, touching our moſt loyal and faithful "intentions.

"In the firſt parliament of the firſt year of your "Majeſty's moſt happy reign over us, the com- "mons then aſſembled, after they had chearfully "preſented to your Majeſty, as the firſt fruits of "their affections, two intire ſubſidies, were ex- "ceedingly preſſed, by means of the duke of "Buckingham, and for his own ends, as we con- "ceive, to inlarge that ſupply; which when he "conceived would not be there effected, he pro- "cured, for the ſame ends, from your Majeſty, "an adjournment of the parliament to the city of "Oxford; where the commons, then taking into "juſt conſideratian the great miſchiefs which this "kingdom variouſly hath ſuffered, and that chiefly "by reaſon of the exorbitant power and frequent "miſdoings of the ſaid duke, were entering into a "parliamentary courſe of examination of thoſe "miſchiefs, power and miſdoings. But no ſooner "was there any mention made of his name to this "purpoſe, but that he, fearing leſt his actions "might ſo have been too much laid open to the "view of your moſt excellent Majeſty, and to the "juſt cenſure which might have then followed, "preſently, thro' his miſinformations to your Ma- "jeſty of the intentions of your ſaid commons (as "we have juſt cauſe to believe) procured a diſſo- "lution of the ſaid parliament. And afterwards, "alſo in the ſame year, thro' diverſe miſreports "made to your Majeſty in his behalf, touching "ſome members of the ſaid commons, who had "more particularly drawn his name into juſt que- "ſtion, and juſtly profeſſed themſelves averſe to "his ends there, procured (as we cannot but con- "ceive) the ſaid members to be made ſheriffs of "ſeveral counties for this year which followed, to "the end that they might have all been precluded "from being choſen members of the preſent par- "liament leſt they ſhould again have there que- "ſtioned him; and by the like practiſe alſo (as we "are perſuaded) he procured, ſoon after the ſaid "diſſolution, another member of the ſaid houſe *, "becauſe he had juſtly profeſſed himſelf againſt "his ends, to be ſent as ſecretary of your Ma- "jeſty's laſt fleet, hereby indeed to puniſh him, "by ſuch drawing him from his practiſe of the "law, which was his profeſſion, under color of an "honorable imployment.

CHARLES I An' 1626.

* Lord Glanvile.

"It pleaſed your Majeſty afterwards, in Febru- "ary laſt, to call this preſent parliament, where- "in tho' none of thoſe whom the ſaid duke, had pro- "cured to be made high-ſheriffs have ſat as mem- "bers; yet we, finding in our ſelves the like affec- "tion, firſt to the ſervice of your Majeſty, and "next to the good of the common-wealth, took "into ſerious conſideration ſeveral propoſitions, "how, for the ſafety of your Majeſty's kingdoms "and allies, we might inlarge your ſupports, and "add to the military ſtrength without charge to "the poorer ſort of your ſubjects, and give a larger "ſupply to your Majeſty, for your inſtant and "preſſing occaſions, than hath ever yet but once "been given in parliament. Whereupon, for the "inabling our ſelves and thoſe whom we repreſent, "we conceive it firſt neceſſary to ſearch into the "cauſes of thoſe miſchiefs which this your king- "dom ſuffereth, and diverſe of the grievances "which overburden your ſubjects; without doing "which, we could neither be faithful to your Ma- "jeſty, nor to the country which doth truſt and "imploy us, as your royal father alſo, of bleſſed "memory, admoniſhed the houſe of commons in "the fourth ſeſſion of his firſt parliament. In this "conſideration, we found that the moſt preſſing "and comprehenſive miſchief and grievance which "he ſuffered was fundamentally ſettled in the vaſt "power and enormous actions of the ſaid duke, "being ſuch that, by reaſon of his plurality of "offices, all got by ambition, and ſome for money, "expreſly againſt the laws of your realm; his "breach of truſt in not guarding the ſeas; his "high injuſtice in the admiralty; his extortion; "his delivering over the ſhips of this kingdom into "the hands of a foreign Prince; his procuring the "compulſory buying of honor for his own gain; "his unexampled exhauſting the treaſures and re- "venues of the kingdom; his tranſcendant pre- "ſumption of that unhappy applying phyſic to your "royal father of bleſſed memory, few days before "his death; and ſome other his offenſes carefully "and maturely examined by us, we made a par- "liamentary charge of the ſame matters and of- "fenſes againſt him to the lords, by your Majeſty "aſſembled in parliament, there expecting ſome "remedy by a ſpeedy proceeding againſt him. "But, may it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty, "not only during the time of our examination of "the matters and offenſes of the ſame charge, we "were diverſely interrupted and diverted by meſ- "ſages procured thro' miſinformation from your "Majeſty, which with moſt humble duty and re- "verence we did ever receive; whence it firſt fell "out, that ſo not only much time paſſed among "us, before the ſame charge was perfected; but "alſo within two days next after the ſame charge "was tranſmited by us to the lords, upon untrue "and malicious miſinformations, privately and "againſt the privilege of parliaments, given to "your Majeſty of certain words ſuppoſed to have "been ſpoken by ſir Dudley Diggs and ſir John Elliot,

Charles I An' 1626.

" Elliot, knights, two of the members of our " houſe, in their ſervice of tranſmiting the ſaid " charge, both of them having been eſpecially im- " ployed in the chairs of commitees with us, about " the examination of the ſaid matters and offenſes, " they were both by your Majeſty's command " commited to cloſe impriſonment in the Tower " of London, and their lodgings preſently ſearch- " ed, and their papers there found inſtantly taken " away; by reaſon whereof, not only our known " privileges of parliament were infringed, but we " our ſelves who, upon full hope of ſpeedy courſe " of juſtice againſt the ſaid duke, were preparing " with all dutiful affection to proceed to the diſ- " patch of the ſupply, and other ſervices to your " Majeſty, were wholly, as the courſe and privi- " lege of parliament binds us, diverted for diverſe " days to the taking only into conſideration " ſome courſes for the ratifying and preſervation " of the privileges ſo infringed: and we think it " our duties, moſt gracious Sovereign, moſt rightly " to inform hereby your moſt excellent Majeſty, " of the courſe held in the commitment of the " two members. For whereas, by your Majeſty's " warrant to your meſſengers for the arreſting " them, you were pleaſed to command, that they " ſhould repair to their lodgings, and there take " them; your Majeſty's principal ſecretary, lord " Conway, gave the ſaid meſſengers (as they af- " firmed) expreſs command, contrary to the ſaid " warrants, that they ſhould not go to their lodg- " ings, but to the houſe of commons, and there " take them; and if they found them not there, " they ſhould ſtay until they were come into the " houſe, and apprehend them whereſoever elſe " they ſhould find them. Which, beſide that it " is contrary to your Majeſty's command, is an " apparent teſtimony of ſome miſchievous inten- " tion there had againſt the whole houſe of com- " mons, and againſt the ſervice intended to your " Majeſty. All which, with the ſeveral interrup- " tions which preceded it, and the miſinformation " which hath cauſed all of them, we cannot doubt " but that they were wrought and procured by the " duke, to his own behoof, and for his advantage, " eſpecially becauſe the ſaid interruptions have, " thro' miſinformation, come among us only at " ſuch times wherein we have had the matters and " offenſes charged againſt him in agitation; but " your Majeſty, out of your great goodneſs and " juſtice, being afterwards informed truly of our " privilege, and the demerit of the cauſe which " concerned our two members, graciouſly com- " manded their delivery out of the Tower, for " which we render unto your Majeſty moſt humble " thanks; and were then again, by reaſon of our " hopes of the diſpatch of proceedings with the " lords, upon our charge againſt him the ſaid " duke, in a chearful purpoſe to go on with the " matter of ſupply, and other ſervices to your Ma- " jeſty, when again theſe hopes failed in us, by " reaſon of ſome new exorbitancies now lately ſhew- " ed in the exerciſe of his ſo great power and am- " bition; for by ſuch his power and ambition, " notwithſtanding our declaration againſt him for " his ſo great plurality of offices, he alſo procured " to himſelf, by the ſollicitation of his agents, and " of ſuch as depended upon him, the office of " chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge; " whereas the ſame univerſity, having two burgeſſes " in parliament, did by the ſame burgeſſes, a few " weeks before, conſent with us in the charge " againſt him for his ambition, for procuring ſuch " a plurality of offices; ſuch was his ambition to " ſue for it, ſuch was his power to make them give " it him, contrary to what themſelves had agreed " in parliament with all the commons of England.

" And he procured alſo the ſame office, by the Charles I " ſpecial labors and indeavors (as we are informed) An' 1626. " of a factious party, who adhereth to that dange- " rous innovation of religion, publiſhed in the " ſeditious writings of one Richard Montague, " clerk; of whom it is thence alſo, and hereto- " fore upon other reaſons it had been conceived, " that the ſaid duke is, and long hath been an " abettor and protector,

" Theſe actions of the ſaid duke have thus among " us hindered the ſervice of your Majeſty, by rea- " ſon both of the interruptions which have ſo ne- " ceſſarily accompanied them, and of the preven- " tion of our chearfulneſs, which otherwiſe had " long ſince been moſt effectually ſhewed in us, " that having nothing elſe in our cares, next to " our duty to God, but the loyal ſervice of your " Majeſty, the ſafety of your kingdom, and the " ſubſiſtence of our ſelves, and thoſe whom we re- " preſent, for the continuance of that ſervice and " ſafety which we cannot hope for. And we be- " ſeech your moſt excellent Majeſty, graciouſly to " receive this our humble and free proteſtation, " that we cannot hope for it, ſo long as we thus " ſuffer under the preſſures of the power and ambi- " tion of the ſaid duke, and the diverſe and falſe " informations ſo given to your Majeſty on his " behalf, and for his advantage; eſpecially when " we obſerve alſo, that in ſuch his greatneſs, he " preventeth the giving true information to your " Majeſty, in all things which may any ways re- " flect on his own miſdoings, to ſhew unto your " Majeſty the true ſtate of your ſubjects and king- " doms, otherwiſe than as it may be repreſented " for his own ends. And to that purpoſe alſo hath " he procured ſo many perſons depending on him, " either by alliance or advancement, to places of " eminency near your ſacred perſon. Tho' his " miſinformations of that kind alſo, and power, " we have ſeen, to our great grief, both in the " time of your Majeſty's royal father, of bleſſed " memory, and of your Majeſty, diverſe officers " of the kingdom ſo often by him diſplaced and " altered that, within theſe few years paſſed ſince " the begining of his greatneſs, more ſuch diſpla- " cings and alterations have by his means happen- " ed than in many years before them: neither was " there in the time of your royal father, of bleſſed " memory, any ſuch courſe held, before it was by " the practiſe of the ſaid duke thus introduced. And " ſince that time, diverſe officers of the crown, " not only in this your kingdom of England, but " alſo in Ireland, as they have been made friends " or adverſe to the ſaid duke, have been either ſo " commended, or miſrepreſented by him to his So- " vereign, and by his procurement ſo placed or " diſplaced, that he hath always herein, as much " as in him lay, made his own ends and advan- " tage the meaſure of the good or ill of your Ma- " jeſty's kingdoms.

" But now at length, may it pleaſe your moſt " excellent Majeſty, we have received from the " lords a copy of the ſaid duke's anſwer to our " charge tranſmited againſt him; whereunto we " ſhall preſently in ſuch ſort reply, according to " the laws of parliament, that, unleſs his power " and practiſe again undermine our proceedings, " we do not doubt but we ſhall, upon the ſame, " have judgment againſt him.

" In the times alſo (moſt gracious Sovereign) of " theſe interruptions which came among us, by " reaſon of the procurement of two of our mem- " bers commited, a gracious meſſage was " formerly received from your Majeſty, wherein " you had been pleaſed to let us know, that, if " you had not a timely ſupply, your Majeſty " would betake yourſelf to new counſels; which

Charles I An' 1626.

" we cannot doubt were intended by your moſt " excellent Majeſty to be ſuch as ſtood with juſtice " and the laws of this realm. But theſe words, " New Counſels,' were remembered in a ſpeech " made among us, by one of your Majeſty's privy " council, and lately a member of us, who in the " ſame ſpeech told us; he had often thought of " thoſe words, 'New Counſels;' that, in his con- " ſideration of them, he remembered, that there " were ſuch kinds of parliaments anciently among " other nations, as are now in England: that in " England he ſaw the country-people live in hap- " pineſs and plenty, but in theſe other nations he " ſaw them poor both in perſons and habit, or to " that effect; which ſtate and condition happened " (as he ſaid) to them, where ſuch 'New Counſels' " were taken as that the uſe of their parliaments " ended.

" This intimation, may it pleaſe your Majeſty, " was ſuch as, alſo, gave juſt cauſe to fear there " were ſome ill miniſters near your Majeſty, who, " in behalf of the ſaid duke, and together with " him, who is ſo ſtrangely powerful, were ſo much " againſt the parliamentary courſe of this king- " dom, as they might perhaps adviſe your moſt " excellent Majeſty ſuch new counſels as theſe " which fell under the memory and conſideration " of that privy-counſellor. And one eſpecial reaſon " among others hath increaſed that fear among us, " for that whereas the ſubſidies of tonage and " poundage, which determined upon the death of " your moſt royal father, our late Sovereign, and " were never payable to any of your Majeſty's an- " ceſtors, but only by a ſpecial act of parliament, " and ought not to be levied without ſuch act; yet " ever ſince the begining of your Majeſty's happy " reign over us, the ſaid ſubſidies have been levied " by ſome of your Majeſty's miniſters, as if they " were ſtill due; altho' alſo one parliament hath " been ſince then begun, and diſſolved by pro- " curement of the ſaid duke, as is before ſhewed, " wherein no act paſſed for the ſame ſubſidies: " which example is ſo much againſt the conſtant " uſe of former times, and the known right and " liberty of your ſubjects, that it is a moſt apparent " effect of ſome new counſels given againſt the " ancient ſettled courſe of government of this your " Majeſty's kingdom, and chiefly againſt the right " of your commons; as if there might be any " ſubſidy, tax, or aid levied upon them without " their conſent in parliament, or contrary to the " ſettled laws of this kingdom. But if any ſuch " do ſo ill an office, as by the miſrepreſentation of " the ſtate, and right of your Majeſty's loyal ſub- " jects, adviſe any ſuch new counſels, as the levying " any aid, tax, or ſubſidy among your people, " contrary to the ſettled laws of your kingdom, " we cannot, moſt gracious Sovereign, but eſteem " them who ſhall ſo adviſe not only as vipers, but " peſts to their King and common-wealth (as all " ſuch were to both houſes of parliament expreſly " ſtiled by your moſt royal father) but alſo capital " enemies, as well to your crown and dignity, as " to the common-wealth. And we ſhall, for our " parts, in parliament ſhew, as occaſion ſhall re- " quire, and be ready to declare their offenſes of " this kind, ſuch as may be rewarded with the " higheſt puniſhment, as your laws inflict on any " offenders.

" Theſe and ſome of theſe things, among many " other (moſt gracious Sovereign) are thoſe which " have ſo much prevented a right underſtanding be- " tween your Majeſty and us, and which have " poſſeſſed the hearts of your people and loyal " commons with unſpeakable ſorrow and grief, " finding apparently all humble and hearty in- " deavors miſinterpreted, hindered and now at " laſt almoſt fruſtrated utterly, by the interpoſition " of the exceſſive and abuſive power of one man; " againſt whom we have juſt cauſe to proteſt, not " only in regard of the particulars wherewith he " hath been charged, which parliamentary way we " are inforced to inſiſt upon as matters which lie " in our notice and proof, but alſo becauſe we ap- " prehend him of ſo unbridled ambition, and ſo " averſe to the good and tranquillity of the church " and ſtate, that we verily believe him to be an " enemy to both. And therefore, unleſs we would " betray our own duties to your Majeſty, and thoſe " from whom we are truſted, we cannot but ex- " preſs our infinite grief, that he ſhould have ſo " great power and intereſt in your princely af- " fections, and under your Majeſty, wholly in a " manner to ingroſs to himſelf the adminiſtration " of your affairs of the kingdom, which by that " means is drawn into a condition moſt miſerable " and hazardous. Charles I An' 1626.

" Give us then leave, moſt dear Sovereign, in " the name of all the commons of this your king- " dom, proſtrate at the feet of your ſacred Ma- " jeſty, moſt humbly to beſeech you, even for the " honor of Almighty God, whoſe religion is " directly undermined by the practiſe of that party " whom this duke ſupports; for your honor, which " will be much advanced in the relieving your " people in this their great and general grievance; " for the honor, ſafety, and welfare of your king- " dom, which by this means is threatened with al- " moſt unavoidable dangers, and for the love which " your Majeſty, as a good and loving father, bears " unto your good people, to whom we profeſs, in " the preſenſe of Almighty God (the ſearcher of " all hearts) you are as highly eſteemed and be- " loved as ever any of your predeceſſors were, " that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to remove " this perſon from acceſs to your ſacred preſenſe, " and that you would not balance this one man " with all theſe things, and with the affairs of the " Chriſtian world, which do all ſuffer, ſo far as " they have relation to this kingdom, chiefly by " his means. For we proteſt to your Majeſty, and " to the whole world, that until this great perſon " be removed from intermedling with the great " affairs of ſtate, we are out of hope of any good " ſucceſs; and do fear that any money we ſhall " or can give will, thro' his miſ-imployment, be " turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of this " your kingdom, than otherwiſe, as by lamentable " experience we have found, in thoſe large ſupplies " we have formerly and lately given.

" But no ſooner ſhall we receive redreſs and re- " lief in this (which of all others, is our moſt in- " ſupportable grievance) but we ſhall forthwith " proceed to accompliſh your Majeſty's own de- " ſire, for ſupply, and likewiſe with all chearful- " neſs apply our ſelves to the perfecting diverſe " other great things, ſuch as we think no one par- " liament in one age can parallel, tending to the " ſtability, wealth, ſtrength and honor of this " your kingdom, and the ſupport of your friends " and allies abroad: and we doubt not but, thro' " God's bleſſing, as you are the beſt, ſo ſhall you " ever be the beſt beloved, and greateſt Monarch " ever ſat on the royal throne of this famous king- " dom."

Having thus ſeen the commons complaints againſt the duke of Buckingham, or rather againſt the King himſelf, who was governed by his ſaid favorite, and had ſeveral times declared, that the duke did nothing without his orders, it is but juſt we ſhould now have alſo a view of his Majeſty's complaints againſt the commons, and the grounds and cauſes of his diſſolving this, and the former parliament. Tho' his declaration, publiſhed on this occaſion, is exorbitantly

CHARLES I AN' 1626.
